PREFACE TO NEW EDITION

THIS famous DICTIONARY OF ENGLISH HISTORY—familiarily known to students by the abbreviated title “Low and Pulling”—was originally planned some forty-five years ago by the late Professor F. S. Pulling of the Yorkshire College (now the University of) Leeds, and carried into effect under the skilled editorship of Mr. (now Sir) Sidney Low. The editor was singularly successful in securing the assistance of a band of remarkably able young men, at that time little known outside the limits of their Universities, but most of them destined later to attain positions of considerable eminence in the historical world. Conspicuous among them were W. J. Ashley, Mandell Creighton, C. H. Firth, William Hunt, Sidney Lee, R. L. Poole, Hastings Rashdall, H. R. Reichel, A. I. Smith, and T. F. Tout. Their work in the Dictionary was of the highest quality and much of it remains of enduring value.

Lapse of time, however, has rendered drastic revision of the Dictionary as a whole imperatively necessary. Partial revisions, it is true, were effected in 1896, 1897, 1904, and 1910, but the time has now come when a complete recension of the entire work is required. On the one hand, the mere passage of the years has added an immense number of new topics and fresh names which demand inclusion. On the other hand, the immense advance in historical knowledge made during the present century has rendered a careful consideration of many of the statements of the original articles necessary.

Of the original contributors to the first edition of the Dictionary it has fortunately been possible to consult seven, and they have all been exceedingly kind either in permitting, or in assisting in, the revision of their articles. In cases where additions have been made by the present editors to articles signed by their initials, the additions are enclosed in square brackets; in a few cases where the articles have had to be largely re-written, the original initials have, by request, been omitted. The present editors wish particularly to thank Sir Sidney Low, the first editor, for the kindly and invaluable advice and assistance which he has generously afforded to them at every stage of their undertaking.

With respect to important articles by distinguished writers no longer living, e.g. the notable articles on ecclesiastical history by Bishop Mandell Creighton, it has generally been considered best to leave the original signed article unchanged, and to add, within square brackets, a supplement bringing the article up to date, indicating any necessary revisions, and mentioning later authorities.

The articles which have demanded the most drastic revision are those on economic history and on colonial and imperial history. These two departments of history have almost been created during the past forty-five years. The editors have been fortunate in securing for these two sections the invaluable expert assistance of, for economic history, Mr. A. V. Judges, B.A., of King's College and the School of Economics, and, for colonial and imperial history, Mr. H. Ross, M.A., of King's College and the Institute of Historical Research.

The editors also wish most cordially to thank the following eminent contributors or revisers of special articles: Professor J. W. Adamson (Education in England); Mr. H. L. Beales; Dr. Dorothy M. Broome (Royal Household, Chamber, Wardrobe, Privy Seal, Master of the Rolls); Dr. E. F. Churchill (Dispensing and Suspending Powers); the Rev. Dr. T. Corcoran (Education in Ireland); Mr. C. H. Driver (Robert Owen, Francis Place, Socialism); Dr. Maxwell Garnett (League of Nations); Mr. J. H. Humphreys (Proportional Representation); Mr. A. G. Little (the Friars); the Rev. Dr. A. Main (Church of Scotland); Miss Mabel H. Mills (Exchequer, Sheriff, Bailiff, County Court, Lord High Treasurer, Matthew Paris); Miss Constantia Maxwell (Ireland, Irish Church); the Rev. Professor J. Moffat (Free Church of Scotland); the Rev. Dr. A. Peel (Congregationalism); Dr. Eileen Power; Professor Stanley Roberts (Welsh Church); Professor J. Strong (Education in Scotland); the Rev. Dr. Norman Sykes (Church of England, Convocation); Professor C. S. Terry (Scotland); Mr. W. T. Whitley (Baptists); Mr. W. H. Wickwar (Freedom of Press, Broad Church, Chartists); and a high authority who wishes to remain anonymous for the article on the Society of Friends.

Apart from the articles above-mentioned there are new articles on a large number of topics, of which the following may be specially noted: Archæology, Arms and Armour, Chronicles, Colonial Office, Foreign Office, the Great War, Home Office, the Royal Household, Imperial Conferences, Knight Service, Labour Party, Parliament Act, Post Office, Records.

Among changes in the format of the Dictionary may be noted: (1) Peers have been entered under their family names, with cross references under their titles; (2) Chronicles, formerly described separately, have, with one or two exceptions, been dealt with in a single comprehensive article; (3) the table of regnal years, formerly appended to the article under the title "King," has been placed under its own title; (4) the spelling of Indian and other names has been modernized.

The bulk of the more laborious part of the editorial work has been performed by Dr. Helena M. Chew and Mr. A. C. F. Beales, from whose pens many of the new articles have come. It is a pleasure to me to thank them for the admirably able and efficient manner in which they have carried through their arduous duties.

In conclusion, I would express the hope that in its new form this DICTIONARY OF ENGLISH HISTORY may continue to render the useful service which in its old form it has provided for so many years.

PREFACE TO FIRST EDITION

AT a time when the systematic study of English history is every day attracting the interest of an ever-widening circle of readers, it is somewhat remarkable that there should be no convenient handbook to the whole subject. The present publication is an attempt to supply this deficiency, so far as it can be supplied by a work which is intended to be useful rather than exhaustive. It is scarcely possible that everything relating directly or indirectly to a subject so vast and so ill-defined as the history of a great people and a great empire could be included within the compass of eleven hundred moderate-sized pages. The compilers of a concise historical dictionary must be content to make a selection from the materials at their command. The present work is not an encyclopædia, and the editors are aware that many things are omitted from it which might have been included, had its limits been wider, and its aim more ambitious. But they hope that the general reader, as well as the special student of the history of the British Empire, will find this volume a convenient auxiliary to his studies; and they are sanguine enough to anticipate that it will fill a gap on his bookshelves not at present occupied by any single book of reference. Dictionaries of biography already exist in abundance; handbooks of dates and chronology are common and familiar things; manuals of English history, political and constitutional, of all sizes and all degrees of merit, are at the easy command of the reading public; and it is possible, by diligent search, to discover works on English bibliography, and even on the bibliography of English history. But if a great book is a great evil, a great many books are assuredly a greater. The most earnest student cannot be expected to read his history with a dozen manuals and works of reference at his elbow, in case he should be in doubt as to a fact, or should require to verify a date, to gain some information on a constitutional point, to satisfy himself as to the sequence of events at one of the epochs of our annals, or to find out the authorities for a particular period. To produce a book which should give, as concisely as possible, just the information, biographical, bibliographical, chronological, and constitutional, that the reader of English history is likely to want, is what is here attempted.

In deciding what should or should not find a place in these pages, the Editors have tried to keep in view the probable needs of modern readers. Practical convenience has guided them in the somewhat arbitrary selection they have been compelled to make; and with a view to this end they have not hesitated to make some slight changes of plan which suggested themselves in the course of the work. In the biographical department names of purely personal and literary interest have been omitted, and the biographies have been written throughout from the historical standpoint. No attempt is made to supplant other dictionaries devoted solely to biography; but the reader will, it is hoped, find sufficient information about every prominent personage to be of use to him in his historical studies, while the references to authorities which accompany all the more important articles will show him where to go if he desires to pursue his inquiries further. In the older "Helps to English History," such as that of Heylin, space equal to the whole of this work is devoted to genealogies and to the lists of the holders of public offices and dignities. In the present volume relatively little space is given to these subjects. The genealogies of the great families and the order of official succession are very fully worked out in many well-known and easily accessible works. A modern student is likely to have more occasion for the accounts of the growth of English institutions, and for the summaries of great epochs in our history, and of the relations of the country with foreign powers, which occupy a considerable portion of these pages. In these instances it is hoped also that the bibliographical notes, supplemented by the special article on AUTHORITIES ON ENGLISH HISTORY, will be found of considerable value, even by those who can lay claim to some historical scholarship.

It is perhaps necessary to say that, though "English" on the title-page of this work is to be understood in its widest and least exact sense, and though the doings of Englishmen, Scotsmen, Irishmen and Welshmen at all places and periods nostris est farrago libelli, yet very much more attention is devoted to the history of England than to that of Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and the Colonies. Selection being inevitable if the book were not to sacrifice its chief recommendation, that of practical utility, it is felt that the rule adopted, though illogical, is the one likely to promote the greatest convenience of the greatest number of readers. It has been thought advisable to bring the book down to our own day; but very recent events have been treated more briefly than those of more remote periods, and only those living and recently deceased statesmen have been included, concerning whom there can be no reasonable doubt that their names have a right to appear in a Dictionary of English History. For obvious reasons no articles on living historians have been given, though it is hoped that full justice is done to their works in the bibliographical notes.

To save space, and to secure somewhat more adequate treatment, it has often been thought better to group the various divisions of a large subject into one article, rather than to discuss them separately in a number of short ones. Here, again, the rule followed is somewhat arbitrary. But a reference to the Index will generally show the reader where to look in case he does not find the title he is in search of in its proper place.

Such merits as this volume may be found to possess are due in great measure to the able staff of contributors who have given it their invaluable aid. To all of them the Editors have to render their grateful thanks. For many useful suggestions and much kindly interest displayed in the progress of the work, they have to acknowledge their obligations to Dr. Mandell Creighton; Professor Rowley, University College, Bristol; Mr. Arthur L. Smith, Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford; Mr. Lloyd Sanders, M.A.; Mr. W. J. Ashley, M.A.; and Mr. T. A. Archer, B.A. Their special thanks are due to Mr. T. F. Tout, M.A., whose assistance throughout has been of the greatest value, and who has constantly and most kindly placed the benefits of his extensive knowledge of modern history at the service of the Editors.

DICTIONARY OF ENGLISH HISTORY

Abbeville, THE TREATY OF (May 20, 1259), better known as the Treaty of Paris, was concluded between Louis IX of France and Henry III of England, after the abortive attempt of the latter to recover the provinces which John had lost. The English king relinquished all claims to Normandy, Anjou, Touraine, Maine, and Poitou; but was guaranteed the possession of Gascony, which he was to continue to hold as a fief from the French crown. Louis further ceded to Henry all his own rights in the three bishoprics of Limoges, Perigueux and Cahors, together with the reversion of Saintonge and the Agenais; and promised him a grant of money sufficient to maintain five hundred knights for two years.

The text of the treaty is given in Rymer, "Fœdera," i. 675 (ed. of 1704). Ib. 688.

Abbey. [MONASTICISM.]

Abbot (abbas, literally "father") was a title of respect applied in early times to all monks, but was afterwards specifically restricted to the superior of a monastery. The abbot was elected by the brethren of the monastery, subject to varying and ill-defined rights of the Crown and the bishop; but, on the whole, as the position of abbot was one of comparatively small political importance, freedom of election was allowed to a degree very rare in bishoprics, and the power and influence of the great orders freed them also in most cases from episcopal jurisdiction. Thus chosen, the abbot held office for life, unless canonically deprived by the bishop. In the earliest days of the English Church, the abbots, like other monks, were very commonly laymen, but later it became usual for them to receive priest's orders; and an early instance of a series of presbyter abbots is to be found in the great foundation of Iona. In Ireland, abbots were either themselves bishops, or usurpers of episcopal functions. In the monastic cathedrals which form such a peculiar feature in English Church history, the bishop was also abbot. The power of the abbot varied with the order to which he belonged, but it was always very high. In theory, as the name denotes, it was paternal; and, in early times, this paternal authority is the same as absolute power. The abbot was to be feared as lord as well as loved as father. No one was allowed to act without his orders, and the whole management of the monastery ultimately depended on him. But Benedictine abbots were restricted in various ways by their obligation to observe the rule of their founder. The practical limitations to the power of the abbot were: (a) the prior; (b) the decani and centenarii chosen by the monks; (c) the general chapter of the monastery (by the rule of St. Benedict, the abbot was obliged to take counsel with all the monks, junior as well as senior, though the final right of decision rested with him, and not with the brethren); (d) the bishop, though exemption, after the twelfth century, generally took away this check; (e) the advocatus, an influential layman, who was appointed owing to the inability of the abbot to interfere in person in civil suits, and who consequently largely limited the power of the abbot over the property of the abbey and secular matters generally. But, with all these deductions, the abbot held a most imposing position. As practical landlord of a large district, he had much social influence and political consideration. In England the position of the abbot was especially important; for, introduced by monks, English Christianity had from the first a monastic aspect. Thus half the English cathedrals became Benedictine abbeys, of which the canons were monks and the bishop abbot. As magnates, or as king's chaplains, a few abbots sat in the witenagemot; and, after the Conquest, many of them attended the great council [and later the parliament], and were ranked after the lords spiritual. Under the early Norman kings, Norman abbots were set over the English monasteries, and in many cases met with determined resistance from their monks. They organized the monastic system more strictly than before; and each new order found a home in England during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Some abbots were called mitred, because they received from the pope the right of wearing the mitre and other vestments proper to the episcopal office. This did not, however, affect their constitutional position. The smaller abbots felt attendance at parliament to be a strain on their resources, and during the fourteenth century, when the theory prevailed that baronial tenure was the ground of the summons, many of them secured exemption by claiming that they did not hold their estates by any tenure that involved the duty of parliamentary attendance. In Edward I's model parliament of 1295 there were present 67 abbots and priors; but this number rapidly declined, and from 1341 to the dissolution of the monasteries varied from 27 to 31. The abbots summoned in 1483 may be mentioned as showing the chief amongst the body. They were: Peterborough, St. Edmunds, Colchester, Abingdon, Waltham, Shrewsbury, Cirencester, Gloucester, Westminster, St. Albans, Bardney, Selby, St. Benedict of Hulme, Thorney, Evesham, Ramsey, Hyde, Glastonbury, Malmesbury, Crowland, Battle, Winchcombe, Reading, St. Augustine's, St. Mary's York, and the priors of Coventry and St. John of Jerusalem. As the average number of lay lords attending parliament was about 40, the proportion of abbots was large. The monasteries, however, represented the influence of the papacy as against the bishops, and were left unmolested both by pope and king. The elections of abbots were rarely interfered with by the Crown, and in the later Middle Ages abbots did not take much part in political affairs. They were chiefly busy with the administration of the secular business of their monasteries. When once the work of civilization had been accomplished, monasticism drifted apart from the general current of national life, and its abuses became increasingly manifest. The religious reformers found little difficulty in calling attention to the sloth and uselessness of the smaller monasteries, and in 1536 the temporalities of all that did not exceed £200 a year were given by act of parliament to the king: their number was computed at 380. The greater monasteries followed by process of compulsory surrender, and by 1540 all had been suppressed. They took no common action to avert their doom; the abbots in the House of Lords did not raise their voices against the measure for vesting in the Crown the property of monasteries which should be suppressed. With the disappearance of the abbots from the House of Lords, the preponderance of lay over spiritual peers was established, and the subsequent work of the reformation of the Church was rendered more easy. Lay abbots, or advocati ecclesie, were common in the abbeys of Irish origin from the eighth to the twelfth centuries. They were commonly the descendants of the founder or of a neighbouring lord, and were originally the lessees of the abbey lands. In some cases, the coarb, or abbot, chosen by the monks retained his spiritual position, but, in temporal matters, he was quite superseded by the advocatus. [CATHEDRAL; MONASTICISM.]

The ecclesiastical and social position of an abbot can best be gathered by reference to the history of some monastery, such as Walsingham's "Gesta Abbatum Monasterii S. Albani," ed. Riley, 1863-72, or "Chronica Joceline de Brakelonde," "Memorials of St. Edmund's Abbey," Rolls Series, i, pp. 209 seq. The constitutional questions concerning abbots are discussed in the "Lords' Report on the Dignity of a Peer," 1829. See also arts. Abbot, in the "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities," the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and the "Catholic Encyclopedia"; Montalembert, "The Monks of the West"; Butler, "Benedictine Monachism"; and for the Celtic abbots, Skene, "Celtic Scotland," vol. ii, and Fowler's edition of Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba." [M. C.]

Abbot, CHARLES, LORD COLCHESTER (1757-1829), was educated at Westminster, and Christ Church, Oxford, and attained much practice at the bar. He entered parliament in 1795, and strongly supported the Seditious Meetings Bill. In 1801 he was appointed chief secretary for Ireland. In 1802 he became Speaker of the House of Commons, in which capacity he gave a casting vote against Lord Melville in 1805. He strongly opposed the Catholic Relief Bill, and effected several important improvements in the mode of managing business in the House. He resigned his seat in 1816, and was raised to the peerage.

Abbot, GEORGE (1562-1633), Archbishop of Canterbury, 1611-33, was born of humble parents in Guildford; became a fellow of Balliol College, Oxford, 1582; was elected master of University College in 1597, and made Dean of Winchester in 1600, Bishop of Lichfield in 1609, and translated to the see of London, 1610. He owed his appointment as archbishop (1611) to his union of Calvinistic theology with a desire to maintain the authority of the Crown in ecclesiastical matters. Such a position coincided with the wishes of James I; but Abbot, though a man of earnest piety, was narrow-minded, stern, and lacking in geniality. He was in theological matters the conspicuous opponent of Laud, who represented the reaction against Calvinism. His conscientiousness was shown by his determined refusal to comply with the wishes of the king in forwarding the divorce of the Countess of Essex from her husband, that she might marry the favourite, Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset. In 1621, at a staghunt at Bramhill Park, Abbot accidentally shot a keeper. This raised the question among canonists whether, in consequence of having shed blood, he had become legally incapacitated from the episcopal office. A commission of bishops and judges appointed to determine this point were divided in opinion, but advised the king that it was desirable that the archbishop should ask for pardon. Though Abbot was greatly shaken by this untoward event, he still was bold enough to express his disapproval of the Spanish marriage of Prince Charles. On the accession of Charles I, Abbot found that his influence at court was gone, and that Laud was the favourite. In 1627 he incurred Charles I's displeasure by manfully refusing to license a sermon by Dr. Robert Sibthorpe, in favour of passive obedience. He was ordered into confinement, while the archbishopric was put into the hands of a commission, with Laud at the head. He was, however, restored to some degree of royal favour next year; but, suffering from disease, and embittered in temper, he was helpless against the influence of Laud. His last years were spent in the indolence of sickness and despair, and his death made way for the undisputed power of his rival. He was buried in Trinity Church, Guildford, where his monument still remains. Abbot was munificent in his benefactions, and built a hospital at Guildford, which bears his name. He was a worthy man, but had neither knowledge, large-heartedness, nor tact sufficient for his office.

Heylin, "Cyprianus Anglicanus"; Spelman's "Apologie for Archbishop Abbot," 1727; Abbot's "Narrative" in Rushworth, "Historical Collections," vol. i. [M. C.]

Abbott, CHARLES, 1ST LORD TENTERDEN (1762-1832), was the son of a hairdresser. He was educated at King's School, Canterbury and Corpus Christi, Oxford, and was called to the bar in 1795. His treatise on the "Law of Merchant Ships and Seamen" (1802) was recognized as the standard work on its subject. Owing to the weakness of his health he refused a seat on the bench in 1808, but in 1816 he was made a puisne judge in the Common Pleas. In 1818, on the retirement of Lord Ellenborough, he became lord chief justice of the King's Bench and, though a Tory, he never allowed his political sympathies to colour his judgments. He was raised to the peerage in 1827.

Abdication. [KING; CROWN.]

Abel, THOMAS (d. July 30, 1540), chaplain to Katharine of Aragon, strongly opposed the divorce of that princess; and was attainted for his share in the affair of Elizabeth Barton, and found guilty of misprision of treason. He was subsequently imprisoned and executed for denying the king's supremacy, and affirming the legality of the marriage with Katharine. He carved the famous punning inscription (an A upon a bell) on the walls of the Beauchamp Tower in the Tower of London.

Abercorn, PEERAGE OF. In 1603 James Hamilton, Master of Paisley, grandson of James Hamilton, 2nd Earl of Arran and Duke of Châtellerauld [DOUGLAS; HAMILTON], was created Baron Abercorn, and in 1606 Earl of Abercorn. John James, 9th earl, was created Marquis of Abercorn in 1790, and his successor James (b. 1811), lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 1866-8, and 1874-6, was created Duke of Abercorn and Marquis of Hamilton, August 10, 1868. The title is derived from the Castle of Abercorn in Linlithgowshire, a stronghold of the Douglasses, taken by James II in the Douglas rebellion of 1455. Abercorn was the seat of one of the earliest monasteries in Scotland, and of a Pictish bishopric.

Abercromby, SIR RALPH (1734-1801), born near Tullibody, Clackmannanshire, entered the army as cornet in a dragoon regiment in 1756, and was gazetted to a colonelcy in 1781. He had, however, seen scarcely any active service, on account of his opposition to the government while in the House of Commons, and the sympathy he manifested for the American colonies. In 1793 he commanded a brigade under the Duke of York in Holland. In the winter of 1794-5 he showed great skill in protecting, as far as possible, the British forces during their disastrous retreat. After the close of this expedition, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in the West Indies. He returned in 1799, and held the chief command in Ireland during that and the following year. There he showed much talent in reorganizing an undisciplined army, as well as statesman-like tact. Thwarted, however, by the Irish government, he reluctantly resigned his office, and accepted the chief command in Scotland, whence he was called to serve again in the disastrous expedition to Holland under the Duke of York. In 1801 he was appointed to command the expedition against the French in Egypt. With wonderful skill and daring he disembarked his forces at Aboukir in the face of the French army. On March 21 the two armies met near Alexandria. Abercromby gained a complete victory; but the battle, which saved Egypt from the French, cost the English the life of their commander. In acknowledgment of Sir Ralph Abercromby's services, his widow was created a peeress of the United Kingdom, with the style and title of Baroness Abercromby of Aboukir. The title descended to her eldest son. Her third son, James, judge-advocate-general, 1827, Speaker of the House of Commons, 1835-9, was created Lord Dunfermline of Dunfermline in 1839. [ALEXANDRIA, BATTLE OF.]

Lord Dunfermline, "Sir R. Abercromby: a Memoir," 1861. [W. R. S.]

Aberdeen, was an important place even before its elevation to a city in the twelfth century. It was made a royal burgh by William the Lion, and received a charter from Robert Bruce in 1319. The university was founded in 1494 by Bishop Elphinstone, and Marischal College by George Keith, Earl Marischal, about a century later. They were united in 1860. In 1336 the greater portion of the town was burnt by the English, and when rebuilt was called New Aberdeen.

A. M. Munro, "Aberdeen," 1906.

Aberdeen Doctors, was the name given, in 1638-9, to six clergymen of Aberdeen—John Forbes, Robert Barron, Alexander Ross, William Leslie, Alexander Scrogie, and James Sibbald—who strenuously opposed the compulsory administration to all persons of the oath to preserve the Solemn League and Covenant.

Aberdeen, GEORGE HAMILTON-GORDON, 4TH EARL OF (1784-1860). [GORDON.]

Aberdeen, PEERAGE OF. [GORDON.] In 1682 Sir John Gordon of Haddo, lord chancellor of Scotland, was created Earl of Aberdeen in the peerage of Scotland. George, 4th earl, was made a peer of the United Kingdom in 1813, and in 1818, on his marriage with Lady Catherine Hamilton, assumed the additional surname and arms of Hamilton.

Abergavenny, BARONS. [NEVILLE.]

Abergavenny, PEERAGE OF. The lordship of Abergavenny was granted in the reign of William II to Hamelin de Ballon. After passing through many hands, it came in the later fourteenth century into those of William Beauchamp, fourth son of Thomas, Earl of Warwick, whom we find summoned to parliament in November 1392 as "Willelmus Beauchamp de Bergeveny." The barony passed to a branch of the Neville family on the marriage (c. 1424) of Elizabeth, heiress of Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Worcester and Lord Bergavenny, to Sir Edward Neville (youngest son of Ralph, Earl of Westmorland, by Joan Beaufort, daughter of John of Gaunt). In 1784 George, Lord Abergavenny, was created Viscount Neville and Earl of Abergavenny; and in 1876 William, the 5th earl, was advanced to the dignity of a marquis. [NEVILLE.]

Abhorrrers (1679), was the name given to the adherents of the court party, who, on petitions being presented to the king, praying him to summon parliament for January 1680, signed counter-petitions, expressing abhorrence for those who were attempting to encroach on the royal prerogative. [PETITIONERS.] It is said that the names Whig and Tory (q.v.), as party designations, were first used in the disputes between the Petitioners and Abhorrrers.

Abingdon, PEERAGE OF. In 1572 Sir Henry Norris, who was ambassador to France the preceding year, and son of the Sir Henry Norris beheaded in 1536 for alleged criminality with Anne Boleyn, was summoned to parliament as Baron Norris of Ryeccote. He was the father of the distinguished military commander, Sir John Norris. His grandson, Francis, was created Earl of Berkshire in 1620-21, but died two years later, and the Berkshire peerage expired. The Norris peerage descended by the female line to James Bertie, who was created Earl of Abingdon in 1682. This nobleman, as lord-lieutenant of Oxfordshire, commanded the local militia against the Duke of Monmouth on the latter's invasion of England. He, however, opposed James II's action in religious matters, and was the first English peer to join William.

Abjuration Oath, THE (1701), was a pledge of renunciation of the exiled Stuart dynasty, exacted from time to time after the Revolution of 1688. It first appears in 1690, embodied in a proposed "Act for the further security of his Majesty's person, and for extinguishing the hopes of the pretended Prince of Wales, and all other pretenders and their abettors." Every person who held any office, civil, military, or spiritual, was solemnly to abjure the exiled king; the oath of abjuration might be tendered by any justice of the peace to any subject of their majesties; and, if it were refused, the recusant might be sent to prison, to lie there as long as he continued obstinate. The influence of William caused this bill to be rejected, as well as a less severe measure, imposing a declaration on all office-holders that they would stand by William and Mary against James and James's adherents. In the last year of the reign, after Louis XIV had acknowledged the Pretender, it was again introduced in the "Act for the further security of his Majesty's person, and the succession of the crown in the Protestant line." After a long debate in the Commons, the abjuration oath was made compulsory; but the provision was only carried by a majority of one. William gave his assent to the measure on his death-bed. On the accession of Anne a new act was passed, applying the oath to the new reign. The oath was taken freely by the Tories, and even by noted Jacobites, the Pretender having, it was said, sent instructions to that effect to his adherents. It was renewed on the occasion of the union with Scotland, when the Scottish clergy petitioned against it, but without result. The bill was subsequently re-introduced on the accession of George I, and on the death of the Old Pretender (1766). The oath was not finally abolished until 1858 [when it was amalgamated with the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. The act of 1858 was superseded in 1863 by the Promissory Oaths Act]. [L. C. S.]

Abjuration Oath for Scotland, THE (1662), was imposed on all persons holding public office, and consisted, among other abjurations, of a declaration that the Covenant and League "are of themselves unlawful oaths, and were taken by and imposed upon the subjects of this kingdom against the fundamental laws and liberties of the same." The oath was modified in 1716, when it became a simple declaration of allegiance to the Hanover settlement and a renunciation of the Stuarts. [COVENANT.]

Abjuration of the Realm, THE OATH OF, was the oath to quit the country, exacted from any felon who had taken advantage of the privilege of sanctuary, and refused to stand his trial. Such a person was bound to leave the kingdom within a specified period, and if he returned he might be put to death. The practice was finally abolished, in company with the privilege of sanctuary, by 21 James I, cap. 28. [SANCTUARY.] Abjuration was known as a definite punishment in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Thus, according to the Assizes of Clarendon and Northampton (q.v.), both those who failed in the ordeal, and those who were successful—if they were of ill repute or were charged with a serious offence—were to abjure the realm. By statutes passed in 1593 (35 Eliz. c. 1 and 2) Protestant dissenters who had failed to attend divine service, and Roman Catholics, might be compelled to abjure the realm, and if they refused, or returned without licence, they were adjudged felons, and might be hanged. Dissenters were relieved of the necessity of abjuration by the Act of Toleration (1689), but as regards Roman Catholics, it was not finally removed from the statute book till 1791.

Absenteeism, owing to the character of the Anglo-Norman conquest of Ireland, and the lapse of many great Irish fiefs to English baronial houses, early became a crying evil in that country. In 1331, Edward III, intent upon the re-anglicization and de-feudalization of Ireland, ordered all absentees either to return to their estates or to furnish garrisons for their defence. When Lionel of Clarence was sent out in 1361, sixty-four absentee lords were ordered to accompany him. In 1374, too, they were called upon to go in person or to send substitutes. In 1379 the English parliament passed a statute ordering all proprietors who were absentees to contribute two-thirds of their means to the defence of Ireland. In the fifteenth century legislation against absenteeism was also frequent. The problem was rendered yet more acute as a result of the wholesale confiscations of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and by the beginning of the eighteenth century it was estimated that the rental spent by the absentee landlords in England amounted to between £600,000 and £1,200,000 per annum. Accordingly in 1727 an absentee-tax of four shillings in the pound was imposed on all moneys paid out of Ireland; but the king being allowed to grant exemptions, it did not do much good. In 1769 this law was renewed and the exemptions done away with, or at least, only maintained for members of the royal family and distinguished officers. But an attempt to increase the tax in 1773 had to be given up, owing to the opposition it aroused in England. In 1783 a like attempt failed in Ireland. In 1796 an absentee-tax was defeated in the Irish parliament by English influence, and after that no such measure was mooted, though the evil continued to increase. In 1779 Arthur Young estimated the amount of rent annually sent out of the country at £732,000.

Abyssinian Expedition, THE (1867). Theodore, King of Abyssinia, fancying that he was slighted by the British government, who had refused to assist him against the Egyptians, had seized and imprisoned in his fortress of Magdala all the British subjects within his reach. Among others was Mr. Cameron, British consul at Massawa. An embassy sent to the king was eventually seized and imprisoned with the rest. Lord Stanley's remonstrance being disregarded, war was declared. It was waged from India, and the expedition was dispatched from Bombay in the winter of 1867 under Sir Robert Napier. The campaign was conducted under difficulties, which arose from the varying nature of the climate and the natural impediments of the ground. Little resistance was experienced from the natives. Theodore, at last, sent back all the prisoners, and offered to treat. Napier, however, refused to listen to any terms short of a total surrender, and to this the king refused to agree. He shut himself up in his citadel of Magdala, which was perched upon a lofty rock, and defended not only by the natural difficulty of the ascent, but also fortified. The British surmounted the difficulties of the ascent, forced their way through the gate at the top, and fought from post to post till the position was won, April 13, 1868. Theodore was found dead inside the gate, slain by his own hand. The town and fortress were destroyed, and within a week the troops were returning home.

Acre, or ST. JEAN D'ACRE, a town on the coast of Syria, anciently called Ptolemais, is connected with three episodes in English history:—(1) THE SIEGE OF ACRE. In June 1191 Richard I arrived before the town, which had already been besieged by the Crusaders for more than two years, with the loss, it is said, of over 120,000 men. A series of assaults was immediately made on the town, but these were seriously impeded by the attacks of Saladin on the Christian lines. At length, however, the garrison offered to treat; they were allowed to retain their lives, and (July 12) the Crusaders marched into the town. (2) THE DEFENCE OF ACRE. On March 16, 1799, Bonaparte's Egyptian army appeared before Acre. The town was held by a Turkish garrison, under Yusuf Pasha, aided by Sir Sidney Smith, who commanded the English squadron in the roads, and a French engineer, Phélippeaux, who had once been a schoolfellow of Bonaparte. Animated by these leaders, the Turks held out with great bravery for sixty days of open trenches; and on May 20 the French were compelled to retreat. "That miserable fort," as Napoleon called it, was thus the means of causing his Syrian expedition to be abandoned, and his great projects of Oriental conquest to be altogether hopeless. Alluding to Sir Sidney Smith, he is said to have frequently remarked: "That man made me miss my destiny." (3) THE BOMBARDMENT OF ACRE, November 3, 1840. After the refusal of Mehemet Ali to agree to the terms of the Quadrilateral Alliance, 1840, a combined Austrian, Turkish, and British squadron (the latter, consisting of 6 line-of-battle ships, and 10 smaller vessels, commanded by Admiral Sir R. Stopford) sailed to the coast of Syria, and bombarded Acre, which fell in ruins after enduring a tremendous fire for three hours.

Act of Parliament. [STATUTES.]

Acton Burnel, THE SO-CALLED "PARLIAMENT" OF (1283). In 1283 Edward I summoned to Shrewsbury an assembly of lay magnates, representatives of the shires, and deputies of certain towns and boroughs to pronounce judgment upon David of Wales. Later the magnates adjourned to the seat of Edward's great minister, Robert Burnel, where was promulgated, at a session of the king's council, the famous Statute of Merchants (q.v.).

Adamnan, St. (c. 624-704), Abbot of Iona, was converted, while on a mission to Aldfrid of Northumbria in 686, to the custom of the Roman Church with regard to the celebration of Easter—a conversion which embroiled him in disputes with the monks of Iona. He paid three visits to Ireland, during one of which he successfully urged, on part of the Irish Church, the necessity of conformity to the Roman paschal observances. Adamnan wrote in Latin the "Life of St. Columba," which although containing some elements of legend, is the great authority for the history of the old Celtic Church. He also wrote "De Locis Sanctis."

"Adamnani Vita S. Columbæ," ed. J. T. Fowler, 1920.

Adamson, PATRICK (1537-92), Archbishop of St. Andrews, was educated in France, and returned to Scotland in 1571[?], when he entered the ministry. In 1575 he was one of the commissioners employed to settle the constitution of the Church of Scotland, and soon after was appointed by the Regent Morton Archbishop of St. Andrews. His life thenceforward was a long course of opposition to the Presbyterian party, who lost no opportunity of taking proceedings against him, and finally succeeded in getting him excommunicated (1588) and deprived of the revenues of his see, so that, it is said, his last years were passed in actual want. He was the author of a poetical version of the Book of Job, and other works in Latin verse.

Addington, HENRY, VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH (1757-1844), the son of Anthony Addington, Lord Chatham's family physician, was called to the bar about the same time as Pitt, whose intimate friend he was. By Pitt he was persuaded to leave the bar, and to turn his attention to political life. He was accordingly returned to parliament as member for Devizes, 1784, and soon became conspicuous as a devoted follower of Pitt. In 1789 he was elected Speaker, and presided over the House until, on Pitt's resignation in 1801, he was invited by the king to form an administration. It was very feeble, and would scarcely have lived a month if Pitt had not for a time given it his protection and advice. Addington's ministry was chiefly signalized by the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens (q.v.); but when Pitt withdrew his support, the utter weakness of the cabinet became very clear, and Addington was forced to make way for his former leader. There was now a complete breach between the two, and Addington, who had been created Viscount Sidmouth, attacked Lord Melville, and through him the prime minister, with great vehemence. After Pitt's death, Addington became president of the council in the Grenville and Fox administration. In the ministry of Perceval and the Duke of Portland he had no place; but, when Lord Liverpool came into office in 1812, he was appointed home secretary. In this position his repressive policy, and the hostility he showed to popular movements, made him remarkably unpopular with the nation at large; but he maintained his post for several years, until he resigned it to Sir Robert Peel, 1821, after which he took but little share in politics. His administration has been described by Macaulay as one which, in an age pre-eminently fruitful of parliamentary talents, contained hardly a single man who, in parliamentary talents, could be considered as even of the second rate. "He was," the same writer says, "universally admitted to have been the best Speaker that had sat in the chair since the retirement of Onslow. But nature had not bestowed on him very vigorous faculties," and his long occupation of the chair had unfitted him for the task of heading an administration.

Addison, JOSEPH (1672-1719), essayist, poet, and Whig statesman, first achieved fame by the publication in 1704 of his Campaign, a poem on the battle of Blenheim, written at the request of Godolphin. Henceforth his rise was rapid. He became commissioner of appeals, secretary to the legation at Hanover, and in 1706 under-secretary of state. In 1708 he entered parliament as member for Lostwithiel. In the autumn of the same year, Lord Wharton, the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, appointed him his chief secretary and keeper of the records. From Ireland Addison sent his contributions to the Tatler, the first of the periodical publications which his friend Steele projected. On the fall of the Whigs in 1711, Addison was dismissed from office. During the general election he contributed some violent party papers to a political journal, entitled the Whig Examiner. In March 1711 the Spectator appeared, under the conduct of Steele, and during the years of its existence (March 1711–December 1714), Addison was the principal contributor. On the death of Anne, Addison was made secretary to the lords of the regency. On the accession of George I, he again became chief secretary to the lord-lieutenant. In 1715 he published the “Freeholder,” the best of his political writings; and in 1717 he became secretary of state. But his health was failing, and he finally quitted office in 1718, with a pension of £1,500 a year. In 1719 his defence of the Peerage Bill involved him in a quarrel with Steele, whom he attacked in a party journal called the Old Whig. This was the last of Addison’s literary efforts. He died June 17, 1719, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Addison’s importance in the political history of England is not great, though he held high office, and his personal career was remarkably successful. In principles he was a strict Whig of a somewhat narrow cast; and in the schism which took place in 1717 it is notable that he supported the “old Whigs,” Sunderland and Stanhope, against the more progressive section of the party which Walpole headed. It is as an essayist that he won his title to fame.

The “Works” of Addison were published in six volumes, with Notes by Bishop Hurd in 1811. There is a good “Life” by Miss Aikin, published in 1843, and a lengthy memoir in the “Biographia Britannica.” The famous character of Addison, under the name of Atticus, in Pope’s “Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot,” and Macaulay’s account of the relations between Addison and Steele in his essay on the former are well known. See also “Dictionary of National Biography,” and biography by W. J. Courthope, 1884. [S. L.]

Addled Parliament was the name given to the parliament which sat from April 5 to June 7, 1614. No parliament had been in session since 1611; but in 1614 the condition of the finances, and the unwillingness of the people to pay the customs levied by the king without the sanction of parliament, made it essential to assemble one. James hoped that, by employing “undertakers” (q.v.) or intermediaries, between himself and the Commons, he might obtain a considerable grant in return for the renunciation of some small portions of the royal prerogative. But when parliament met, it showed itself determined not to grant any supplies until the king’s claim to levy impositions had been surrendered. Finding that the Commons persisted in their determination to make redress of grievances precede grants of supply, James dissolved parliament before a single statute had been passed, and committed the leaders of the opposition to prison.

Addresses to the Crown are (1) from parliament, (2) from the people.

(1) Since the time of Edward I, parliament has exercised the privilege which it inherited from the Great Council of the baronage, of freely offering its advice to the Crown, and demanding the abolition of grievances. Nearly all the legislation of the fourteenth century is based upon the petitions of parliament. From the reign of Henry VI, the petitions and addresses began to assume the form of actual statutes, and were called bills. In later history, parliament asserted its right to address the Crown on subjects of wider policy, such as the settlement of the succession under Elizabeth, and recommendations to the queen to marry (1562 and 1566); whilst advice on questions of peace and war has often been tendered to the Crown by parliament. Thus the House of Commons presented a remonstrance against the continuance of the American war, and on receiving an unsatisfactory answer, declared that it would “consider as enemies to his Majesty and this country all who should advise or by any means attempt the further prosecution of offensive war on the continent of America, for the purpose of reducing the revolted colonies to obedience by force.” Addresses to the Crown are always moved in both Houses in answer to the royal speech at the beginning of the session; and the debate upon the address has become the formal opportunity for approving or challenging the ministerial policy put forward in the royal speech. (2) Addresses from individuals have been offered to the king from the earliest times, usually in the form of petitions for pardons, or redress of private grievances; and though these petitions were subsequently usually made to the House of Commons, they were occasionally laid at once before the sovereign himself, as in the case of the petition of the clergy in 1344. The practice of addressing the Crown on political matters had, however, no precedent until the time of Charles I (1640), and in 1662 was restrained by an act against tumultuous petitioning. In 1679 the Whig petitions for the assembling of parliament were met on the part of the Tories by counter-addresses from the Abhorrrers (q.v.). In 1701 petitions were presented, praying for the dissolution of parliament, and again in 1710; whilst in 1784 numerous addresses to the king set forth that the people were willing to support Mr. Pitt and the prerogative. The constitutional character of the addresses of 1710 was supported by a vote of the House of Commons, which affirmed “that it is the undoubted right of the people of England to petition or address the king for the calling, sitting, and dissolving parliaments, and for the redressing of grievances." [CROWN; PARLIAMENT.]

Adelaide, QUEEN (1792 - 1849), the daughter of George, Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Meiningen, was married to the Duke of Clarence, 1818. On the accession of the Duke of Clarence as William IV, a bill was passed [REGENCY BILLS] appointing her regent, in case any child of the king's succeeded him during minority. She scrupulously abstained from interfering in politics; but in spite of this, the dissolution of the Melbourne cabinet in 1834 was attributed to her influence. After the accession of Queen Victoria, her life was chiefly spent in works of charity and benevolence.

Adelais of Louvain (d. 1151 ?) was the second wife of Henry I, to whom she was married in 1121. She survived her husband, and subsequently married William de Albini, ancestor of the family of Howard.

Aden, an important military position on the south-west coast of Arabia, was taken by the British in 1839, and, in spite of attacks made upon it by the Arabs, has ever since remained under British rule. Its position gives it a great importance as a coal- ing station for the Indo-European steamers. Aden is governed by a resident, and forms part of the Bombay presidency.

Adjutators, THE (usually styled AGITATORS), were representatives elected by each regiment of the New Model army in 1647, to act in concert with the officers in compelling parliament to satisfy the demands of the army before disbanding it. They presented a petition to parliament, in which they complained of "the ambition of a few men, who had long been servants, but were degenerating into tyrants." The parliament, finding it impossible any longer to refuse to listen to the demands of the army, sent a committee, consisting of Cromwell, Ireton, Skippon, and Fleetwood, to head-quarters to pacify the soldiers. But the army mutinied, seized the money intended for their pay, and expelled the officers whom they suspected. On May 29 a great meeting of Adjutators, under the authority of Fairfax, was held at Bury St. Edmunds, and a rendezvous of all the troops called at Newmarket. On June 2 the army leaders sent Cornet Joyce to remove the king out of the hands of the parliament. This having been done, on June 10 a great rendezvous of the army was held at Thriplow Heath, near Cambridge. Here the army refused to accept the conditions of parliament, demanded the dismissal of eleven of the most obnoxious Presbyterian leaders, and began to march on London. On the approach of the army the eleven withdrew, and the Independents became for a time the majority in the House. But the City of London was strongly Presbyterian, and on July 26 a large muster of apprentices and others came into the House, and compelled the recall of the eleven members and the replacing of the London militia in the hands of the Presbyterians. Thereupon the army, which had been encamped close to London, entered the city (August 8) and again expelled the eleven members. The power was now entirely in the hands of the army, and the Adjutators were busy holding meetings, and urging forward extreme measures, and demanding vengeance on the king. Cromwell and the officers began to grow anxious to restore discipline in the army, and when some of the regiments showed signs of acting independently, vigorous measures were taken, one of the ringleaders shot, and others placed under arrest. Lilburne and others attempted to revive the Adjutators in 1649; but the attempt was frustrated by Cromwell. [CROMWELL; FAIRFAX.]

O. H. Firth, "Cromwell," 19 . [F. S. P.]

Admiral, THE LORD HIGH, was one of the great officers of state who was specially concerned with the government of the navy and the administration of maritime affairs. The name is derived from an Asiatic word corresponding to the Arabic Amir, and the Turkish Emir, a commander or general; and it was probably adopted by the English either directly from the Saracens, in the course of the later Crusades, or from the Sicilians or Genoese. We hear of the appointment of officers called "custodes maris" from time to time under the Norman and earlier Angevin kings, but the definite organization of the admiralty dates from the reign of Edward I, who in 1294 appointed William de Leybourne "captain of all the postmen," and in 1306 appointed three admirals, with jurisdiction over the eastern, western, and southern coasts respectively. In 1360 a single high admiral was first appointed. From 1404 till 1632 there was an uninterrupted succession of lord high admirals of England, whose duties were not only to act as naval commanders-in-chief, but also as ministers of marine and presidents of the Court of Admiralty. In 1632 the duties of the office were entrusted to a commission of the great officers of state; and under the Commonwealth naval affairs were managed by a committee of parliament, and afterwards by Cromwell. After the Restoration, the office of lord high admiral was held by King Charles II, and by James, as Duke of York and as king, and by Prince George of Denmark, the husband of Queen Anne. Since 1708, however, the office has always been in commission, with the exception of a short period (May 1827-September 1828), when the Duke of Clarence, afterwards King William IV, was lord high admiral. By the Acts 2 Will. and Mary, c. 2, and 1 Geo. iv. c. 90, the authorities, jurisdiction, and powers of the lord high admiral were vested in the lords commissioners of the admiralty. The chief of these commissioners is styled the first lord of the admiralty. In modern times he has become practically sole and responsible minister for the navy, and is now always a member of the cabinet. In 1869, Mr. Childers, then first lord of the admiralty, introduced important changes into the working of the department which tended to give the minister more undivided control and responsibility. The personnel of the board of admiralty was increased as a result of the Great War. The original number of members, six, was increased to ten: the first lord (generally a civilian), four naval lords, one civil lord, a deputy and an assistant chief of staff, a financial secretary, and a permanent secretary. The title of ADMIRAL has also been used continuously since the thirteenth century to designate the highest grade in the Royal Navy; but it does not appear to have come into general use in this sense till the latter part of the sixteenth century. There were formerly three classes of admirals, those of the Red, the White, and the Blue squadrons, but this distinction was abolished in 1864. [NAVY.]

Admiralty, BOARD OF. [ADMIRAL, THE LORD HIGH.]

Admiralty, COURT OF, is the court of the lord high admiral in his judicial capacity. The early admirals and custodes maris, from the time of Henry I onwards, had the prerogative of judging on all disputes between merchants and sailors, and on all offences committed on the high seas, out of the jurisdiction of the Common Law Courts. These privileges provoked the jealousy of the common lawyers, and, in 13 Rich. II, a statute was passed strictly limiting its procedure to matters transacted on the seas, and this statute was enforced by one passed two years later. When there was a lord high admiral the judge of the Admiralty Court was generally appointed by him; when the office is in commission he is appointed by the Crown. The criminal jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court is now no longer exercised, and offences committed on the high seas are tried at Common Law. By an act of the reign of Henry VIII, all such offences were to be tried by commissioners of oyer and terminer under the great seal, and according to the law of the land. When the Central Criminal Court was established in 1834, the judges were authorized to decide on all offences committed within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. The civil jurisdiction of the court is important, and, by 3 and 4 Vict. c. 65, comprehends all causes arising out of questions of the title to, or ownership of, vessels, maritime contracts, salvage, and cases of collisions and damages on the high seas. By the Judicature Act of 1873, the Admiralty Court was united with the Court of Probate and Divorce to form one division of the Supreme Court of Judicature. At the breaking out of war, a commission is issued to the judge of the Admiralty Court constituting him president of a Prize Court, to decide as to what is, or what is not, lawful prize. Property captured from the enemy is held not to have absolutely ceased to belong to its former owner till condemned by the sentence of a Prize Court. The proceedings in this court are supposed to be conducted according to the law of nations, and the decisions of its judges, and notably of Lord Stowell during the early years of the French revolutionary war, form very important contributions to international law. Courts of Vice-Admiralty, having analogous powers to the Admiralty Court, are established in most of the British colonies. The chief justice of the colony is ex-officio judge of this court, and there is an appeal from his decision to the judicial committee of the privy council. The ADMIRALTY COURT for Scotland retained its separate existence at the Union, though the Scottish lord high admiral was abolished. In 1831 the Scottish Admiralty Courts were abolished, and their functions entrusted to the Courts of Session and Justiciary. [NAVY.]

For the early history of the Admiralty, the best authority is "The Black Book of the Admiralty," a most important collection of documents bearing on the subject, chiefly in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, with the valuable prefaces of Sir Travers Twiss in the Rolls Series, 1871, etc. See especially the Editor's introduction to vol. ii. Among other matters of interest, the Black Book contains a transcript of the "Laws of Oleron," issued by Richard I at that town, which formed the basis of the maritime jurisprudence of all the western nations. See also Rymer's "Foedera", Pepsys's "Naval Collections"; "A Treatise on the Sea Laws," 1724; J. Exton, "Maritime Digest," 1746; Sir Harris Nicolas, "History of the British Navy"; Knight's "Political Cyclopædia," art. Admiralty; and Stephens's "Commentaries on the Laws of England." [S. L.]

Admonition, THE, 1588. A book entitled "An Admonition to the Nobility and People of England and Ireland, concerning the present wars made from the execution of his Holiness' sentence, by the high and mightie King Catholike of Spain," was issued by Cardinal Allen, in order to advocate the Spanish invasion of England, and to declare the papal sentence of excommunication against Elizabeth. It is a document full of gross and offensive attacks on the queen, and may be considered as one of the most indecent political libels that have ever appeared. The effect of the "Admonition" was to disgust not only all Protestants, but also a great many Catholics. The style is so unlike the usual manner of Cardinal Allen that it has often been attributed to the pen of the Jesuit Parsons; but whoever was its real author, it was signed and acknowledged by Allen.

The "Admonition" was reprinted with a preface by Rev. J. Mendham, 1842.

Admonition to the Parliament, AN, 1571, the work of two Nonconformists, named Field and Wilcox, was presented to parliament by Thomas Cartwright. The object of the pamphlet, which was written in a spirit of intolerance and defiance, was the complete abolition of episcopacy. A second "Admonition" was also published by Cartwright (who was supported by Leicester), and spread over the country. An elaborate answer was written by Archbishop Whitgift, and Field and Wilcox were committed to Newgate.

Adrian IV, POPE (d. 1159), was the only Englishman who has occupied the papal chair. His name was Nicholas Breakspear. He was born probably at Langley in Hertfordshire, c. 1100, studied in France, and finally entered the monastery of St. Rufus in Provence, of which he became abbot. In 1146 he was created a cardinal, and later was sent as papal legate to Norway. In 1154 he was chosen pope. His pontificate was disturbed by the attempt of Arnold of Brescia, whom he succeeded in arresting and executing (1155). Adrian is memorable in European history as beginning the long and bitter quarrel between the popes and the Hohenstaufen emperors. In English history his chief interest lies in his grant to Henry II of the sovereignty of Ireland in 1155, which was claimed by the popes under the spurious "Donation of Constantine." That the investiture took place there can be little doubt, since the story rests on the authority of John of Salisbury; but the authenticity of the so-called "Bull Laudabiliter" is more open to question, and has given rise to much controversy. For a full discussion of the points at issue see Round, "Commune of London"; and, on the other side, Orpen, "Ireland Under the Normans" and the "Catholic Encyclopedia," art. Adrian IV.

Adullamites (1866) was a name derivatively applied to those Liberals, about forty in number, who opposed the majority of their party on Earl Russell's proposal for a further reform of parliament. Their leaders were Robert Lowe (q.v.), Edward Horsman, and Lord Elcho. John Bright, on March 13, compared this party to the assembly which came to the cave of Adullam, when David called about him everyone that was in distress and everyone that was discontented. The defection of the Adullamites led to the overthrow of Lord Russell's ministry.

Adventurers. [MERCHANT ADVENTURERS.]

Adventurers of 1642, THE. The English parliament having confiscated between two and three millions of acres in Ireland, in consequence of the rebellion of 1641, debenture bonds were issued made payable in land after the reconquest of the country. About a million acres were thus disposed of, the original idea being that the money thus obtained should actually be employed in suppressing the rebellion; but the outbreak of civil war in England prevented this. When in 1653 the conquest was finally accomplished, the counties of Limerick, Tipperary, and Waterford, in Munster; King's and Queen's County, East and West Meath, in Leinster; Down, Antrim, and Armagh, in Ulster, were set aside for satisfying these claims, and those of the Puritan soldiery. Many of these Adventurers were subsequently deprived of a large portion of their lands by the Act of Settlement and Explanation in 1665, and a considerable number emigrated to America.

J. A. Froude, "English in Ireland," 1872-4.

"Advertisements" (1566) was the name of a book of discipline issued by Archbishop Parker. It marks the beginnings of the persecutions of the Puritan clergy, and has in recent times excited much controversy. The archbishop had previously endeavoured in vain to induce Cecil to consent to an official promulgation of these "advertisements"; but as Cecil was not anxious to provoke opposition by too rigid an execution of the Act of Uniformity, he had refused to authorize or publish them, and Parker was consequently left to issue them on his own responsibility. Their title ran: "Advertisements partly for due order in the public administration of Common Prayer and using of the Holy Sacraments, and partly for the apparel of all persons ecclesiastical, by virtue of the Queen's Majesty's letter commanding the same." The points especially insisted on were the wearing of the surplice and cap; and generally they enforced rigid obedience to the more obnoxious portions of the Act of Uniformity. Much controversy has arisen as to the precise validity of these Advertisements. On the one side it has been maintained that the royal authorization gave binding force to the archbishop's injunctions, and that they were the "other order" which the Act of Uniformity of 1559 half anticipated as likely to supersede the "Ornaments Rubric," which enjoined that church ornaments should remain as in the second year of Edward VI. This view, which was adopted by Lord Selborne in the "Ridsdale Case," has been attacked by Mr. J. Parker in his "Ornaments Rubric," where it is maintained that the Advertisements were simple archiepiscopal injunctions, and that their enforcement of a minimum of ritual did not aim at abolishing the vestments, etc., of Edward VI's First Prayer Book.

Advertisements, DUTY ON. Advertisements in newspapers appear to have first come into use during the period of the Commonwealth, the first being, it is said, an announcement of an heroic poem on the death of Cromwell. Advertisements became common during the latter half of the seventeenth century, and in the reign of William III a gratuitous paper of advertisements was started and existed for some time. By an act of 1712, a duty was imposed on each advertisement published. In 1833 the tax was reduced from 3s. 6d. in Great Britain, and 2s. 6d. in Ireland, to 1s. 6d. in the former and 1s. in the latter country. In 1851 the tax brought in over £175,000. The duty was abolished in 1853.

Advocate, THE LORD, also called the King's or Queen's Advocate, is the chief law officer of the Crown in Scotland, and corresponds, roughly speaking, to the English attorney-general. The king's advocate is found in existence in 1483, in 1540 he became one of the officers of state, and in 1587 he is first mentioned as lord advocate. The origin of the office is extremely obscure; it has been supposed that, with the title, it was derived from the French; and the duties of the earlier kings' advocates, of whom there is a fairly full list from 1483, are equally ill-defined. They appear to have been comprised in the prosecution of state officers, and the inquiry into the extent of the feudal forfeitures arising from those offences. In the middle of the sixteenth century it is possible to gain a clearer idea of his functions; the lord advocate was public prosecutor, he conducted all cases in which the sovereign was concerned, which, from the reign of Queen Mary, have been pursued in his name, and in the latter part of the century appears occasionally to have combined the offices of advocate and judge in the Court of Session. Previous to the Union, the lord advocate sat in parliament in virtue of his office; but now he is not necessarily, though he is generally, a member of the Lower House. He is appointed by the Crown, and tenders his resignation when the administration changes. When the Duke of Newcastle abolished the office of secretary of state for Scotland in the reign of George II the duties of that minister were transferred to the lord advocate. In parliament he answers all questions relating to Scotland, and undertakes all measures of Scottish legislation; but he is not a member of the privy council, and is called right honourable by courtesy only. Outside parliament he acts as public prosecutor, in which duties he is assisted by the solicitor-general and four advocates-depute, and appears for the Crown in all civil cases. His warrants for searching, apprehending, and imprisoning run in any part of Scotland; he is allowed to sit within the bar of the Court of Session, a privilege enjoyed by peers of the realm.

Advowson is the right of presentation to an ecclesiastical benefice. The word is taken from Lat. advocatio, for he who held the advowson was the protector or patron of the church. In the early Anglo-Saxon period the clergy administered only "pro tempore" in the parochial churches, receiving their maintenance from the cathedral church; and all appointments within the diocese lay with the bishops. By the end of the eighth century, however, the great lords were beginning increasingly to build and endow churches, and to such it was permitted to nominate, subject to the bishop's consent, their own resident priests, to whom the revenue of the church was appropriated. Originally the right of nominating or presenting was vested in the person by whom the church was founded, but gradually it became annexed to the manor in which the church was built. Such are advowsons appendant. Where, as is often the case, the right of presentation has been sold by itself, and thus separated from the ownership of land, it is called an advowson in gross. English law recognizes two types of advowson: (i) presentative, where the patron has the right of presenting a clerk to the bishop for institution; (ii) collative, where the bishop himself is patron. Until the Benefices Act of 1898 there existed a third type—the donative—where the patron, by royal foundation or licence, had the right to present without reference to the bishop. An advowson is considered in law as an incorporeal hereditament. Formerly, advowsons and the power of exercising the right of presentation for one or more terms were saleable, subject to some restrictions. They might be mortgaged, in which case the mortgagee presented, but on the nomination of the mortgagor. The law of simony, which, as far as temporal courts are concerned, is founded on 31 Elizabeth, c. 6, and 13 Anne, c. 11, forbade a clergyman to purchase a next presentation for himself; but he might purchase an advowson and be presented on the next vacancy. Within recent years, however, the law relating to advowsons has been greatly modified. The Benefices Act of 1898 severely curtailed the right of owners of advowsons and next presentations to transfer them, and laid down more rigid regulations as to the qualifications to be demanded from a presentee. The Benefices Act (1898) Amendment Measure, passed by the Church Assembly in 1923, went much further. It provided that patronage rights should be incapable of sale after the next two vacancies; prohibited the presentation of a clergyman by himself, his wife, or any other interested party; and made impossible for the future the mortgaging of advowsons. If a patron neglects to exercise his right the presentation lapses at the end of six months to the bishop, the archbishop, and the Crown successively. No Roman Catholic may present, either in person or by his trustees; but the presentation vests in one or other of the two ancient universities, according to the geographical situation of the benefice. The bishop is bound to institute the clerk presented by the patron unless there is good cause to the contrary. The remedy for disturbance of patronage was anciently by an action of dernier presentment. The procedure now is by an action of quare impedit in the temporal court; by a suit of duplex querela in the spiritual court; or by jus patronatus—a process instituted by the bishop at the request of either patron or presentee. The act of 1898 provided an alternative mode of appeal in all cases, save those in which doctrine or ritual were concerned, to a court composed of the archbishop of the province and a judge of the High Court nominated "ad hoc" by the lord chancellor.

Afghan Wars. (1) Situated in immediate proximity to the N.W. frontier of India, Afghanistan has, from the earliest times, figured conspicuously in the history of Hindustan and of Central Asia. Its first connexion with English history dates from the year 1809, when the rumour of a joint invasion of India, determined on by Napoleon and the Tsar Alexander, led to the dispatch of the Hon. M. Elphinstone as envoy to Shah Shuja, then ruler of Kabul. A treaty was concluded between the two at Peshawar. In 1834, Shah Shuja, who had been dethroned, endeavoured to regain his power, and advanced on Kandahar, but was defeated by Dost Mohammed, ruler of Kabul, and Kohandil Khan, who reigned at Kandahar. He took refuge eventually with Nasir Khan, of Kalat, who enabled him to return to Ludhiana. In 1837, the siege of Herat, by Persia, encouraged, as believed, by the Russians, and the defeat of the Sikhs by Dost Mohammed, led the British to dispatch Burnes as resident at the court of Kabul. The resolution was formed of placing the ex-king, Shah Shuja, on the Afghan throne. An army of 21,000 men was assembled on the Indus (January 16, 1839), and, advancing on Kandahar, took possession of that city, where Shah Shuja was crowned on May 8. Ghazni fell next, the gate of the city being blown in by Lieutenant (afterwards General Sir Henry) Durand. Dost Mohammed fled, and the British entered Kabul without opposition. Shah Shuja's restoration was at first popular, but the people soon began to gather in insurrection. On November 2, 1841, rebellion broke out, and Sir Alexander Burnes and other officers were assassinated; and on January 6, 1842, the British garrison of 4,500, with nearly three times that number of camp followers, proceeded to evacuate the country, but perished miserably in the mountain passes between Kabul and Jalalabad, a single survivor, Dr. Brydon, alone reaching the latter city. Ghazni fell to the Afghans on December 10. Kandahar and Jalalabad, however, were held firmly by Generals Nott and Sale respectively. A strong expedition, under General Pollock, was prepared in India, and after forcing the Khaibar Pass relieved Jalalabad. After halting two months, General Pollock advanced and inflicted a severe defeat on Mohammed Akbar

Khan, entering Kabul a few days later. Soon after the departure of our troops Shah Shuja was assassinated, and Dost Mohammed Khan was restored to his former power. During the Sikh revolt, in 1848, he joined against the British, but a friendly understanding was arrived at and a treaty concluded in 1855. The same year saw the acquisition of the Kandahar province by Dost Mohammed, and the second Persian advance on Herat; its capture and final cession, through fear of the British, who had sent an expedition to the Persian Gulf, are the subsequent events of note.

(2) Shere Ali Khan, who ascended the Afghan throne in 1863, eventually overcame his rivals and foes in 1868. An arrangement was arrived at between the British and Russian governments in 1872 that Afghanistan was beyond the field of Russian influence, and the practical violation of this understanding in 1878, coupled with the repulse by the Afghans of a British mission, led to a fresh Afghan war. The victories at Ali Masjid and Paiwar, and the capture of Kandahar and Kalat-i-Ghilzai by Sir Donald Stewart, placed all the important vantage points of Eastern Afghanistan (Kabul excepted) in our hands. A treaty was concluded at Gandamak with Yakub Khan, who had succeeded to power on the death of his father, Shere Ali, but all its provisions were scattered to the winds by the murder of Sir Louis Cavagnari, who had been deputed as British envoy to Kabul. Sir Frederick (afterwards Lord) Roberts promptly advanced on the capital, and defeated the Afghans at Charasia. At the close of 1879, the total defeat of Mohammed Jan effectually dispersed the insurgents. But the approach of the Sirdar Ayub Khan from the side of Herat kindled anew the flames of rebellion. This pretender, having defeated General Burrows at Maiwand, proceeded to invest Kandahar, but was utterly routed in his turn by General Sir Frederick Roberts, who had effected the difficult march from Kabul with much skill and generalship. In September 1880, the British troops were withdrawn from the Kurram and Kabul valleys, and in the following April from Kandahar, leaving the government of the country in the hands of Abdur Rahman, whose authority as ruler of the country had been recognized by Britain in July 1880. After that date the Amir gradually established his power, remaining on excellent terms with Britain. The delimitation of the N. frontier led in 1885 to a collision between Russian and Afghan troops at Panjdeh, and almost to an Anglo-Russian war.

The chief authorities on Afghanistan are given in Sir Charles MacGregor's admirable "Gazetteer," published at Calcutta in 1871. The leading events of the subsequent campaigns are briefly chronicled in Robertson's "Three Campaigns in Afghanistan," 1881. For the later history cf. Wheeler, the "Ameer Abdurrahman," 1895; also H. Africa, BRITISH DOMINIONS IN. The British Dominions in Africa are as follows. Fuller information will be found elsewhere under the respective titles. (1) ANGLO-EGYPTIAN SUDAN; (2) EAST AFRICA, including Kenya, Somaliland, Tanganyika, Nyassaland, Uganda, and Zanzibar; (3) SOUTH AFRICA, including the Union of South Africa with Basutoland, Bechuanaland, Rhodesia, and Swaziland; (4) WEST AFRICA, including Gambia, Gold Coast, Lagos, Nigeria, and Sierra Leone. The following islands adjacent to Africa are sometimes classed among British African Dominions: Ascension, St. Helena, Tristan d'Acunha, Mauritius, Rodriguez, the Seychelles, the Amirante Islands, and Socotra.

Agadir Crisis, THE (1911), arose out of the Algeiras Conference of 1906 (q.v.) and the German policy of driving a wedge into the Triple Entente (q.v.). France, acting on the Algeiras agreement, landed troops in Morocco and occupied Fez. Germany replied in June 1911 by sending the gunboat Panther to Agadir "to protect the lives and interests of German subjects" in Morocco. France refused to recognize the German desire for a partition of Morocco. Great Britain supported her wholeheartedly, and the resolute speeches of Mr. Lloyd George (July 21) and Mr. Balfour in London checked the Kaiser's course. Negotiations were opened between France and Germany, and on November 4 a treaty was concluded vindicating the French Protectorate over Morocco and compensating Germany with half the French Congo. The equilibrium of the Mediterranean was preserved.

Agent-General is the name given to a representative in England of one of the self-governing British colonies. His duties are to look after the political and economic interests of his colony in London.

Aghrim, BATTLE OF (July 12, 1691), fought in the campaign between William III and James II, in Ireland, resulted in a victory, gained by Ginkel, over the Irish and French troops under St. Ruth.

See Biographies of William III.

Agincourt, BATTLE OF, fought October 25, 1415. Henry V, in attempting to regain the ground which Edward III had lost in his first campaign against France, took Harfleur, but finding his army greatly diminished by sickness, was unable to undertake any great expedition. He resolved to make his way to Calais through the hostile provinces of Normandy, Picardy, and Artois. His army consisted of about 6,000 men, of whom 5,000 were archers, and 900 men-at-arms. A French army three or four times as large was gathered under the Constable D'Albret, to cut them off. The English succeeded in crossing the Somme near Béthancourt on October 19, only to find that the French had mustered in force at Bapaume with the object of cutting off Henry's retreat to Calais. On the morning of the 25th the two armies confronted each other at the two ends of a narrow parallelogram shut in on either side by the orchards and enclosures of the villages of Agincourt and Framecourt, and traversed by the road to Calais. The French were drawn up in three battles ranged one behind the other. The first two fought on foot; the third was mounted ready for the pursuit. The confined nature of the ground gave no chance for the use of artillery, and the heavy-armed French were at a disadvantage in the soft ground, as compared with the light-armed English yeomen. The English were drawn up in the traditional three divisions, each being flanked by bowmen, so arranged as to command the whole field of battle, and protected by a four-fold line of stakes. Henry had hoped to fight on the defensive, but the refusal of the enemy to advance compelled him to make the first move. As soon as the French responded to his challenge, he halted his men. It was eleven o'clock when the order was given to the English to advance. The archers once more fixed their stakes in the ground so as to form a palisade from behind which they opened a deadly fire upon the French men-at-arms, who were unable to advance quickly in the soft ground, and fell in numbers. Finding themselves unsupported, they broke, and the English archers, seizing their hatchets and maces, rushed into their lines and cut them down or turned them to flight. Then, reinforced by the English men-at-arms, the archers attacked the second division of the French. Here the battle was fiercer and more equal. The Duke of Alençon on the French side, and Henry V on the English, fought desperately, and for two hours the victory was uncertain. At length Alençon was slain, and the French gave way. A cry was raised among the English that a new French army was coming up in their rear. In the panic Henry V gave orders that all prisoners should be slain. Many brave Frenchmen met their death before it was discovered that the supposed army was only a band of peasants who had collected to plunder. Meanwhile the third division of the French wavered, and, at last, fled. After three hours' fighting the victory of the English was assured. The French losses were very heavy. More than 5,000 men fell on the field, amongst them 1,500 nobles and knights. As a result of the battle, Henry was able to continue his march to Calais, and the superiority of the light-armed archer to the heavily burdened knight or man-at-arms was even more effectively demonstrated than at Poitiers.

Agra is a strong and ancient town on the river Jumna, in the North-West Provinces of India. It was formerly one of the chief cities of the Mogul dynasty, and in the wars of 1803 it was held by the Mahrattas, from whom it was captured by General Lake after a day's bombardment, and ceded to the British by Sindhia at the peace of Surge Anjangaon. Agra contains the famous Taj Mahal, a magnificent mausoleum built by Shah Jahan over the remains of his wife.

"Agreement of the People"

was one of John Lilburne's numerous pamphlets, and was published in 1648. It was received with great enthusiasm by the Levellers; and at a meeting held between Hertford and Ware, for the purpose of restoring discipline to the army, and satisfying the claims of the soldiers, a large number wore this pamphlet in their hats. Fairfax and Cromwell ordered them to remove the pamphlets. All the regiments except Lilburne's obeyed; and Cromwell, perceiving the necessity of at once stopping the insubordination, caused one of the ringleaders to be shot, and had all the others imprisoned. [LILBURNE; LEVELLERS.]

Agricola, GNEUS JULIUS (37-93), Roman governor of Britain (78-84), had, previous to his appointment, served in the island under Cerealis. During his governorship he endeavoured to subdue the tribes in the north, and to conciliate the Britons to the Roman rule by making them acquainted with the advantages of civilization. He encouraged them to come to the towns, and had many of the sons of the chiefs instructed in literature and science, and he succeeded so well "that they who had lately scorned to learn the Roman language were becoming fond of acquiring the Roman eloquence." In 78 he reduced Mona; in 79 he subdued the north of Britain to the Tweed; in 80 he advanced as far as the Firth of Tay; the year 81 was employed in constructing a chain of forts between the Clyde and the Forth; in the next year he explored the north-west part of the island, and planned a descent upon Ireland, but the rising of the Caledonians, under their chief Galgacus, prevented this project being carried out. After some severe fighting he defeated Galgacus, and thus subdued the whole island. In 84 he sailed round the island, and discovered the Orkneys; and in the same year he returned to Rome, where a triumph was decreed to him.

The Life of Agricola was written by his son-in-law, the historian Tacitus. The "Agricola" is the best extant account of the condition of Britain in the early part of the period of the Roman rule.

Agriculture. A certain amount of information will be found under other headings, particularly MANOR; COMMON LANDS, OPEN FIELDS AND ENCLOSURES, TITHES, HIDE, REEVE. The book lists there recommended should be consulted, whilst the following works are suggested for general reading:

Seeborn, "The Evolution of the English Farm"; Gras, "The Evolution of the English Corn Market" (not advised for preliminary work); Cunningham, "The Growth of English Industry and Commerce" (the first volume only); Hammond, "The Village Labourer, 1760-1832"; Hasbach, "The English Agricultural Labourer"; Levy, "Large and Small Holdings." In the narrative portion of Rogers's "History of Agriculture and Prices," which should be used with caution, much information will be found, ably treated by the hand of a master.

Ahmadnagar. A town of British India, capital of a province of the same name in the district of Gujarat. During the Mahratta war of 1803 General Wellesley invested and captured the town. It was restored to the Mahrattas at the end of the war; but in 1817, after the treaty of Poona, again passed into the hands of the British.

Aid. The term auxilium or aid had during the Middle Ages an exceedingly wide connotation. It may, indeed, be said to have applied to almost any kind of contribution the nature of which was theoretically voluntary, from whatsoever source it was derived. In a specialized sense, however, it was a feudal payment, having its origin in the acknowledged obligation of the tenant to render assistance to his lord in all emergencies, financial as well as military. It was in theory always a voluntary offering, dependent, Bracton tells us, upon the grace of the vassal and not upon the will of the lord; but actually the right of the lord to demand contributions on certain specific occasions secured early recognition, and a distinction was drawn between the "ordinary" levies, which ceased to be in any real sense voluntary, and the "extraordinary" levies, which retained, at least in theory, the character of an out-and-out gift. Glanvil, writing in the reign of Henry II, gives as the recognized occasions for the exaction of an aid, the payment by the lord of his relief, the marriage of the lord's eldest daughter, and the knighting of his eldest son; and discusses in addition the possibility of an aid to maintain the lord in his wars. By Magna Carta, however, the number of "ordinary" aids was finally fixed at three: viz., the aids to marry and to knight and the aid to ransom the lord when he was captured in warfare. Of the amount to be exacted the Charter of 1215 said no more than that it should be reasonable; but this deficiency was remedied in the case of mesne tenants by the Statute of Westminster I, which fixed the rate at twenty shillings from the knight's fee and from every twenty librates of socage land; and by 25 Edward III, stat. 5, c. 11, which extended this provision to aids levied by the Crown. An aid to ransom was levied only once in English history--viz., in 1193-4 in order to raise the money necessary to procure the release of Richard I from his German captivity. Aids to marry were imposed by Henry II in 1168, by Henry III in 1235 and 1245, by Edward I in 1302, and by Henry IV in 1401; and aids to knight by Henry III in 1253, and by Edward III in 1346. After the lapse of more than a century the claim of the Crown to the recognized feudal auxilia was revived by the first of the Tudor monarchs. In 1504 Henry VII placed before parliament a demand for an aid to knight his eldest son and to marry his eldest daughter, although Prince Arthur had been knighted on November 30, 1488, and was already two years dead, while the Princess Margaret had been married to the King of Scots as early as August 1502. Since a levy upon the traditional basis of the knight's fee was at that date obviously impossible, the Commons offered instead a subsidy of £40,000, which was graciously reduced by the king to £30,000. James I followed the example of his predecessor and exacted an aid to knight his son Prince Henry in 1609, and another to marry the Princess Elizabeth in 1612, on a basis of voluntary composition. The course of the ordinary feudal aids was by now, however, almost run, and they were finally abolished with military tenures by the statute of 1660.

In the meantime the "extraordinary" aid had been passing through a widely different process of development. It is scarcely too much to say that we may see in it the source of origin of our modern system of taxation and even of our representative institutions. "The evolution of a national parliament," it has been said, "is a logical consequence of the theory of the aid." The doctrine of consent was extended from purely feudal to national taxation, as soon as any form of exaction developed to which that term can legitimately be applied. The carucages and the taxes on movables of the Angevin period were put in charge with the consent of the Great Council, and were assessed by the royal officials usually with the help of local juries. Clauses 12 and 14 of the Charter of 1215 required the co-operation of the commune concilium regni in all extraordinary levies; and, despite their disappearance from later issues, the principle they introduced steadily triumphed under Henry III. At first the idea existed that consent must be individual, and in 1217 the Bishop of Winchester was exempted from payment of the gracious aid on the ground that he had not been present when it was granted; but gradually the doctrine was established that the consent of those present bound the absentees. A further advance was achieved with the broadening of the basis of representation. After more than half a century of experiment, Edward I at last securely laid the foundations of our representative system, and a parliament which included representatives of the shires and boroughs as well as the nobles and clergy came into being.

Even so the door to arbitrary taxation had not been finally closed to the Crown, as the exactions of Edward I and Edward III abundantly witnessed. The Confirmatio Cartarum of 1297 still left the king a loophole which was only closed in 1340 when Edward III committed himself to the promise that the community "be not henceforth charged or grieved to make common aid or to sustain charge if it be not by common consent of the prelates, earls, barons, and other magnates and Commons of our realm of England, and that in Parliament." When the Yorkists and the Tudors resorted to non-parliamentary exactions they were obliged to cloak them under the guise of "loans and benevolences" in order to avoid too open an infringement of constitutional procedure. Thus the feudal dues and impositions of the eleventh and twelfth centuries gave place in the thirteenth and fourteenth to a system of taxation the incidence of which was felt by the nation as a whole rather than by individual classes, and the basis of which was personalty rather than land. But the bequest of the old order to the new was the great principle that taxation requires consent. Bracton's statement that "aids depend on the grace of the tenant and not upon the will of the lord" grows into the principle enunciated by Chatham: "The taxes are a voluntary gift and grant of the Commons alone." Aidan, St. (d. 651), was a monk in the Columban monastery of Iona. Upon the failure of a mission sent into Northumbria at the request of the king Oswald, who had learnt something of Christianity in Scotland, Aidan was sent and was at once installed as bishop, with his see at Lindisfarne. He established Christianity, and was one of the most zealous supporters of the unreformed Paschal Cycle; despite which Beda fully recognizes his piety and integrity. To St. Aidan many miracles are ascribed, the most remarkable of which is, perhaps, his reputed power of stilling the most violent tempest by the use of consecrated oil.

Aids, THE VOLUNTARY, was the name given to a grant of £120,000, made in 1628 by the Irish notables, payable in instalments of £40,000 a year in return for certain "Graces" (q.v.) or concessions from the Crown. These payments were afterwards, especially by Strafford's action, renewed, and altogether continued for ten years. The Graces were never actually granted.

Aiguillon, SIEGE OF (1346), was the most famous siege of the French wars of Edward III's reign. The fortress of Aiguillon was strongly situated on the borders of Gascony and the Agenais, between the Lot and the Garonne, and it was bravely defended by Sir Walter Manny against John, Duke of Normandy, from April till the end of August. The duke had sworn never to quit the siege till the place was taken; and, finding his assaults ineffectual, resolved to reduce the place by famine. But the great victory of the English at Crécy imperatively called for the presence of the duke's army in the north of France, and he was compelled to raise the siege.

Ailmer, SIR LAURENCE, was sheriff of London in 1501, and subsequently lord mayor. He resisted the exactions of the king's rapacious ministers, Empson and Dudley, and was committed to prison in the last year of Henry VII's reign for refusing to pay the fine of £1,000 imposed upon him.

Aird's Moss, FIGHT OF (1680), in Ayrshire, was a small skirmish in which the royal troops routed a party of the extreme Scottish Covenanters, who had signed the "Sanquhar Declaration" (q.v.), or Cameronians, as they were subsequently called. Richard Cameron, the leader of the sect, fell in this encounter.

Air Force, THE ROYAL, was formed in April 1918, by the amalgamation of the flying branches of the army and navy. The Royal Flying Corps had been formed in 1912, and had become part of the army just before the outbreak of the Great War, the Royal Naval Air Service being formed as a corresponding unit. The disadvantages of the dual system led to the establishment of an Air Ministry (q.v.) in 1918, and to amalgamation.

Air Ministry, THE, is a department of state formed in 1918 on the establishment of the Royal Air Force. The Air Council consists of a president (the secretary of state for air), four service members, and a secretary. The Air Ministry gives administrative effect to the council's decisions.

Air Raids ON ENGLAND, during the Great War, began in December 1914, with a Zeppelin attack off Dover, and ended in August 1918, with a raid off the coast of Norfolk. The first aeroplane attack occurred on November 28, 1916. London was first visited on May 31, 1915. The two most famous exploits of the British air defence were the destruction of a Zeppelin at Cuffley, Middlesex, by Lieut. Robinson on September 2, 1916, and a similar achievement by Lieut. Tempest in the same area on October 1, 1916. The largest raid of all, in which nearly forty Gothas were engaged, took place on May 19, 1918. The total British casualties from air raids for the whole period of the war was 1,413 killed and 3,407 injured. The defence of London involved 200 aeroplanes.

Aislable, JOHN (1670-1742), was chancellor of the exchequer in Lord Stanhope's ministry of 1718. In 1719 he defended the Peerage Bill. In 1720 he, with Sunderland, was requested by Stanhope to consider the proposals of the South Sea Company. They accepted them; and, accordingly, all the intensity of popular indignation fell on them when the scheme failed. The inquiry elicited the fact that an extensive system of bribes had prevailed, and that large sums of fictitious capital had been invented and distributed among leading members of the government. Aislable's case was so flagrant that no one rose to defend him. He was expelled the House, and sent to the Tower. On his release, he retired to his estate in Yorkshire. [SOUTH SEA COMPANY.]

Aix-la-Chapelle, TREATY OF (October 18, 1748), closed the War of the Austrian Succession. The initiative came from France, strengthened by her recent successes, and the strong desire for peace felt by Britain and Holland eventually forced the treaty on Austria and Sardinia. The principal articles were:—The renewal of all former treaties and the mutual restoration of all conquests, Britain giving hostages for the restoration of Cape Breton; the fortifications of Dunkirk on the sea-side were to be demolished; the duchies of Parma, Guastalla, and Piacenza were assigned to the Infant, Don Philip, but if he succeeded to the throne of Naples, the two first reverted to the house of Austria, and Piacenza to Sardinia; the Duke of Modena and the republic of Genoa were reinstated in their former territories; the Asiento Treaty with Spain was confirmed for four years; the Protestant succession in England was guaranteed according to the treaty of 1714, and the Pretender was to be excluded from France; the emperor was to be acknowledged by France, and the Pragmatic Sanction guaranteed; the duchy of Silesia and the county of Glätz were guaranteed to the king of Prussia, and the portions of the Milanese held by Sardinia were permanently surrendered by Austria. It resulted in the breach of the Austrian and British alliance.

Alban. About the end of the ninth century, and before the term Scotia came into use, the district between the Firths of Forth and Clyde and the Spey, which had been known as Pictland, was called Alban (more correctly, Alba), a name which had still earlier been used to designate the whole country north of the Forth and the Clyde. Donald, son of Constantine (889-900), seems to have been the first Pictish ruler to be called King of Alban. The kingdom was divided into seven provinces or mormaerships—the seven earldoms of later history. About a century later the name was superseded by that of Scotia, Malcolm, son of Kenneth (1005-34), being the first to be called King of Scotia.

Alban, St. (d. 304 ? 305 ?), is traditionally regarded as the proto-martyr of Britain. His story, as related by Gildas and Bæda, is that Alban, being then a pagan, saved a confessor, who was being pursued by his persecutors, and was at the point of being seized, by hiding him in his own house, and by changing clothes with him. Alban was carried before the magistrate, but having in the meantime become a Christian he refused to sacrifice to the gods, and was accordingly executed just outside the great city of Verulamium (St. Albans). Numerous miracles are related of him, but, putting these aside, there seems no reason for doubting that he is an historic personage. The date usually given for the martyr's death is a difficulty, as in 304-5 Constantius, the father of Constantine, was Cæsar in Britain, who is known to have been very favourable to Christianity. Dr. Hugh Williams considers it more probable that Alban suffered during the persecutions of Decius and Valerian (250-60).

Albany, DUKES OF. [STUART.]

Albany, PEERAGE OF. In 1398 Robert Stuart (q.v.) (second son of King Robert II of Scotland), was created Duke of Albany. On the execution of his son, Murdoch, 2nd Duke of Albany (q.v.), in 1425, the peerage was forfeited to the Crown, but revived by James II of Scotland, and conferred on his second son Alexander (q.v.), who transmitted it to his son the regent (1481-1536), John, Duke of Albany (q.v.). In 1565, the title, being again extinct, was granted to Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley (q.v.), husband of Mary, Queen of Scots. After 1766 the style of Earl of Albany was adopted by Charles Edward Stuart, the Young Pretender; the title of "Countess of Albany" being assumed by Louisa Maria of Stolberg-Gedern (1754-1823) on her marriage with the prince in 1772. She quitted her husband in 1780, and after his death married the poet Alfieri. On being deserted by his wife, the Pretender affected to create his natural daughter, by Clementina Walkinshaw, "Duchess of Albany." The title of Albany was added to that of York in the peerages of Ernest Augustus, brother of George I, Ernest Augustus, brother of George III, and Frederick, second son of that king. By letters patent, May 24, 1881, Prince Leopold, Duke of Saxony, fourth son of Queen Victoria, was created Duke of Albany and Earl of Clarence. He died in 1884. His son succeeded to his titles, and became, in addition, Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha in succession to his uncle, Prince Alfred. On the outbreak of the World War in 1914, he declared for the Germans, and was consequently deprived of his English titles under the Titles Deprivation Act of 1917.

Albemarle, GEORGE MONCK, DUKE OF (1608-70). [MONCK.]

Albemarle, EARLS OF. [KEPPEL.]

Albemarle (or AUMALE), PEERAGE OF. Odo or Eudes, a claimant of the county of Champagne, held considerable possessions at Aumale, in Normandy. He married Adeliza, sister of William the Conqueror, styled in Domesday Book "Comitissa de Albemarla," and obtained large grants of land in England including the lordship of Holderness. Their son Stephen is styled "Comes de Albemarla," and the title was inherited by his son William, who greatly distinguished himself at the battle of the Standard (1138) and was made Earl of Yorkshire as his reward. His heiress Hawisia succeeded her father in the comté of Aumale and the lordship of Holderness, the title which she carried to her second husband, William de Fortibus (d. 1195). Their son William (one of the twenty-five barons named in Magna Carta) inherited the English lands and retained the title of Count of Aumale, although the county was captured by Philip Augustus in 1204. His granddaughter Avelina married Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, second son of Henry III, so that the title and English lands of Aumale became sunk in the royal house. Thomas of Woodstock, sixth son of Edward III, was created Duke of Aumale in 1385, and after his death in 1397 the title was bestowed upon Edward, Earl of Rutland, son of Edmund, Duke of York, by whom, however, it was forfeited in 1399. In 1412, Thomas, second son of Henry IV, was created Duke of Clarence and Earl of Aumale; he was killed at Beaugé in 1421, when the peerage became extinct. It was revived in 1419, in favour of Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick; but again became extinct on the death of his son Henry in 1446. In 1660 General George Monck (q.v.) was created Duke of Albemarle. The title passed to his son Christopher, and expired with him in 1688. In 1697 the earldom of Albemarle was revived and conferred on William III's faithful follower, Arnold Joost van Keppel (q.v.), in whose descendants it has since remained.

Albert, PRINCE CONSORT (1819-61), the husband of Queen Victoria, was the second son of the reigning Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and nephew to King Leopold of Belgium, and the Duchess of Kent. The prince was carefully educated, and in November 1839 formally betrothed to his cousin, the queen, to whom he was married February 10, 1840. By an act passed just before this event, a sum of £30,000 a year was settled on the prince for life, the grant having been reduced from £50,000, the sum proposed by the ministry, by the efforts of the Radicals and the opposition. By a subsequent act of this session the prince was named regent in the event of the queen's death before the heir to the crown attained the age of eighteen; and in 1857 he was designated "Prince Consort" by letters patent. He died of typhoid fever, December 14, 1861. The prince's position, as husband of a constitutional sovereign, had been a peculiarly difficult and trying one. Apprehensions were frequently expressed in the earlier part of his married life that his influence would be too extensively exercised in matters of state; and during the years of the Crimean war it was asserted and popularly believed that the prince had taken an undue share in the management of the army and the disposal of patronage. It was, however, gradually acknowledged that the difficult circumstances of his situation could hardly have been met with greater tact and conscientiousness, and with more thorough appreciation of the theory of constitutional monarchy. The prince found a more congenial sphere than politics in the encouragement of the arts and in the promotion of social and industrial reforms, and to his efforts the inauguration and successful establishment of the Great Exhibition of 1851 were in great part due.

Albinus, CLODIUS (d. 197), commander of the Roman forces in Britain, was proclaimed emperor by the legions of the province on the assassination of Pertinax (193). His rival, Severus, who was declared emperor by the troops of Pannonia, at first attempted to win him over by favours; but in 197 marched against him and defeated and slew him at Lyons. This battle of Lugdunum, or Lyons, is interesting as being the first recorded battle fought by a British army on the continent.

Albion was perhaps the oldest name for Britain. It occurs in a treatise once ascribed to Aristotle, "Rex Albionis insulæ" was a very favourite title of the more powerful Anglo-Saxon kings (see example in Freeman, "Norman Conquest," i, 548-51), but in later times Albion mainly occurs in poetry. The word means "white," and its use was, perhaps, suggested by the chalk cliffs of the south-east coast. It is etymologically connected with "albus," "alp," etc., and is the Brythonic (Cymric) form of the Goidelic (Gaelic) "Alban," e.g., "Drum Albin" is "Dorsum Albanion" ("Monastic History of Britain," 175 n).

For much curious information and extraordinary etymologies, see Cooper, "Thesaurus Lingue Romanæ et Britannicæ"; "Dictionarium Historicum," London, 1665, s.v. Albion. See also Rhys, "Celtic Britain," pp. 200-3. [T. F. T.]

Albuera, BATTLE OF (May 16, 1811), during the Peninsular War, was fought by Beresford to check Soult, who was advancing to the relief of Badajoz. Soult had with him 24,000 veteran troops, while Beresford, though he had nominally 30,000 men, could only depend on the handful of 7,000 British troops. He had, however, taken up a strong position on a range of hills, in front of which ran the Albuera River. On the morning of the 16th Soult directed a feint attack in front. Beresford endeavoured to avert a flank attack by changing his front, but he was already thinking of retreating, when Colonel Hardinge and Abercromby arrived with fresh troops, with the aid of which the French were driven headlong from the hill. In four hours nearly 6,000 of the allies and 8,000 French had been struck down. On the 17th Soult took up a threatening position, but on the arrival of British reinforcements marched away, and abandoned the attempt to relieve Badajoz.

There is a striking account of the battle in Napier, "Peninsular War"; also Fortescue, "History of the British Army," vol. viii, 1917.

Alcantara, CAPTURE OF (1706), was effected by Lord Galway during the War of Succession in Spain (q.v.). On his way he drove out a garrison placed by Marshal Berwick in Alcantara.

Alcock, JOHN (d. 1500), Bishop of Rochester, Worcester, and Ely, born in 1430 at Beverley in Yorkshire, was appointed dean of the chapel of St. Stephen's, Westminster, in 1461, and in March 1470 acted as Edward IV's envoy to the King of Castile. In 1462 he was made master of the rolls, which appointment he resigned in March 1472, to John Morton, upon his own advancement to the see of Rochester. During the illness of Bishop Stillington Alcock held the great seal from September 1472 to April 1473; and from April to September 1475, during the expedition of Edward IV to France, he was acting chancellor in England, while Rotherham, who accompanied the king, was styled "Chancellor of France." In September 1476 he was appointed to the bishopric of Worcester. During Richard III's reign his influence on public affairs was slight; but on the accession of Henry VII he became lord chancellor in 1485, and in 1486 succeeded Morton as Bishop of Ely. He built the beautiful hall at his episcopal palace of Ely, and Jesus College, Cambridge, which he founded on the site of the old monastery of St. Radegund.

Alfred (EALHRED), King of Northumbria, succeeded to the throne in the year 765, on the resignation of Ethelwald the Moll. After a troublous reign of nine years, he was compelled to renounce the throne, and seek refuge with the Picts. This is regarded as one of the few authentic cases in Anglo-Saxon history of the formal deposition of a king.

Alcuin (735-804) was born probably at York, and educated in the cathedral school, of which he himself later became master (767). There he earned so wide a reputation as a theologian and man of letters that when in 781, on his return from a visit to Rome to procure the pallium for Archbishop Eanbald, he encountered Charlemagne at Parma, the latter pressed him to undertake the direction of the literary and scholastic revival which he was then planning. Accordingly, Alcuin spent the rest of his life—with the exception of a short visit to England in 790-2—on the continent, engaged at first in supervising the studies in the palace school, and later in reviving the glories of the great school of the monastery of St. Martin at Tours, of which he was made abbot in 796. He is the most prominent figure of the Carolingian Renaissance; and his career testifies to the vigour of the tradition of Anglo-Saxon scholarship established by Theodore and Bæda. Alcuin took an active part in the council of Frankfurt (794) at which the heresiarch Felix of Urgel was condemned. His letters, of which a large number have been preserved, are of great historical interest. He maintained throughout his life a close connexion with the country of his birth; and the friendly relations established between Charlemagne and Offa of Mercia are to be ascribed largely to his influence. He was the author of many works, both in prose and in verse, but his distinguished place in the literary history of the Middle Ages is due rather to his career as a teacher than to his actual writings.

Alderman, or EALDORMAN, which is the more ancient form of the word, means simply chief man. It is used in two distinct senses.

(1) Among the first English settlers the title appears to have meant simply chieftain, the position of the ealdorman corresponding to that of the princeps of the Germanic tribes as described by Tacitus before the migration, and it continued to be occasionally used vaguely as an equivalent of lord or noble; but in all public documents the word is evidently taken in the strict sense of the chief magistrate of the shire or group of shires, and was not necessarily connected with nobility of blood, service, or large estate. This restriction of the title may be dated about the beginning of the ninth century, in the days of Egbert. The ealdorman was, in theory, elected in the witenagemot, but the office became practically hereditary. As the power of the kingdom of Wessex rose and the smaller kingdoms were absorbed by it, the descendants of the royal houses often became hereditary ealdormen in almost unbroken succession; and when their lines became extinct, the ealdormen appointed by the king, with the implied, if not expressed, consent of the witan, transmitted the office to their descendants. Their jurisdictions became enlarged, probably by the aggregation of several shires under one rule. The position of the great ealdormen was a high one; they were practically independent of weak kings. Their wergild, or life-value, was equal to that of the bishop, and four times (the king's was six times) that of the thegn.

Originally the ealdorman commanded the military force of the shire, in which capacity he was sometimes called heretoga, the leader of the host (here); and he sat with the bishop in the shiremoot, receiving a third of the fines levied in the jurisdiction. The ealdormen also attended the central witenagemot, together with the bishops. In Ethelred's reign the name ealdorman began to be supplanted by the Danish title, earl, and this process was complete in the time of Canute. As the ealdorman or earl increased in dignity and importance, so his direct share in the administration of the shire decreased; and many of his functions passed to the sheriff, the development of whose office dates from the tenth century. At a later date the term ealdorman reverted to its earlier meaning of headman, and was applied to almost any local officer. Thus in the thirteenth century there is an ealdorman of the hundred, who represents his hundred in the county court. [EARL; SHERIFF.]

(2) Alderman, in its mediæval and modern sense, means an official invested with certain municipal powers and duties, and associated with the mayor in the government of a city or town corporate. The word ealdorman, or alderman, had, as has been shown, become applied to any headman or local officer, and accordingly, in the reign of Henry II, we find that the headman of a gild is called alderman. When, as happened in some of the great towns, the English system of a gild or trade corporation gradually lost its identity in the communa, or municipal corporation, the presiding officer of which was the mayor, the mayor and aldermen became associated in the government of the new municipalities. The first mayor of London was appointed in 1191, and the institution of mayor and aldermen in the large towns was pretty general by the end of the reign of John. The authority of the aldermen was, at first, by no means secure, and throughout the reign of Henry III the populace of London protested against their claim to assess taxation and elect the mayor. However, we find them, with four men from each ward, sending members to parliament in 1297, and their appointments, which were annual under Edward II, were for life under Edward IV. Under the Lancastrian kings, the mayor and aldermen are associated with the town councils, relics of the earlier town government, which first consisted of twenty-four, and afterwards of larger numbers, and became prominent from the decay of the machinery of the local courts; the mayor, aldermen, and town council forming the elements of the municipal corporation. The numbers and sometimes the functions of the aldermen were settled in the charters of incorporation granted to the towns. Under the Stuarts their powers were frequently tampered with from above by the forfeiture and alteration of the charters of incorporation, and the appointment of individual aldermen by royal authority; while they in turn usurped the privileges of the burgesses and freemen, became self-elective, and in some cases obtained the exclusive right of electing members of parliament. Their electoral power, however, was taken from them by the Reform Bill, and the Municipal Reform Act of 1835, and a subsequent act of 1859 did away with the old order of aldermen (except in London), and enacted that their successors were to be elected for six years instead of for life, one-half of their number retiring every third year; and that they should form one-third of the town councillors, from whom and by whom they were to be chosen. Under the Local Government Act of 1888, county aldermen are one-fourth of the members of county councils, and are elected by the rest from their own number or from outside. The alderman is represented in Scotland by the bailie; in Ireland he is elected by the burgesses. [GILD; TOWN.]

brother of Egfrid, whom he succeeded. He was well instructed in theology and secular learning, and acquired the title of "the wisest of kings." His Celtic sympathies brought him into conflict with the Roman party led by Wilfrid. His territory was curtailed by the conquests of the Picts, but on the whole his reign was prosperous.

Aldhelm, or ADELM, St., Bishop of Sherborne (d. 709), was born in Wiltshire, and appears to have been connected with the family of the West Saxon kings. As a child he was sent to study under the learned Scot, Maildulf, at Malmesbury, and later he joined the band of scholars who had been attracted to Canterbury by the learning of Theodore and Hadrian. He subsequently became abbot of the community founded by Maildulf. He made a journey to Rome, and took part in the dispute with the British clergy about Easter. In 705 he was made bishop of the new diocese of Sherborne. Aldhelm's learning was greatly celebrated. He wrote in the vernacular as well as in Latin, although none of his English compositions have been preserved. King Alfred considered him as among the best of English poets. His writings include a prose treatise, "De Laude Virginitatis"; a poem, "De Laude Virginum"; some "Ænigmata" in verse; and some letters to Aldfrid of Northumbria and others.

Aldred (EALDRED) (d. 1069), Archbishop of York, was a monk of Winchester, who became Abbot of Tavistock, and in 1044 Bishop of Worcester. Like many of the native English prelates he travelled much on the continent. Besides journeying twice to Rome, he was sent by Edward the Confessor in 1054 on a mission to the Emperor Henry III; and in 1058 he went on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. In 1060 he became Archbishop of York, retaining the see of Worcester in commendam. The pope refused to bestow the pallium on him till he gave up the see of Worcester. The weight of evidence is against acceptance of the statement of Florence of Worcester that he crowned Harold; but on the death of that prince he submitted to William, for whom he performed the coronation ceremony in default of Stigand. Several legendary tales are told of the latter part of his life, among which is the striking story that he cursed William for his evil deeds, and caused the king to fall trembling at his feet.

Alexander I, THE FIERCE, KING of SCOTLAND (s. 1107, d. 1124), was the son of Malcolm Canmore and Margaret, and successor to his brother Edgar. By Edgar's will he obtained as his kingdom the lands north of the Forth and Clyde, his brother David inheriting Lothian and Cumbria. He gained a great victory on the Moray Firth over the rebellious mormaers of Ross and the Mearns, and founded, in gratitude, the monastery of Scone. An attempt to reconstitute the bishopric of St. Andrews involved the king in disputes with the archbishops of York and Canterbury, who claimed superiority over the Scottish diocese. The controversy ended only with his death, which took place at Stirling, April 1124. He had married Sybilla, natural daughter of Henry I of England. With his father's courage and restless ambition, he seems to have inherited from his mother a devotional feeling and a taste for religious exercises, which were much less characteristic of his race. He inaugurated the feudal policy so thoroughly carried out by his successor, David.

Alexander II, KING of SCOTLAND (s. Dec. 5, 1214, d. 1249), was son and successor to William the Lion. The young king was on friendly terms with the English barons during their struggle with John, and entered in 1216 into an alliance with Louis of France. In 1217, however, he came to terms with the young Henry III, whose sister Joanna he married in June 1221. The next year Alexander entered Argyll, drove out all those who had been engaged in insurrections against the royal power, and turned the whole district into the sheriffdom of Argyll, creating also the bishopric of the same name. After a struggle of some years' duration he succeeded in 1235 in finally bringing Galloway into subjection to the Crown. The following year Alexander refused to do homage to the English king, and laid claim to the northern counties of England; but a peaceful solution was reached through the efforts of the papal legate Otho at York in 1237. In 1244 there was another rupture between the two kings over the alleged intention of Alexander to ally with the French king, and war was imminent; but it was averted by the mediation of Richard of Cornwall and the Archbishop of York, and a treaty was concluded at Newcastle. In 1243, Alexander, after trying to induce Haco, King of Norway, to surrender the sovereignty of the isles, made an expedition to the Sudreys. He died, however, before accomplishing his object, near Oban, July 8, 1249, and was buried at Melrose. He married, as his second wife, Mary, daughter of Ingelram de Coucy. He had been a good king, noted for his moderation and justice, bent on the improvement of his subjects and the consolidation of the various discordant elements in his kingdom.

Alexander III, KING of SCOTLAND (b. 1241, s. 1249, d. 1285), was the son of Alexander II and Mary de Coucy. In 1251, in accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Newcastle, he was married to his cousin Margaret, daughter of Henry III, although the English king's demand for homage was firmly refused. In 1255, Henry by the conquest of Kelso procured the appointment of the Earl of Dunbar, who was favourable to his interests, as regent in the place of the Earl of Menteith. In 1257, however, the Comyns recovered their power, and in 1261 the outbreak of the Barons' war in England freed Alexander from the fear of English intervention. In 1263 a war broke out between Alexander and Haco of Norway, for possession of the Sudreys and the Norse districts on the mainland, which ended in the victory of the Scots at Largs (q.v.), and the consequent annexation of the Isles to Scotland, 1266. Thus Alexander was able to complete the policy of his father. In 1274 Alexander and his queen were present at Edward I's coronation; and in 1278 the Scottish king did homage to his brother-in-law at Westminster, for lands held in England. On the death of his second son, Alexander, January 1284, the king, left childless, summoned a meeting of the Estates at Scone, and caused them to recognize his granddaughter, Margaret, the Maid of Norway, as their future sovereign. Shortly afterwards he married Yolande, daughter of the Count of Dreux, but died owing to a fall from his horse, near Kinghorn, in March 1285.

Alexander, Bishop of Lincoln (d. 1148), was one of the family group of episcopal statesmen of Stephen's reign, of which Alexander's uncle, the justiciar, Roger, Bishop of Salisbury (q.v.), was the head. By his influence he was advanced to the see of Lincoln, in 1123, and probably also held some office in the royal court. In 1135, in spite of his oath to support Matilda, he gave his allegiance to Stephen; but in 1139 the king, becoming suspicious of the loyalty of the Salisbury group, arrested Alexander and his two kinsmen, Roger of Salisbury, and Nigel of Ely, at Oxford. In 1141, after the battle of Lincoln, he took part in the reception of the Empress Matilda at Winchester. It is probable that he re-crowned Stephen at Lincoln in 1146. Henry of Huntingdon dedicated his history to Alexander, and speaks of him in terms of praise, but other sources throw a less favourable light upon his character. He began the erection of the present cathedral of Lincoln, to replace the former one, which was destroyed by fire.

Alexandra, QUEEN (1844–1925), the eldest daughter of Christian IX, King of Denmark, was born on December 1, 1844, and married to Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, on March 10, 1863. Queen consort from 1901 to May 1910, when Edward VII died. In public life the queen always evinced a strong interest in the welfare of the masses, being particularly associated with hospital charities. She died on November 20, 1925.

Alexandria, BATTLE OF (March 21, 1801), was fought by the British force under Sir Ralph Abercromby, which had been sent out to complete the destruction of the diminished remnant of Bonaparte's army after he had effected a landing in Aboukir Bay, in the face of a large French force, on March 1. During the next three weeks the French gradually fell back before the British, till they retired upon Alexandria. Abercromby now stationed himself to the east of Alexandria, with his right resting on some Roman ruins on the sea-shore, and his left on the Lake Mayadieh. Early on March 21, the French infantry attacked simultaneously both flanks, though the serious attack was on the right, where all the French cavalry were launched upon the English. The attack was resisted by Moore's division with stubborn bravery, until Abercromby ordered the reserve to charge. It obeyed, threw the French into confusion, and hurled them back to their own lines. Meanwhile the attack on the left had proved to be merely a feint, and a real attack on the centre had been repulsed by the Guards. The British loss was heavy, and Sir Ralph Abercromby fell. Deprived of its general, the army was handled with an excess of caution. The French finally capitulated.

Alexandria, BOMBARDMENT OF (1882). In July 1882, owing to the disturbed state of Egypt, where the so-called "National Party," under Arabi Pasha, had obtained complete control of the government, a British and French fleet was ordered to enter the harbour of Alexandria. On June 11 a fanatical outbreak occurred, and several hundreds of Europeans were killed or injured. The British admiral, Sir Beauchamp Seymour, ordered the fortresses around the harbour to be dismantled, and on refusal to comply he cleared the harbour of foreign vessels and reduced the forts by bombardment on July 11.

Alford, BATTLE OF (May 1645), was a skirmish fought in Aberdeenshire between Montrose, at the head of the Cavaliers, and the Covenanters under Hurry and Baillie. The latter were defeated.

Alfred (848–99), called in his own times ÆLFRED ÆTHELWULFING, in later, ALFRED THE GREAT; King of the West-Saxons between 871 and 899, was born at Wantage in Berkshire. Asser gives the date of his birth as 849, but there is some reason for placing it a year earlier. He was the youngest son of King Ethelwulf and his wife, the Lady Osburh, and the grandson of Egbert, and of Oslac, the pincerna, or cup-bearer, of Ethelwulf.

We know little of Alfred's early life. In 853, says the Chronicle, his father sent him to Rome, when Leo IV was pope; and the pope there hallowed him king, and took him as bishop's son—a statement which probably refers to his investiture by the pope with the titular dignity of consul. In 855 he is said to have revisited the Eternal City as his father's companion. The incident of the winning of the book of Saxon poems should probably be placed between these two pilgrimages, since Osburh is known to have died not later than 855. The authenticity of the familiar story of the way in which Alfred's life-long love of letters was first kindled has been frequently impugned on the ground that Asser elsewhere describes him as remaining "illiteratus" until his twelfth year; but Alfred may well have acquired, either by reading or by learning by heart, a knowledge of vernacular literature before he turned to the study of Latin. He married, in 868, Ealswith, daughter of Ethelred Mucill, ealdorman of the Gaini, a lady of whom singularly little is known. If Asser is to be believed, it was during the wedding festivities that Alfred was seized with the mysterious malady which troubled him to the end of his life, and which was probably some form of the stone.

In 858 Ethelwulf died, and his three elder sons followed him on the throne in rapid succession. With the accession of the third—Ethelred—in 866 Alfred's political career began. We find him early associated with his brother in the government under the title of "secundarius."

In 868 Alfred was called upon to face, for the first time, what proved to be the one mighty task of his life. The Danes had fallen upon the land of the Mercians. Burghred, the Mercian king, cried to his brother-in-law and overlord, Ethelred, king of the West-Saxons, for help. His cry was heard, and Alfred went with his brother to the siege of Nottingham, where the Danes were lying. Nottingham was won back, not by force, but by a treaty—which probably meant a bargain that gave the English a breathing-space, and the Danes a fair profit on their adventure.

Three years later (871) Alfred was summoned to grapple with the work he was born to accomplish, in deadly earnest. After the peace of Nottingham the invaders had gone back to York, stayed there a year, and then (870) had marched southward, seized on Thetford, and defeated and slain Edmund, the East-Anglian king. Very early next year they burst into Wessex itself. "The destroying host" laid hold on Reading, secured their position there, and proceeded straightway to carry on from thence their work of plunder and havoc. Towards Reading the men of Wessex at once hastened, under the command of King Ethelred, of Alfred, and of Ethelwulf, the ealdorman; and a furious strife ensued, which lasted throughout the year. Fight followed fight in quick succession. Victorious under Ethelwulf at Englefield the West-Saxons were, a few days later, baffled at Reading, though led by their king and his brother in person; and after great slaughter had to fall back, leaving the field of carnage in the possession of their enemies. Foiled for the moment, but with courage still unshaken, the royal brothers, four days afterwards, closed with the whole army of the Danes at Ashdown. Here took place one of the most stubborn tugs of war in history. [ASHDOWN.] To Alfred the chief glory of the victory of the West-Saxons is given by Asser, who tells us that it was his early advance to the attack, while his brother lingered at Mass, that broke the strength of the enemy, and led to their utter discomfiture in the end. Yet this splendid success was indecisive. In an engagement at Basing that followed a fortnight later, "the Danes got the victory" over the winners of Ashdown; and in two months more, at Marton (or Marden), the West-Saxons, after a stubborn conflict, had to withdraw from the field.

At Easter Ethelred died; and Alfred was made king. In another month he was again at handgrips with his dogged foes—this time at Wilton—and again suffered a check. The West-Saxon resistance seems, however, to have convinced the invaders that they might be more profitably employed elsewhere. They therefore came to terms with Alfred, and early next year withdrew from Wessex. After 871 the land had entire rest for four years, though other parts of England were smarting under the rapacity and ferocity of the merciless strangers. Some use of this respite the king must have made: he is recorded as having, in 875, attacked and put to flight seven Danish ships. During the next and following years (876-77) he was also strong enough to force a treaty upon a powerful force that had landed in Dorset, and exact oaths and hostages from them. He found it no easy matter to get rid altogether of the intruders; but in the autumn of 877 they at length sailed away from Exeter to the land of the Mercians. But this deliverance almost brought his kingdom to the brink of ruin. In the first week of 878 the Danish army under Guthrum (q.v.) stole up from Gloucester, and, coming upon the West-Saxons unawares, seized Chippenham. The surprise was complete; so sudden and so swift was the movement, that they had ridden over and taken to themselves the greater part of the kingdom before a sufficient force could be brought together to make head against them at any point. Many people fled beyond the sea; Alfred alone refused to despair; "uneasily, with a little band of warriors, he went along the woods, and into the moor-fastnesses." In one of these he at last halted, and began, with the faithful few that followed him, to throw up a defensive work—thrice-famous ever since as Athelney (q.v.), the Isle of Princes, called so, no doubt, from the trusty handful of high-born men that plied the mattock around the king. It covers a few acres a little south of Sedgemoor, in Somerset. To its narrow compass the last English kingdom had shrunk.

But it was a brief agony, after all. The Danes would seem to have been drawing their toils round Athelney; they threw a considerable detachment on the neighbouring coast, which was beaten with great loss, and Alfred was untiring in his assaults upon them from his stronghold. The country recovered from its surprise, and, some weeks after Easter, Alfred quitted Athelney, and met the levies of the three shires on the eastern skirts of Selwood Forest. With these he went straight upon the enemy, met them at Ethandun (q.v.) (probably Edington in Wiltshire), overthrew their host, and chased its wrecks into their fortress. A siege of fourteen days ended in the Danes engaging to withdraw from Wessex, and their king, Guthrum, consenting to become a Christian. These pledges were punctually kept. At Aller the baptismal ceremonies were begun; at Wedmore they were completed; and soon after, the army of the invaders marched away from Chippenham. Thus was Wessex snatched from destruction, and, with Wessex, the destiny of the English race. The Treaty of Chippenham seems to have left Alfred master of England south and west of Watling Street. In 886 a further unsuccessful Danish attack terminated in the treaty known as "Alfred and Guthrum's Peace," which fixed the southern boundary of the Danelagh and gave Alfred London and its environs.

The years following may be called a time of peace for Alfred and his people. To this period almost certainly belong the great measures that make the second half of England's debt to Alfred—the effacement of the ravages of war, the restoration of material prosperity, the reinvigoration of the national defences, the improvement of the laws, the rekindling of religion, the "relighting of the lamp of learning." The first two of the above objects he tried to effect by repairing the damage done to towns and cities, raising public buildings, reclaiming waste lands, and making or renewing roads and bridges. Our knowledge of the third is vague; but we know that he reorganized the fyrd or national militia, systematized the defences of the country and built many new burhs or fortified centres; encouraged the growth of the thegn-class to provide himself with horsemen; and, above all, developed and reformed the naval system so that he might meet the Danes upon their own element. As a legislator, he added nothing to existing laws, but simply revised those of his predecessors, keeping "those that seemed to him good," rejecting "those that seemed to him not good," and combining the former into a single code. Religion and letters had sunk so low among the West Saxons that he had to seek the agents of their regeneration in foreign lands. From Wales he drew Asser; from Mercia, Werfrith and Plegmund; Grimbold and John the Old Saxon from the continent. With their help he reanimated the services of the Church, founded schools and monasteries, and encouraged literary composition in the native tongue. At this last he was himself a diligent worker, as translations (that are not mere translations) of large portions of the writings of Boethius, Orosius, Bæda, and Gregory the Great still survive to prove. Men in later times loved to dwell on this feature of his career; in a mediæval list of West Saxon kings, his name is specially distinguished as "litteratus."

But in 893 the dogs of war were again let slip on his kingdom, and the old hideous scenes of pillage, slaughter, and havoc were renewed. The chief leader of these fresh swarms of marauders was the terrible Hasting. For four years he dragged Alfred up and down, across and along, the country, making treaties and breaking them, getting again and again beaten, both by land and by sea, but recovering himself after every defeat, and refusing to be driven from the land. The value of the king's military reforms was thus effectually tested; and they may be said to have fairly stood the strain. In every recorded encounter—as at Farnham, Benfleet, Buttington—the West Saxons overthrew their foes. The upshot at length was that the Danes, beaten, out-generalled, and checked at every turn, got weary of an unprofitable enterprise, broke up into several bands, and went off in different directions, leaving Wessex at peace. The heroic king's work was now done. He died "six nights before Allhallowmas," probably in the year 899.

Alfred is one of the few historical characters that all writers delight to honour; almost with one consent historians have pronounced that he comes pretty nearly as close to perfection as a man and a king as any ruler of whom there is record. This verdict may be accepted as final; it is certainly not likely to be ever successfully impeached. To his goodness, nobility of character, moral greatness, heroism, his whole life is a testimony. Alfred the Good and Steadfast he assuredly was; and if it may be plausibly hinted that he was a little lacking in the sagacity, originality, forecast, and efficient provision for the future, without which no human greatness is complete, it may yet be pleaded that such a rare combination of moral and intellectual excellence amply justified the writers of the seventeenth century in styling him ALFRED THE GREAT.

Alfred (ÆLFRED) the Etheling (d. 1036), was the younger son of Ethelred II and Emma. On the death of his father he fled to Normandy, where, together with his brother Edward (the Confessor), he seems to have remained till the reign of Harold, 1036, when, either alone or accompanied by Edward, he made an expedition to England for the purpose of obtaining the crown. He was entrapped, together with his Norman followers, by means of an ambuscade near Guildford, and conveyed to the monastery of Ely; by the orders of Harold, he was either blinded and died of the pain, or was actually murdered. The question whether Godwin had any share in this is a vexed one, but it is certain that he was at the time suspected of being an accomplice. The story that Emma was privy to the treachery and violence which brought about the end of Alfred, in order that the crown might be assured to his half-brother Hardicanute (q.v.), is unworthy of credence.

Algar (ÆLFGAR) (d. 1062 ?) was the son of Earl Leofric, and the father of Edwin and Morkere. We first hear of him in 1051, when, on the triumph of the Norman party and outlawry of Harold, he received the earldom of East-Anglia. On Harold's return in the next year, Algar appears to have quietly resigned it to him, to resume it again in 1053, on the translation of Harold to Wessex. In 1055 Algar was banished. The reason for this treatment is doubtful; but he soon showed his unscrupulous and treacherous disposition by allying with Gruffyd of Wales, and ravaging Herefordshire. Harold was sent against them, and peace was quickly made, one of the conditions being that Algar should be restored to his earldom. In 1057, on his father's death, he succeeded to the earldom of Mercia. Outlawed again in 1058, he was again restored with the help of his former allies to his earldom, and seems to have spent the latter years of his life in peace and good works. [HAROLD.]

Algeciras Conference, THE (1906), resulted from the policy pursued by the Kaiser Wilhelm II in reply to the Anglo-French Entente (q.v.) of 1904. One reply was the secret meeting with the Tsar Nicholas at Björkö in 1905. The other was the Kaiser's speech at Tangier in March 1905, in which the independence of Morocco was taken under the protection of Germany. It was followed by a demand for an international conference and for the dismissal of the French foreign minister, Delcassé, whom the Kaiser declared to be anti-German. France, unready for war, complied with the latter demand in June and set on foot preparations for a conference. The conference met at Algeciras in January 1906, attended by representatives of Germany, France, Great Britain, and ten other states, including Morocco. It provided a diplomatic rebuff for Germany in that the Anglo-French Entente was strengthened rather than weakened by it; though there was no official foundation for Delcassé's assertion that the British government had offered to land 100,000 men in Schleswig-Holstein to support France if war should break out.

Algiers, BOMBARDMENT OF (1816), was conducted by the British fleet in consequence of the ravages made by the Algerine pirates on the commerce and coasts of the Mediterranean. The work was entrusted to Lord Exmouth, who at first attempted by negotiations to unite the states of Barbary in an effort to suppress the pirates. In May 1816, while Exmouth was absent in England, pending the result of his negotiations, 2,000 Algerine troops attacked the Italian coral-fishers, who were attending Mass under the protection of the British flag. Exmouth at once set sail, received a reinforcement from the Dutch admiral, Capellen, who desired to be allowed to join in the siege, and on August 27 the fleet reached Algiers. The dey's refusal to accept Exmouth's ultimatum led to a severe bombardment (lasting eight hours) by the British fleet. Next day Lord Exmouth renewed his ultimatum, which was accepted.

Alien Priorities. [MONASTICISM.]

Alienation of Land. [LAND TENURE.]

Aliens. By our Common Law, nationality depends on the place of birth. Everyone born in a land not subject to the sovereignty of this country was an alien. Jews also, though born in this kingdom, were regarded in the same light. [Jews.] This doctrine has been modified by statute. By 25 Ed. III, st. 2, all, whose father and mother at the time of their birth were in allegiance [ALLEGIANCE], were so far to be held natural-born subjects as to be capable of inheritance. And it was held that the nationality of the mother mattered not, if her husband was a British subject. Aliens could become subjects by denization, which conferred a kind of middle state between a natural-born subject and an alien. This position was sometimes obtained (temp. Hen. VIII) by act of parliament, but as a rule by letters patent. Naturalization was obtained only through parliament until the reign of Queen Victoria. All children born in Scotland after the accession of James I to the throne of England (post-nati) were held, by the decision in Calvin's case, to be natural-born subjects of England. [POST-NATI.] In the same reign it was determined (7 Jas. I, c. 2) that no alien should be naturalized until he had taken the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, and conformed to the sacramental test. From a desire to strengthen the Protestant interest, an act was passed (7 Anne, c. 5) naturalizing all Protestant residents on their taking the oaths, etc., and declaring the children of all naturalized British subjects to be natural-born. This statute was repealed, as regards its earlier provision, shortly afterwards. Seven years' residence in the American colonies was made (13 Geo. II, c. 7) to confer naturalization on a Protestant alien. During the war consequent on the French Revolution, various statutes were passed, as 33 Geo. III, c. 4, placing aliens under supervision, and giving the secretary of state power to remove them, if suspected, out of the kingdom. The demand of the First Consul, in 1802, for the expulsion of the French emigrants was one of the causes which led to a renewal of the war. The 7 and 8 Vict., c. 66, allowed naturalization to be conferred by the certificate of a secretary of state. By the Naturalization Act (33 and 34 Vict., c. 14), a woman, who has become an alien by foreign marriage, may, after her husband's death, be readmitted to nationality; in this case her children, though born of her alien husband, will also gain the position of British subjects. By naturalization in a foreign state, British subjects are allowed to become aliens. This act also provides for the grant of certificates of naturalization to aliens who have resided within the kingdom, or served the Crown, for five years, and for the grant of a limited nationality by the legislature of British colonies within their own borders. Aliens have been regarded with jealousy both for political and commercial reasons. During the fourteenth century they were often made the subjects of special taxation. By the Great Charter, art. 41, alien merchants were allowed to trade freely. The privileges of the mercantile statutes of Edward I were extended to them. The king favoured them because they granted him customs. Parliament, however, interfered with these grants in 1303, and at other times. [Customs.] English merchants were jealous of these foreign competitors. In 18 Edward I the citizens of London petitioned that they might be banished. This was refused. Vexatious restrictions were laid upon alien merchants in the reign of Richard III, and were increased by 32 Hen. VIII, c. 16. Aliens are subject to, and under the protection of, the criminal law. By express provision, they also are subject to, and have the advantages of, the Bankruptcy Acts. Aliens by the Common Law lay under great disabilities. An alien could not take or transmit land by descent. He could not hold land either for his own benefit or in trust. Until 8 Hen. V, c. 16, the alien wife of an English subject could not demand her dower. Aliens might, however, hold benefices, for the Church was Catholic. An alien could not have an action for land in his own name, but he might have an action for personal property. His witness was received, but he could not serve on a jury, except on one partly composed of aliens for the trial of aliens (de medietate lingue). These disabilities have to a great extent been removed by statute. By 33 and 34 Vict., c. 14, an alien may acquire by inheritance or purchase. He may hold any kind of property in this kingdom, except a share in a British ship; and title to land may be derived from or through an alien. This act, however, does not confer any right to hold property in land outside the United Kingdom, and provides that no property shall confer on an alien a qualification for franchise or public office. An Aliens Act was passed in 1905 to check the immigration of undesirable aliens. It came into operation on January 1, 1906. It was followed in 1914 by the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act (amended in 1918 and 1922), one clause of which abolished the legal distinction between natural-born and naturalized subjects.

Aligarh, CAPTURE OF (August 29, 1803), occurred in General Lake's campaign against the Maharras. Aligarh, the great military arsenal of the French army of Dowlat Rao Sindhia, in Hindustan, was very strongly fortified. General Lake, however, was determined to take it, and it was captured by the irresistible gallantry of the 76th Highlanders, commanded by Major Macleod.

Ali Morad was one of the amirs of Upper Sind in 1842. His intrigues hastened Napier's proceedings in Upper Sind in 1842, and although he obtained the office of rais, Ali Morad was banished after the revolt of 1843. [SIND.]

Aliwal, BATTLE OF (January 28, 1846), was fought during the first Sikh war. It was a victory for the British under General Sir Harry Smith, who defeated Ranjur Singh and captured sixty-seven guns.

Alkmaar, CAPTURE OF (October 2, 1799), was effected during the expedition of the Duke of York to Holland. On September 19 an unsuccessful attack had been made by the allied troops. Soon afterwards the Duke of York was strongly reinforced, and on October 2, with 30,000 men, he was ready to attack the equal forces of the French, under the command of Brune, whose position was centred at Alkmaar. The town was captured after a day's fighting begun by the Russians, who were reinforced by Sir Ralph Abercromby later in the day. The combined attack rolled up the French left flank with decisive results.

All the Talents, MINISTRY OF (1806-7), was the name given to the Grenville administration which was called into existence on the death of William Pitt. An attempt was made to include in the new government representatives of all the three parties—the Tories, the moderate Whigs, and the extreme Whigs whose sympathies had all along been with France. Lord Grenville became prime minister; Fox, foreign secretary; Erskine, lord chancellor; Lord Fitzwilliam, president of the council; Lord Sidmouth, lord privy seal; Windham, minister of war; and Lord Spencer, home secretary. Lord Ellenborough, the lord chief justice, was also, by a somewhat startling innovation, admitted into the cabinet. In spite, however, of this singularly imposing array of talent, the cabinet was composed of elements much too discordant to admit of any permanent harmony; and Fox's early death (September 13) removed the commanding mind which alone could possibly have held together men of such different views. One great measure was passed, which will always be associated with this ministry—viz., the abolition of the slave trade (March 25, 1807). Little else of permanent interest was effected. Foreign politics were of too vital importance to admit of any progress in domestic reform; and Fox himself devoted all his ability to negotiating a peace with France, and too late learned to gauge the restless ambition of Napoleon, with the result that he was convinced that his long-cherished hope of peace was in vain. In March 1807 the ministry, which had been greatly weakened by the disaffection of some of its members, resigned office, on being required by the king not only to drop the Catholic Relief Bill which they had brought in, but also to pledge themselves never to introduce any such measure in the future. They were succeeded by the administration in which the Duke of Portland was prime minister. [FOX, C. J.; GRENVILLE; WINDHAM.]

Allahabad, the capital of the North-West Provinces of India, was one of the strong towns of the old Mogul dynasty. At the break-up of the Mogul empire it fell under the yoke of the Vizir of Oudh, by whom it was ceded to the company in 1765, and handed over to the dethroned Mogul emperor, Shah Allum. In 1773 it was, however, handed to the Nawab of Oudh, by whom it was ceded back to the British in 1801. The town contains the remains of a magnificent palace of the Emperor Akbar.

Allectus (d. 296) was one of the officers of Carausius, whom he murdered in 293. Allectus then usurped the power in Britain, and governed the province in a very tyrannical manner till 296, when Constantius Chlorus invaded the country, and completely defeated the usurper, who was slain in the battle.

Sir O. Oman, "England Before the Norman Conquest."

Allegiance (Lat. alligo, through Low Lat. ligancia, and Norm.-French ligeance), means the tie which binds each man of a nation to its head in return for the protection allowed him. The idea of allegiance existed in England at an early date. The duties of the king towards the subject were expressed in the promise of Ethelred to govern righteously; those of the subject towards the king in the treason-law of Alfred, and in the laws of his son Edmund (about 943) we have the first recorded oath of allegiance. "All shall swear, in the name of the Lord, fealty to King Edmund as a man ought to be faithful to his lord, without any controversy or quarrel in open or in secret, in loving what he shall love, and not willing what he shall not will." It was to counteract the disruptive tendencies of feudalism, and to assert the royal power, that William I, at the Council of Salisbury, A.D. 1086, caused "all his witan and all the land-owners of substance, whose vassals soever they were," to swear an oath of allegiance to him, which in form was a modification of that of Edmund; and there is a clause directing every free man to take the oath in the so-called Laws of William. Nevertheless, from that date, inasmuch as ownership of land was the sign of the relations between ruler and subject, and all land was held of the king, the idea of allegiance became, as far as he was concerned, identified with those of fealty and homage, though the two last concerned in reality owners of land in the connexion of vassal and lord, and had no necessary connexion with kingship. This change is to be found in the oath of allegiance to Edward I, which was imposed on all over the age of fourteen. With the growth of the idea of loyalty and legitimacy under the Lancastrian and Yorkist kings, the theory became prominent among legal writers. Meanwhile another idea had been growing up—that of the oath of office; it was asserted in the reign of Henry III by the Provisions of Oxford, and probably existed even earlier in the case of sheriffs, and the king's councillors, and in the reign of Edward II the Dispensers were banished by parliament for misapplication of allegiance. It was not, however, imposed by statute on all persons holding office until the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the promise then being "to be true and faithful to the king and his heirs, and truth and faith to bear of life and limb and terrene honour, and not to know or hear of any ill or damage intended him without defending him therefrom." This oath might be exacted when necessary from all persons over the age of twelve. James I also imposed a special oath on Roman Catholics, in which he bound them to disclose conspiracies against him, in spite of any excommunication by the pope, thus attacking his supposed deposing power. The oath of allegiance was imposed afresh after the Revolution by the Declaration of Right; but as the form enjoined by it differed from the form imposed by statute, it was determined, in 1689, to pass an act abolishing the old oaths, and determining by whom the new oaths should be taken. The form agreed upon was much the same as that at present in use, but a violent controversy arose as to the class of men who should be required to take it. It was unanimously agreed that it should for the future be applied to all who were admitted to civil, military, or academic offices; but it was felt that to make it retrospective would be to make large bodies of the clergy, who believed in the doctrine of the divine right of kings, resign their livings. On this point the House of Lords and William III were disposed to be merciful, and exempt the clergy from the oath; but the Commons refused to give way, and finally it was decided that all those who refused to take the oath by February 1690, should be deprived of office. The forms of the oaths of abjuration and supremacy were also settled at the same date. A single oath was, however, substituted for the three in 1858, and in the same year this was adapted to the use of Catholics and Jews. By the Promissory Oaths Act, 1868, the form of oath, that at present in use, was fixed as follows:—"I, A. B., do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to his majesty King George V, his heirs and successors, according to the law. So help me, God!" It is imposed on all officers of state, holders of appointments in the Supreme Court of Judicature, and justices of the peace, though in some cases a simple affirmation is allowed; but members of parliament, on whom the obligation to take the oath of allegiance was imposed in 1679, and again in 1714, now use a special form of oath provided by the Parliamentary Oaths Act of 1866. Alleluia Victory, THE (429 ?), is the name given to a victory of the Britons over the Picts and Saxons. The story, as told by Bæda (who copies from Constantius, "Sanct. Germani Vita"), is that the Britons, being attacked by the combined forces of the Picts and Saxons, sought the aid of St. Germanus. The saint accordingly, after the celebration of Easter, placed himself at the head of the Britons, and drew up his troops in a valley encompassed by hills, in the way by which the enemy was expected. As soon as the foe appeared, Germanus, bearing in his hands the standard, instructed his men to repeat his words in a loud voice, and as the enemy advanced securely, thinking to take them by surprise, the men cried three times aloud, "Alleluia!" The enemy, struck with terror, fled in disorder. Thus the Britons gained a bloodless victory. The scene of this battle is conjecturally placed at Maes Garmon (the Field of Germanus ?) about a mile from Mold, in Flintshire.

Allen, JOHN (1476-1534), had been Archbishop Warham's agent at Rome, and was afterwards employed by Wolsey in visiting the smaller monasteries, with a view to their suppression. In 1528 he was made archbishop of Dublin and chancellor of Ireland. In these capacities he headed the opposition to the Earl of Kildare. In 1534 he was seized by Kildare's orders, and brutally murdered.

Allen, CARDINAL WILLIAM (1532-94), was at one time principal of St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, and Canon of York during the reign of Mary. In 1568 he established a seminary at Douai, in order to train priests for the conversion of England; and later he founded another at Rome. In 1578 the students were expelled from Douai, and took refuge at Rheims under the protection of the Guises. Becoming closely connected with the Jesuits, Allen entered into various schemes for the subversion of Elizabeth's throne, and advocated a Spanish invasion of England. In 1580, by his aid, a number of Jesuits were dispatched to prepare the English people for rebellion; and it was arranged that, in the event of a Spanish conquest of England, Allen should be made Archbishop of Canterbury, chancellor, and papal legate. In 1587 he was made a cardinal by the pope, in acknowledgment of his services to the Roman Catholic cause, and received a rich abbey from the King of Spain. In 1588 he published at Antwerp, as a prelude to the launching of the Armada, a violent and scurrilous pamphlet against Queen Elizabeth, entitled "An Admonition to the Nobility and People of England" (q.v.), in the composition of which the Jesuit Parsons probably participated. Allen was nominated Archbishop of Malines in 1591, but the appointment was never confirmed, and the remainder of his life was passed at Rome.

Allenby, EDMUND HENRY HYNMAN, 1ST VISCOUNT (b. 1861), British field-marshal, saw active service in the Bechuanaland Expedition of 1884, and took part in the relief of Kimberley during the Boer War. He went out to France in 1914 in command of a cavalry regiment, became commander of the Third Army in 1915, in which capacity he played a leading rôle in the battle of Arras (q.v.). In June 1917 Allenby was appointed British commander in Egypt and Palestine, where he captured Jaffa (November 14) and Jerusalem (December 9), and pushed the Turks back beyond Damascus early in 1918. For his services he was created a field-marshal and a viscount. From 1919 to 1925 he was British high commissioner for Egypt.

Alma, BATTLE OF THE (September 20, 1854), fought during the Crimean War. After their landing at Eupatoria, the allies marched southwards along the coast. The army, led by Lord Raglan and Marshal St. Armand, consisted of 27,000 British, 22,000 French, and 5,000 Turks. Prince Menshikov, the Russian general, entrenched himself strongly on the heights which overlook the river Alma, about sixteen miles to the north of Sebastopol, with the river between him and the foe. The allies came up under a heavy fire, forced their way through the river, and struggled bravely up to the Russian entrenchments, which, after a slight momentary waver along the whole line, they carried at the point of the bayonet. The Russians retreated slowly, and the allies were too much fatigued and too weak in cavalry to be able to follow up the advantage they had gained.

Almanza, BATTLE OF (April 25, 1707), was one of the battles of the War of the Spanish Succession. Peterborough, who had been most successful, was superseded by Lord Galway, an experienced veteran, "who thought it much more honourable to fail according to rule than to succeed by innovation." On the plain of Almanza he encountered the French, under the Duke of Berwick. As Berwick was stronger than the allies in cavalry, it was rash in Galway to act on the offensive; but he wished to drive the French from Valencia. Berwick had drawn up his troops with his infantry and artillery in the centre, and his cavalry on the flanks. The British commander drew up his infantry in line close in the rear of his cavalry. Galway's attack on the French right was at first successful, and the French centre was for a moment driven back. On the right of the allies the Portuguese cavalry, under the Marquis das Minas, as usual turned and fled; their infantry were cut to pieces. The British centre was assailed at once on the flank and in front, and thus completely routed, they were compelled to surrender. The victory was decisive and important. Valencia and Aragon were at once reconquered by the French.

Almenara, BATTLE OF (July 27, 1710), resulted in a victory for the allied armies in Spain. The allied and Spanish armies were face to face near the village of Almenara. Stahremberg was still averse to an engagement; but the spirits of the British regiments had been roused by the sight of the enemy, and they murmured loudly at their forced inactivity. At length, two hours before nightfall, Stanhope obtained permission from the Archduke Charles to attack some Spanish regiments who had advanced in a spirit of bravado. He charged at the head of the cavalry. The king's troops at length gave way, and had a few hours of daylight remained it is probable that the whole army would have been destroyed. Philip hastily retired to the line of the Ebro.

Almon, JOHN (1737-1805), after an adventurous career in early life, became acquainted with Churchill and Wilkes, and published a defence of Wilkes's "Essay on Woman." In 1763 he set up as bookseller and publisher. He published "The New Foundling Hospital for Wit," a collection of party squibs, and "The Parliamentary Register," an account of the debates in parliament. In 1805 he published "The Correspondence of the late John Wilkes with his Friends."

Almora, CAPTURE OF (April 25, 1815), took place in the Gurkha War. It was effected by Colonel Gardner, aided by 2,000 troops under Colonel Nicolls. As a result the province and forts of Kumaon were surrendered to the British. [GURKHA WAR.]

Alnwick, Northumberland, in 1093 was attacked by Malcolm Canmore, of Scotland, who was slain before its walls. In 1135 it was taken by David I. In 1174 it was besieged by William the Lion, who was captured by surprise outside the walls. In 1215 Alnwick was destroyed by John. In 1309 it passed into the hands of the Percys. In Northumberland's rebellion in 1403, the castle was temporarily seized by the king; and about the middle of the fifteenth century it was burnt by the Scots. During the rebellion of the Northern lords, in 1569, it was fortified by the Earl of Northumberland for the insurgents. Alnwick Priory was a house of Premonstratensian canons, founded by Eustace FitzJohn, and richly endowed by the de Vescys and the Percys.

Alphege (ÆELFHEAH), St. (954-1012), Archbishop of Canterbury (1006-1012), was of noble birth, and early in life became a monk. He is said to have been Abbot of Bath, and was certainly advanced to the bishopric of Winchester in 984. In 1006 he was made Archbishop of Canterbury. On the capture of Canterbury by the Danes in 1011, Alphege was taken and was held a prisoner for seven months, in the expectation that he would ransom himself with some of the treasure of his see. On his refusal to pay at the appointed time his captors pelted him with stones, logs of wood, and the bones and skulls of oxen, till one Thrum, whom Alphege is said to have converted, clave his head with a battle-axe. He was considered a martyr by the English, and Anselm contended that he had a right to the title; because he died refusing to plunder his people in order to ransom himself. The English Church celebrates St. Alphege on April 19. The place of his martyrdom was Greenwich.

Alresford, FIGHT AT (March 27, 1644), was between the Royalists, under the Earl of Brentford and Sir Ralph Hopton, and the Parliamentary forces under Sir William Waller. The latter were victorious, though the severe losses they sustained prevented Waller from taking advantage of his victory.

Ambassadors. Different ranks and titles exist among the diplomatic representatives of states. Ambassadors hold the first place. Next below them are envoys and ministers plenipotentiary. In the third rank are residents and chargés d'affaires. The distinction between these classes is one of dignity, and depends on the nature of their commission, or the fullness of the representative character with which the agent is invested by his court. This representative character exists in perfection in the office of an ambassador. There is, however, no distinction between these agents as to their rights and privileges. From the time when England, by the conversion of its people, became part of European Christendom, its sovereigns have from time to time sent embassies to other lands, and received the representatives of their rulers. While, however, the mediæval system continued, and Christendom was regarded as one body politic under the emperor and the pope, the mission of ambassadors was occasional, and unregulated by law. As the mediæval polity gave place to a system of independent states, the matter of ambassadors received the attention of jurists. Ambassadors were at first sent only on special occasions. Long residence was regarded with jealousy by the state which received the embassy, e.g., Coke praises Henry VII because he was too prudent to allow ambassadors to reside within his realm. This feeling died out in the seventeenth century. After the Peace of Westphalia, 1648, resident ambassadors were generally employed by most of the nations of the civilized world. Ambassadors may therefore be classed as either ordinary, resident, or extraordinary. Every sovereign state has a right to send and receive ambassadors, unless it has renounced that right. Mazarin, in 1659, received the ambassadors of Oliver Cromwell at the Congress of the Pyrenees, and rejected those sent by Charles II. A prince who has lost his sovereignty cannot claim to be represented by an ambassador; and so far at least the civilians of Elizabeth were right when, in 1567, they refused to recognize the Bishop of Ross, the agent of the Queen of Scots, as an ambassador. The right of rebels to embassy must be decided by circumstances. To avoid difficulty, a foreign country in such cases sometimes receives from an insurgent state agents invested with the immunities, but not with the representative character of ambassadors. The right to do this was asserted by Lord Russell, in 1861, in the Trent affair. A state cannot reasonably refuse to receive an embassy, though it may make an objection to receive any particular ambassador. In 1625, Louis XIII, not without reason, refused to receive the Duke of Buckingham as ambassador of Charles I. The right of inviolability attaches to all ministers representing their sovereign or their state, not only in the country to which a representative is sent, but in any other through which he may have to pass. In 1587, Aubespine, the French ambassador, was found to have been privy to a plot against the life of the queen. Burghley, however, did not bring him to trial because of his right as an ambassador. The inviolability of an ambassador extends to his suite. It is doubtful, however, whether in this case it is equally full in respect of gross crimes. For, in 1654, Dom Pantaleon Sa, brother of the Portuguese ambassador, was executed in London for murder. He pleaded that he was accredited as an ambassador, but could show no credentials. Had he been able to prove that he was a representative of his sovereign, he might have escaped. Certain privileges of ambassadors are established by custom. An ambassador is exempt from civil jurisdiction, unless, indeed, he so far forget his character as to engage in trade. In consequence of this exemption having been violated in 1708, in the case of an ambassador of the Tsar, it has been enforced by our municipal law, 7 Anne, c. 12. An ambassador is also exempt from taxation, and enjoys other like immunities. Akin to these was the privilege of asylum attaching to his house, which is now generally renounced. An ambassador receives instructions from his own government, and carries with him credentials to the government to which he is sent. He also carries the full power, which is his authority for negotiation. After he has delivered his letters of credence to the minister of foreign affairs, he has a right to an audience of the sovereign to whom he is accredited. The death of either of the sovereigns between whom he negotiates ends his embassy. He may, however, be re-accredited; and if this is likely to be the case, his embassy is held to be suspended, and relations are continued in the expectation of confirmation.

[AMBASSADORS, CONFERENCE OF, is the name given to reunions of ambassadors in certain centres, as, for example, that which sat at Paris from 1815 to 1822 and watched over the execution of the Vienna treaties. A similar conference was in existence after 1920, which met weekly at Paris to discuss the execution of the Treaty of Versailles. This conference comprised the ambassadors at Paris of Great Britain, Italy, Japan, and the United States, and the French foreign minister. Its importance declined as the Council of the League of Nations developed.]

Amboyna, one of the Molucca Islands, was captured by the Dutch, from the Portuguese, in 1607. The English, after having been expelled from Amboyna by the Dutch, obtained in 1619 the right of trading there. The treaty was badly kept on both sides; and in February 1623 the Dutch tortured to death several of the English factors, under pretence that they had intrigued with the natives. In 1654, after the war with Holland, the Dutch agreed to pay a sum of £300,000 to the descendants of the victims as compensation for the massacre. Amboyna has since this been twice captured by the British—in 1795, and again in 1810—but on both occasions subsequent treaties of peace restored it to Holland.

Ambrosius Aurelianus appears to have successfully rallied the Britons of the west in the latter half of the fifth century, against the English invaders. He seems to have been the representative of the Roman party in Britain. According to Gildas, he was "a modest man, who, of all the Roman nation, was then alone in the confusion of this troublous time left alive. His parents, who for their merit were adorned with the purple, had been slain in these same broils." Nothing certain is known, however, of his career, nor of his connexion with the great legendary hero of the period—Arthur—with whom he has sometimes been identified. As a result of the stand he made the English attack went to pieces, and until the latter half of the sixth century no notable advance was made by the invaders.

American Colonies, THE, were for the most part founded in the seventeenth century. The North American continent was first discovered in 1497 by John Cabot, to whom a patent was granted by King Henry VII; but the first attempts at exploration were made by the Spaniards in 1512 and onwards, on the coast of Florida. The French under Ribaut and Laudonnière from 1562 attempted to settle there, but were ejected by the Spanish, who founded the permanent settlement of St. Augustine in 1567, only ceded in 1763. The French also, soon after 1535, began to make settlement in the north, over Canada, Cape Breton, and Nova Scotia, then called Acadia. Nova Scotia was seized by Great Britain in the War of the Spanish Succession (1701-13), and Canada in the Seven Years' War (1757-63). [CANADA.] The first abortive attempt at English colonization was made in Newfoundland (1578) by Sir Martin Frobisher; then followed two by Sir Humphrey Gilbert (1578 and 1583), and a number of attempts from 1584 to 1603 by Sir Walter Raleigh, the first of which, in what is now North Carolina, was for a little while successful. At length, in 1607, the London company dispatched an expedition which effected the first permanent English settlement in North America on the James River in Virginia.

The thirteen colonies which afterwards formed the United States are usually divided into three groups—those of Virginia, New York, and New England.

(1) The Virginia group. Virginia, a name given by Raleigh to one of his unsuccessful attempts at colonization in honour of Queen Elizabeth, at first had a very struggling existence. Spanish antagonism, the rigour of the climate, together with the ignorance and the demands of the company's financiers, combined to hinder the progress of the colony, but after "the Starving Time," fresh immigrants and the cultivation of tobacco as a staple product brought prosperity. In 1619, the Virginian House of Burgesses assembled for the first time, but in 1624 James I dissolved the London company, and Virginia became a Crown colony. Indian massacres occurred in 1619, 1628, and 1644, but after the death of Opechancanough in 1646 followed thirty years of peace. Under the Commonwealth Virginia was practically independent in spite of its surrender to the Parliamentary commissioners in 1652. With the Restoration, Charles II restricted the commerce of the colony by Navigation Acts, while the assembly, which was extremely Royalist, persecuted Nonconformists and limited the suffrage. Finally, in 1672, the whole of Virginia was handed over for thirty-one years to Lord Colepepper and Lord Arlington. From these causes sprang a rebellion, known from its leader as "Bacon's Rebellion," in 1675, which was crushed two years later by Sir George Berkeley. Lord Colepepper was made governor for life, and the position of the colonists during the remainder of the Stuart period was disastrous. After the Revolution, however, Virginia recovered her prosperity, and the separate history of the colony consists chiefly in a series of disputes between the governors and the assemblies. Maryland, named after Queen Henrietta Maria, was originally part of Virginia, but was made into a separate colony by charter in 1632, when it was granted by Charles I to a Catholic, Cecilius, 2nd Lord Baltimore, under a charter which conceded equality to all Christian creeds. Its condition was one of great prosperity until the Civil War in England. Twice Baltimore's authority was overthrown, but in 1656 it was re-established by the Protector. Under William and Mary, the colony was annexed to the Crown, and Roman Catholicism became illegal; but in 1715 it was restored to the descendants of its founder, now become Protestants. The Carolinas were so called in the first instance by the French settlers in honour of Charles IX of France, and North Carolina was the scene of most of Raleigh's attempts at colonization, being then part of Virginia. The name was given to them afresh by Charles II, in whose reign the four scattered settlements there were granted by charter to eight proprietaries (1663), and a constitution known as the "Grand Model," prepared for it by Locke and Shaftesbury in 1667. It was, however, found unworkable; the colonists took matters into their own hands, divided themselves into two governments, began to import negro slaves and to treat the Indian tribes with great brutality. Finally, in 1729 the proprietors sold their rights to the Crown. Georgia, originally part of Carolina, was founded by Colonel James Oglethorpe, with some government assistance, as a refuge for insolvent debtors and persecuted Dissenters whom he rescued from English prisons. Its religious ideas were strongly influenced by the advent of some Moravian settlers, and by the visits of the two Wesleys and Whitefield. In 1739, threatened by the Spanish colony, Oglethorpe invaded Florida without success, and three years later had to repulse a counter-attack. Slavery was introduced into the colony about 1750, and two years later Georgia was annexed to the Crown.

(2) The New York group. Of these New York and New Jersey have a common history. Delaware Bay was discovered for the Dutch by Henry Hudson in 1609, and a settlement made at Albany in 1615. Soon New Amsterdam, at first a trading station of the Dutch West India Company, became a permanent town, and the island of Manhattan was bought from the Indians. After a struggle for existence with the English colonies, with the Indians, who nearly destroyed them, and with the Swedes, whose settlement, "New Sweden," was annexed in 1655, the state and city of New Amsterdam became very prosperous. In 1664, however, the country was granted by Charles II to James, Duke of York, who assumed possession without difficulty; New Amsterdam became New York, and the district between the Hudson and Delaware New Jersey. For a short period the Dutch recovered it again, but it was finally ceded to England in 1674. James II united New York and New England under the governorship of Sir E. Andros, but at the Revolution he was driven out, and the connexion dissolved. The rights of the proprietors in New Jersey were bought in 1682 by the Quakers, who surrendered their sovereign rights to the Crown in 1702. Pennsylvania, a district originally occupied by the settlement of New Sweden, was purchased from Charles II by William Penn in 1681, when its capital, Philadelphia, was founded, and a treaty concluded with the Indian tribes, 1683. Soon afterwards a boundary dispute arose with Maryland, which terminated in the cession, in 1701, to Penn of the tract on the south of the Delaware, which was known as the Delaware Territory, and which was attached to Pennsylvania, though with a separate legislature, till 1776, when Delaware declared itself an independent state. After the English Revolution Penn's proprietary rights were confiscated.

(3) The New England group. This was so named by John Smith, who made one of the two early and unsuccessful attempts to found a settlement there. In 1620, however, some Puritan Nonconformists, known as the "Pilgrim Fathers," sailed from England in the Mayflower, and, landing in Plymouth Bay, effected a permanent occupation. Their relations with the Indians were on the whole friendly, and fresh settlements were made, viz., New Hampshire (1622), Massachusetts in 1628, Rhode Island by Roger Williams (1631), and Connecticut colonized from Massachusetts from 1633 and onwards. This last settlement involved the New Englanders in two Indian wars, which resulted in the defeat of the Pequod and Narragansett tribes. The northern colonies were subjected by Charles I to severe restrictions, but in 1643 formed a military alliance known as The United Colonies of New England. Massachusetts soon proved itself the most powerful of the four colonies, and in 1676 crushed the Indians in a great war called, after the chief of the Wampanoags, "King Philip's War." New England was severely oppressed after the Restoration by Andros and other governors; Massachusetts forfeited her charter in 1684, but with the Revolution better times came. In 1690 the Massachusetts government instigated a war for the conquest of Canada, which lasted with a long interval after the Peace of Utrecht (q.v.) down to the close of "King George's War," i.e., the War of the Austrian Succession.

Such was the origin of the thirteen American colonies, of which it may be said that the southern, where slave-labour was universal with the exception of Georgia, were in the main aristocratic, and the northern sectarian and democratic. Their constitutions varied considerably, but as a rule they consisted of a house of assembly elected by the burgesses, or freemen, reinforced frequently by nominees of the proprietaries, a council nominated, generally, by the governor, but in Massachusetts by the freemen, and a governor appointed in Crown colonies by the king and proprietors, in the others by the council.

Before the commencement of the Seven Years' War in Europe, a border warfare known as the "French and Indian War" broke out in America, during which occurred the occupation of the Ohio valley by the French, who built there Fort Duquesne (q.v.), and the defeat of General Braddock and George Washington when they advanced against it, 1755. War was not formally declared until 1756, when the newly-built Fort William Henry was taken by the enemy. Towards the end of the war, however, fortune changed, and the great success of Wolfe in Canada was anticipated by the capture of Fort Duquesne (subsequently renamed Pittsburg) in 1758 by General Forbes supported by Washington. After the Peace of Paris (1763), the Virginians defeated the Ottawas and their allies in the last great war waged by the colonists against the Indians.

It is impossible here to do more than just hint at the events which from that date tended to embitter the relations between the colonies and England. There were, in the first place, the Navigation Laws (q.v.), dating from 1651, which regulated colonial commerce in the interests of British shipping and industry. These laws were largely evaded by smuggling until Grenville in 1764 began to enforce them and by a Revenue Act laid heavy duties on various imports, including wines. The Stamp Act (q.v.) (1765), followed, which imposed duties ranging from ½d. to £10 on printed publications, but it was received with such outcry and riots all over America that it had to be repealed in the following year, while a Declaratory Act at the same time insisted on the dependence of the colonies on the king and parliament of Great Britain. This conciliatory policy did not continue long. In the same year the New York Assembly was suspended for refusing to supply stores to the royal troops in obedience to the Quartering Act, and Charles Townshend's fatal Revenue Act, imposing import duties on paper, glass, tea, and other articles followed in the next year. The Massachusetts Assembly was dissolved in 1768 for refusing to rescind a letter of protest, and there was a collision between the citizens of Boston and the British troops, known as the "Boston Massacre," in 1770. Lord North's Tea Act (1770), which removed the restrictions except that on tea, postponed war for awhile, but the rejection of Dunning's petition for the removal of Hutchinson from the governorship of Massachusetts by the British government was followed, in consequence of the burning of the tea ships in Boston harbour, by the Boston Port Act (q.v.), the spark which set the incendiary forces of a century ablaze. [AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE, WAR OF; UNITED STATES, RELATIONS WITH.]

American Independence, DECLARATION OF (July 4, 1776), was a manifesto issued by the representatives of the thirteen United Colonies assembled in congress, and signed by all of them but one. The original draft was the work of Thomas Jefferson of the State of Virginia, which had in the preceding May issued a Declaration of Rights, and the alterations made were only matters of detail. It began with an imaginary picture of "natural" society, and an assertion of the original rights of man. The inference it drew from the hypotheses was that man has a right to upset any form of government which violates these "natural" conditions. The declaration went on to enumerate "the repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these States." The last paragraph sums up the position which the colonies claimed to hold in the future: "We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in general Congress assembled, appealing to the supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." Jefferson, in his indictment of George III, had inserted a paragraph charging him with waging "cruel war against human nature itself" by encouraging the slave-trade. This clause, however, was struck out, on account of the disapproval expressed by some of the Southern members; and thus congress committed itself to the inconsistency of asserting in one paragraph that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; while in the rest of the declaration it tacitly recognized, since it did not prohibit, the slave-trade. "The declaration," says Bancroft, "was not only the announcement of the birth of a people, but the establishment of a national government. The war was no longer a civil war; Britain was become to the United States a foreign country. Every former subject of the British king in the thirteen colonies now owed primary allegiance to the dynasty of the people, and became a citizen of the new Republic. Except in this, everything remained as before." In the history of political thought, the declaration has an important place. It embodied in a formal state-paper some of those theories on the equality of man, and the origin and character of human society, which were thrown into a popular shape by Rousseau. And the influence which this enunciation of the freedom and equality of all men exerted on the European peoples was immediate and profound, as well as lasting. The Americans largely owed their political theories to France; but the Declaration of Independence gave form and expression to the theories, and was thus a distinct step in the direction of that attempt to realize certain a priori political theories which formed one element in the French Revolution.

American Independence, WAR OF (1775-83). For some time before the spring of 1775 the relations between the colonies and the mother country were such that they were in a state of virtual hostility. Actual warfare began in April 1775, when the first blood was shed at Lexington, near Boston. Colonel Smith had been sent to destroy a magazine at that place, but was met by unexpected opposition. He succeeded only partially, and after a long and desultory skirmish retreated with considerable loss. In the north, Fort Ticonderoga, on Lake Champlain, was surprised; and its garrison surrendered the fort and its copious stores. On May 10, the congress assembled for its second session at Philadelphia, and prepared for war by voting 15,000 men as the "continental" army. While it was still sitting, a British fleet appeared in Boston Roads, and its arrival was the signal for General Gage to declare martial law. On June 17 was fought the battle of Bunker Hill (q.v.), which had been occupied by the Americans, and was carried on the third assault by the British troops, with great loss of life. Washington arrived soon after the battle to take command, and found the difficulty of the situation increased by want of ammunition and the insubordination of the men. The British were masters of the sea, and held Boston and Charleston, but were surrounded by the blockading lines of Washington. After the battle, Penn carried to England the Olive Branch Petition, the last attempt at reconciliation on the part of America. In the meantime an expedition was sent to Canada, which proved a total failure, and sacrificed many valuable American lives. In Virginia, Lord Dunmore exasperated public opinion by his many cruelties, and by offering inducements to the slaves to join the British side. Howe evacuated his position in March, and while he sent Clinton to co-operate with the fleet at Charleston, in Carolina, he himself threatened New York from Sandy Hook. The attack on Charleston was gallantly repulsed; and Clinton brought back his division to take part in the operations against New York. On July 4, the American congress adopted the Declaration of Independence. The attack on New York was long delayed; but on August 27, the British troops drove the defenders from Long Island; and it was only Howe's dilatoriness that allowed Washington to withdraw unmolested from New York. The British withdrew into winter quarters, and left Washington free to take advantage of their inactivity by surprising the garrison of Trenton, and soon afterwards acquiring nearly all New Jersey by winning a decisive battle at Princeton. Howe remained idle till June 1777, when he organized a threefold expedition, which was so far successful that after defeating Washington at Brandywine Creek, in September, he advanced unopposed into Philadelphia. "It is not General Howe that has taken Philadelphia; it is Philadelphia that has taken General Howe," said Franklin; and so it proved. While Washington passed the winter in his camp at Valley Forge, with resources gradually dwindling, his forces weakened by privations, fevers, and insubordination, and himself harassed by the petty jealousies of the government and his own officers, Philadelphia became "the Capua of the British army." Meanwhile, in New York State, Clinton captured Forts

Clinton and Montgomery, on the Hudson; but he did not proceed fast enough to co-operate with Burgoyne, who was advancing from Canada. On August 16, a detached division of his force had been destroyed at Bennington (q.v.), and Burgoyne himself, after being defeated at Stillwater, on September 19, was compelled to capitulate, with 3,500 men, at Saratoga, on October 17. The immediate result of Saratoga was a treaty between France and America, which was virtually a declaration of war by France against Great Britain. In June, Clinton, who had succeeded Sir William Howe as commander-in-chief, evacuated Philadelphia and retreated on New York. Washington opposed his march at Monmouth, and finished a severe contest master of the field, but not strong enough to offer any further resistance. In the north, operations were at a standstill through the embarrassed condition of both commanders, and the interest of the war centred in the south. In December, Savannah was taken by Colonel Campbell; and in January 1779 Lower Georgia was reduced by Colonel Prevost. In February, South Carolina was overrun, and Charleston was again threatened by the British, who spent the summer in alienating, by their ravages, the few loyalists that remained. In September, a combined French and American force failed to take Savannah. In the meantime, Washington had tired over his difficulties by maintaining a strictly defensive attitude. A large armament sent by Massachusetts to destroy a British outpost in Penobscot Bay was signally defeated and almost destroyed. In October 1779, Rhode Island was evacuated, and Clinton carried the troops, thus set free, to the attack of Charleston. It was not, however, till May 1780 that General Lincoln surrendered the town. Clinton returned to New York, leaving 5,000 men with Lord Cornwallis, who by the end of June reported that all resistance was at an end in Georgia and South Carolina. But strenuous efforts were made to save the South, and General Gates, with strong reinforcements, met Lords Cornwallis and Rawdon at Camden (q.v.), on August 16, and was signally defeated, with heavy loss. A small detachment, under Sumter, was also cut to pieces by Colonel Tarleton's cavalry, and the American army of the South seemed to be annihilated. But the severity of Cornwallis and Rawdon had alienated the population, and the inhabitants rose on all sides to oppose the advance of the former into North Carolina. During the winter Washington and Clinton maintained a passive attitude, each watching the other, and neither strong enough to take the offensive; and Washington's difficulties were increased by the disaffection of the troops, who had received no pay for ten months. On March 1, 1781, a crisis was averted by the signing of the Articles of Confederation, which united all the states by a common bond of union. In the south, Greene, who had succeeded Gates, put a new aspect on the war. In January 1781, he defeated Tarleton at the Cowpens; but, notwithstanding, Cornwallis assumed the offensive, and advanced northwards. Greene retreated 200 miles before Cornwallis, who was gradually leaving his base of supplies farther and farther in his rear. On March 15, Greene gave him battle at Guilford Court House (q.v.), and after a fierce struggle was driven from his position, but Cornwallis was so weakened that he retreated to Wilmington, though in April he again advanced to Petersburg, in Virginia. Meanwhile, Greene had organized a combined movement against South Carolina and Georgia. He himself was attacked and defeated by Lord Rawdon, who, however, was compelled by the simultaneous advance of Lee and Marion to retire to Charleston, and the greater part of South Carolina was again in American hands. In September, the battle of Eutaw Springs (q.v.) ended in a victory for the British, which was as disastrous as a defeat; and the British forces in the south were henceforth pent up in Wilmington, Charleston, and Savannah. From Petersburg Cornwallis had pursued Lafayette, who continued to elude him; but in the beginning of August, in obedience to orders from Clinton, he withdrew with his army to Yorktown, where he strongly fortified himself. At the same time a large French force joined Washington, and a southward march was begun. On August 31, Count de Grasse arrived with a French fleet in Chesapeake Bay, and a few days later beat off the British under Admiral Graves. On September 28, the whole army had completely invested Yorktown (q.v.); and on October 19, 1781, Cornwallis surrendered, with all his army and supplies. In March 1782, Rockingham again became prime minister; and by Shelburne, one of the new secretaries of state, Sir Guy Carleton was at once sent out to supersede Clinton, and to prosecute conciliatory measures. Franklin had been carrying on negotiations at Paris; but the American commissioners persisted in vain proposals, until it was discovered that France was playing a double game. The intrigues of the loyalists, together with the wretched condition of the American army, brought matters to a crisis, and, on November 30, preliminary articles of peace were signed. On December 5, the king announced his tardy and reluctant consent to the independence of the American colonies. In April 1783, congress, beset by the numerous discontents in the army, and threatened by mutineers, issued a proclamation for the cessation of hostilities. On September 3, the treaties were ratified, but various arrangements remained to be carried out, and it was not till November 25, 1783, that the British troops evacuated New York. The war had cost America little under $50,000,000, but she had gained independence at a price that was not too dear. Its result to Great Britain was the loss of half a continent and the addition of 115 millions to the national debt.

[W. R. S.]

American War (1812-15), arose out of the severe action of Great Britain towards neutral vessels in the war against Bonaparte. America, to retaliate, adopted the British policy, and laid an embargo upon all trade with both France and Great Britain. Some arrangement was attempted in 1809; but it was impossible to effect any permanent conciliation so long as Great Britain adhered to the orders in council of 1807, and Brougham's motion for their repeal came too late to avert the war. The war, which was declared without any great unanimity on the part of congress, in June 1812, was at first almost entirely confined to combats between detached frigates, in which the Americans were generally successful, and to attempts by the Americans on Canada, which always ended in failure. The cause of the British want of success in the naval actions was in some degree, no doubt, due to the excellence of their enemies' seamanship, and the picked crews they obtained by enlisting British deserters; but it was also partly owing to the superior size and armaments of the American frigates, which were in reality almost equivalent to the smaller ships of the line. The most celebrated of these detached actions was that between the Chesapeake and the Shannon. Great Britain carried on the war in a very desultory manner, until the close of the campaign in the south of France set free the Peninsular veterans, many of whom were shipped straight from Bordeaux to America. In the meantime, negotiations had been entered into at Ghent, which continued for more than twelve months before they resulted in the conclusion of peace. A large fleet, under Admiral Cockburn, was dispatched with the Peninsular troops, under General Ross, to make a combined attack by sea and land on the Chesapeake River. The expedition completely succeeded in the capture of Washington, the chief public buildings of which city were destroyed. A combined sea and land attack was made upon Plattsburg on Lake Champlain; but the flotilla, unaided by Sir George Prevost, who commanded the troops, was annihilated, and the enterprise had to be abandoned. A projected attack on Baltimore was also given up; but the state of Maine was almost entirely in the hands of the British. An expedition on a large scale was undertaken against New Orleans, under General Pakenham. Natural difficulties, greatly increased by the energy and ability of the American commander, General Jackson, met the armament at every turn, but were at length overcome by the alacrity of the men; and on January 8, 1815, a final assault was made. This was conspicuous no less for the intrepid gallantry of the troops on both sides, which caused a terrible loss of life, including that of Sir E. Pakenham, than for the utter mismanagement and want of unity among the British commanders. The assault was delivered in a number of separate attacks on different points, which failed from lack of co-operation and neglect of the most simple details. So great was the loss of the British that General Lambert, who had succeeded to the command, felt it desirable to withdraw. Had means of communication been more rapid in those days, this useless bloodshed would have been averted, since already, on the previous December 24, a convention had been signed at Ghent. This convention was merely a compromise, which left undecided all the chief points on which the two countries were at issue. The rights of neutrals were not touched upon, and the question of the frontier line between Canada and the United States was reserved for future negotiation.

Amherst, JEFFREY, BARON (1717-97), was present at Dettingen and Fontenoy, and fought under the Duke of Cumberland at Hastenbeck. In 1756 he was appointed to command the 15th Regiment of Foot, and two years later became major-general. In 1758 he was sent to America, and, acting in co-operation with Admiral Boscawen, effected the capture of Louisburg, the capital of Cape Breton. In the following year, in conjunction with General Prideaux, Sir E. Johnson, and Wolfe, he took Ticonderoga. In 1760 he reduced Montreal, taking the fort of Isle Royale on his way. Shortly afterwards he planned a successful expedition for the recovery of Newfoundland. In 1761 he was created a knight of the Bath, and appointed commander-in-chief and governor-general in America. In 1770 he was appointed governor of Guernsey, and in 1772 lieutenant-general of the ordnance. In 1776 he was raised to the peerage, with the title of Baron Amherst of Holmesdale. Shortly afterwards he was made commander-in-chief, and in that capacity quelled the riots of 1780, but was compelled to resign in 1782. He was again appointed in 1793, and accepted the rank of field-marshal in 1796.

Amherst, WILLIAM PITT, 1ST EARL (1773-1857), was the eldest son of Lieutenant-General Amherst, brother of the 1st Baron Amherst. On the death of the latter in 1797, he succeeded to the title. In 1816 he was appointed ambassador-extraordinary to the Emperor of China. On reaching the precincts of the imperial palace at Peking, and refusing to submit to the humiliating ceremonies of the emperor's court, he was refused admission to the presence of the emperor, and his mission was thus rendered useless. On his return voyage, the vessel he was in was wrecked off the island of Pulo Leat, from which he proceeded, accompanied by Sir Henry Ellis, in the boats of the wrecked ship to Batavia. He was subsequently appointed governor-general of India, and landed at Calcutta, 1823. He had no sooner assumed the government than he found himself involved in hostile discussions with the Burmese, which terminated within a year in a declaration of war. After two campaigns the first Burmese War ended in the Treaty of Yandaboo (q.v.). The progress of the Burmese War also gave rise to the Barrakpur Mutiny (q.v.), which was violently suppressed, and to several seditious manifestations in India. The governor-general was created Earl Amherst of Arakan in 1826. [BURMESE WARS.]

Amiens, MISE OF (January 23, 1264), was the award pronounced by Louis IX of France, to whom the question as to the obligation of Henry III to observe the Provisions of Oxford had been referred, on December 16, 1263. Since 1261 the baronial party had been reduced by desertions, and distracted by Prince Edward's attitude towards their cause in 1262, and by disputes and jealousies among themselves. This, with the fear of Louis openly supporting Henry III with troops, explains their forced assent to an arbitration which, from Louis's character and frequent services to Henry, could only issue one way. Influenced by his strong views as to the kingly office, and by the authority of the papal bull, possibly also by the negotiations already on foot for the papal appointment of his brother Charles to the crown of Naples, Louis, after some days' hearing of the pleadings on either side, and perhaps some hesitation, decided completely for his brother sovereign, annulled the Provisions of Oxford, especially as to the employment of aliens in England and the royal appointment of sheriffs; but after all left to the barons a loophole in declaring that his decision was not to annul any of the ancient charters or liberties of the realm. His pronouncement was too one-sided to be accepted by the baronage. In March the warfare broke out which ended for the time in Simon's victory at Lewes. Similar arbitrations were frequent about this period: even the day before Lewes, the barons offered to submit all, save the aliens question, to a new body of arbitrators; and a striking political song of the time shows the general feeling, even in the national party, that some compromise must be accepted. The award had the effect of still further reducing and weakening Simon de Montfort's party.

Amiens, TREATY OF (March 25, 1802), between Great Britain and France, put an end for the time to the great war which had lasted since 1793. The mutual losses during the preceding years, the complete supremacy of the British fleet, and the blow given to the northern alliance by the battle of Copenhagen, and, on the other hand, the defeats inflicted on Britain's continental ally, Austria, in 1800, and the Treaty of Lunéville, which she concluded with France on February 9, 1801, led both governments to desire a cessation of hostilities. The treaty was the work of the Addington ministry. In the previous October the preliminaries had been agreed to and signed, but some troublesome negotiations had to be gone through before it was finally ratified at Amiens, by Lord Cornwallis on the part of Great Britain, and by Joseph Bonaparte, assisted by Talleyrand, for France. According to it, Great Britain gave up all her conquests but Trinidad and Ceylon. The Cape of Good Hope was restored to the Dutch, but was to be a free port. Malta was to go back to the Knights of St. John, under the guarantee of one of the great powers. "Cet article est le plus important de tout le traité, mais aucune des conditions qu'il renferme n'a été exécutée; et il est devenu le prétexte d'une guerre qui s'est renouvelée en 1803, et a duré sans interruption jusqu'en 1814" ("Histoire des Traités," vi, 149). Porto Ferrajo was to be evacuated. On the other hand, the Republic of the Ionian Islands was acknowledged; the French were to withdraw from Naples and the Roman states; the integrity of Portugal was to be guaranteed; Egypt was to be restored to the Porte; and, finally, the Newfoundland fisheries were to be placed on the same footing as they held before the war began. These terms, as noticed above, were not considered sufficiently satisfactory by the British; consequently the peace was of very short duration, war being declared against Bonaparte in 1803.

Amir Khan, a Rohilla adventurer and free-lance, joined Jaswant Rao Holkar in his plunder of the territories of Sindhia and the Peshwa. During the Holkar War (1804) he waged a predatory warfare against the British and their allies. He became the recognized chief of the Pathans in India. In 1809 he sacked the town of Jabalpur. The British, however, interfered, when Amir Khan withdrew to Indore. During the Pindari war his army and his influence were alike destroyed by the British victories and the vigorous policy of Lord Hastings. He founded a dynasty, however, at Tonk, in Rajputana, and his Mohammedan descendant still exists as a protected prince, in consequence of a treaty made in 1817.

Amirante Islands, or ADMIRAL ISLANDS, so named after Vasco da Gama. A group of small coral islands in the Indian Ocean, south-west of the Seychelles. Occupied by the British during the Napoleonic wars, they were ceded by France to Britain in 1814. Until 1903 they were administered from Mauritius as part of the dependent Seychelles group, but since 1903 that group has enjoyed the status of a separate colony.

Amritsar, THE TREATY OF (April 25, 1809), was concluded between the East India Company and Ranjit Singh. Its provisions were that the British government should have no concern with the territories and subjects of the raja north of the Sutlej; and that the raja should not commit any encroachments, or suffer any to be committed, on the possessions or rights of the chiefs under British protection south of it.

Amritsar was the scene of serious riots in 1919, when banks and other buildings were burnt in protest against the Rowlatt Act. The disturbances culminated (April 13) in the death of 400 natives during Gen. Dyer's dispersal of an unlawful gathering.

Ancolites, THE, were a small British tribe, inhabiting probably part of Berkshire and Oxfordshire. They are mentioned by Caesar, but not by Ptolemy.

Ancrum Moor, BATTLE OF (February 1545), was fought in Roxburghshire, between the forces of Henry VIII, headed by Sir Ralph Evers and Sir Brian Latour, and the Scots, under the Earl of Angus, Scott of Buccleuch, and the Master of Rothes. The English were completely beaten, owing to their desertion by the Borderers who had joined them.

Anderida (ANDREDES-CEASTER), the name of a Roman fortress and settlement on the Sussex coast, which Camden placed at Newenden, in Kent, and others have considered to have been situated at Hastings, Chichester, or under the downs near Eastbourne, where, in 1717, Roman pavements, baths, and other remains were found. Most modern authorities agree in placing it on the site of Pevensey. According to the traditional story of the Anglo-Saxon conquest, the town was taken and burnt by the Saxons, under Ella, in 491, and all the inhabitants put to the sword. The Forest of Anderida (Andredes-weald) was the great belt of wood which stretched across south-eastern England through Hampshire, Kent, and Surrey, having a length of more than seventy, and in some places a breadth of over thirty, miles. The district still called the Weald may be held to mark out roughly the extent of the closer portions of this forest. [FORESTS.]

Anderson, SIR EDMUND (1530-1605), one of Elizabeth's judges, was employed in the prosecutions of the Jesuits, as queen's sergeant, 1581. In the following year he was made chief justice of the Common Pleas, an office which he retained until his death. In 1586 he tried the conspirators in Babington's plot, and was one of the commissioners at the trial of Mary, Queen of Scots, in October 1586. He subsequently tried Udall and Davison [MARPRELATE] for the issue of the warrant against Mary, Queen of Scots.

Anderton, WILLIAM (d. 1693), was a violent Jacobite pamphleteer, in the reign of William III. For two years he evaded the government agents, but was at length traced to a house near St. James's Street. He attempted to conceal his press, but it was discovered, together with a tract called "Remarks on the Present Confederacy and the Late Revolution." He was indicted for high treason before Treby at the Old Bailey. He denied that he had printed the libels. It was argued in his favour, moreover, that, as printing was unknown in the reign of Edward III, it could not be construed into an overt act of treason, and that, under the statute of that sovereign, a further distinction ought to be made between the author of a treasonable pamphlet and the man who merely printed it. He was, however, found guilty, and after being kept for some time in suspense, in the hope that he would betray his accomplices, was executed.

André, MAJOR JOHN (1751-80), was the son of a London merchant. Entering the army, he rose rapidly. He was appointed to serve under General Grey in America, and, when Sir H. Clinton succeeded Grey, was made adjutant-general. His tact and ability in this position caused him to be selected, in the month of September 1780, to superintend the negotiations for the surrender of West Point, on the Hudson River. The man he had to deal with on the other side was Benedict Arnold, an American general whose ambition was not satisfied with his position. An arrangement was made between the two for a meeting, to take place on the 17th, when Washington would be absent. The sloop which was carrying André to the meeting-place ran aground, and Arnold, on hearing of the mishap, refused to come down himself, but sent for André to come to him. André, on his return, found the sloop gone, and could not induce the boatmen to put off to her. He accordingly returned to Arnold, who persuaded him to exchange his uniform for a countryman's dress, and go back to the British lines by land. He accomplished the greater part of the journey in safety, and was already in sight of the British lines when he was arrested, and, in spite of Arnold's passport, carried back to Washington. A court of inquiry was forthwith held; André was found to be a spy, and sentenced to death. Washington was most unwilling to carry out the sentence, and he endeavoured to seize Arnold, the real offender, in order to be able to release André. But Arnold was not to be found; and on October 2 André met his fate with perfect composure. Washington himself declared that he was more unfortunate than criminal. His bones were afterwards brought to England (1821), and interred in Westminster Abbey.

Andros, SIR EDMUND (1637-1714), became governor of New York in 1674, and in 1685 was appointed governor of New England by James II. His administration was so unpopular with the colonists that, in 1689, all the colonies subject to him revolted, and he was sent back to England for trial, but acquitted. In 1692 he went out as governor of Virginia, holding the office with credit to himself and advantage to the country until 1698. He was subsequently governor of Jersey, 1704-6.

Angel was the name of a gold coin, first introduced into England in 1465. The value of an angel was originally 8s. 4d., but in Edward VI's time it was raised to 10s. It derived its name from the representation of the Archangel Michael which appeared on it. Angels continued to be coined down to the reign of Charles I. [COINAGE.]

Angevins, THE, sometimes called PLAN-TAGENETS. Anjou first became connected with England by the marriage, in 1127, of Matilda, daughter of Henry I, with Geoffrey V, Count of Anjou. Their son Henry became King of England, as well as Count of Anjou. Anjou remained united to England till 1205, when Philip Augustus conquered it, and annexed it to the French crown. For a short time, during the reigns of Henry V and Henry VI, it was again united to England; but in 1444 the latter king, on his marriage with Margaret of Anjou, ceded his claims. The Angevin rulers filled as great a space in the history of the Middle Ages as the Habsburgs have done in more modern times. The first Count of Anjou was Fulk the Red, who at the end of the ninth century was thus rewarded for his services against the Northmen. But by the twelfth century, when the petty counts had added Saintonge, Maine, and Touraine to their territory, men began to throw their origin farther back, into legends of an heroic champion, Ingelger, son of the wild Breton hunter, Tortulf; and accounted for that fitful energy and successful unscrupulousness which marked the whole race, by tales of an ancestress who had been an evil spirit or a witch in guise of a lovely countess. In Fulk the Good there appears the other side of the Angevin character: the literary, poetic, and artistic tastes strong in Henry III and Edward III, in Richard I and Richard II, and partly shared by Henry II and John; the capacity for business and the organizing power which distinguished Henry II and Edward I. So, too, the physical prowess of Richard I was an inheritance from his ancestor, Geoffrey Gregynon, the third count; while the fourth count, Fulk the Black, in his successful adventurousness, his restless pilgrimages to Jerusalem, his cruel revenges on his wife and son, seems to anticipate familiar stories of our own Plantagenet kings. With Fulk's son, Geoffrey Martel, the original Angevin line ends, to be continued by his daughter's marriage with Geoffrey of the house of Orleans. Their son, Fulk Rechin, "to whom alone it is due that the charge of trickery is urged against this family," brought upon himself many enemies and some disasters. The next count, Fulk the Young, had already secured Maine by marriage; and his successor, Geoffrey the Handsome, called Plantagenet, by his marriage with the Empress Matilda, heiress to Henry I of England, raised to its climax the long advancement of his house. Their son, Henry II of England, succeeded, in 1151, to Anjou, Maine, and Touraine from his father, and Normandy from his mother, and received, in 1152, Poitou, Limoges, Auvergne, Guienne, and Gascony, with Eleanor, the divorced wife of Louis of France. He was crowned King of England in 1154, made himself Lord of Ireland in 1171, exacted full homage from the captive King of Scots in 1174, and obtained for his second son, Geoffrey, the succession to Brittany by marriage. In 1170 Anjou was set apart, with Maine and Normandy, to form a temporary dominion for his eldest son, Henry, as Aquitaine was for Richard, Brittany for Geoffrey, and Ireland for John. But with the accession of John "Lackland," Anjou, like most of the other French possessions of the English crown, passed to Philip of France. Before this, Ralph de

Diceto, finding a pious explanation for the success which had now reached such a height, had declared "the prophecy made to Fulk the Good by the leper whom he carried so piously (and who was none other than the Saviour Himself), that his seed should prosper to the ninth generation, is being fulfilled." But most men spoke otherwise of the Angevins. Thus Giraldus Cambrensis, not content with recounting their diabolic origin, St. Bernard's prediction of their curse, and Richard Cœur de Lion's gloomy acceptance of it ("Let us fight; son with father, brother with brother; it is instinct in our family: from the devil we all came, to the devil we shall all go"), draws out furthermore the calamitous end of all the offspring of Eleanor, as a vengeance foretold for her parents' adulterous union; he recites the visions which warned holy men of the punishment reserved for Henry II's sins against the Church, and points the moral of the breakdown of that great king's empire, after all his subtle schemes and his toilsome, gainful life, before the divinely-favoured royal house of France. This indeed was the feeling which many men had about the Angevins; not without some reason. "They remind us," says Dr. Stubbs, "of those unhappy spirits who, throughout the Middle Ages, were continually spending superhuman strength in building in a night inaccessible bridges and uninhabitable castles, or purchasing with untold treasures souls that might have been had for nothing, and invariably cheated of their reward." There is, indeed, in all the English kings of this race, even in Edward I, something of this waste of vast energies upon futile results, which are no sooner grasped than they crumble in the hand. They had not, with all their insight, that rare gift of penetrating to the real heart of their age, the gift that only sympathy with it can give. Even Edward I could not see that he was, in his own despite, making of Scotland what he had already made of England—a self-governing patriotic nation. Yet to this dynasty England owes much. Henry II not only finally defeated the feudal class by superseding its privileged jurisdiction, by subduing it to his strong centralized system, by withdrawing its military basis, but he also set up a counterpoise to it in the revived popular courts, in the developed use of local juries, in the reconstituted national militia, in the legalized liberties of the towns. In a word, he began the varied training of the English people to co-operation in the work of government, which Edward I took up and carried on to its completion. Moreover, the very tyranny and neglect of the other kings were direct instruments of benefits never intended. Richard I's careless absence and heavy exactions left his ministers free to expand the principles bequeathed them from Henry II's reign. A still greater debt of gratitude we owe to the misgovernment of John, the worst of the line, inasmuch as it alone supplied the pressure which could force the baronage for the first time to act with and for Church and people, and produced the coalition which extorted the Great Charter. Henry III's shiftiness recalled this coalition into action so often that it became a permanent union. The second Edward's failure taught the nation that a vigorous kingship was still a requisite of political stability, to control the baronage, and to be the working head of the government. Edward III, in his selfish haste for the means of warfare and ostentation, sold away the Crown's power of extra-parliamentary interference in taxation and legislation. And Richard II's unsuccessful attempt at absolutism precipitated the downfall of prerogative, and gave constitutional government sixty years in which to strike its roots down too deep even for the destroying hand of Yorkist, Tudor, and Stuart kings to kill their latent life. And it is to the stern peace kept by the Angevin kings, to their repression of private justice and private war, to their firm but prudent attitude to the Church, that we owe the early rise of English literature and philosophy, the great age of the English Church, the enfranchisement of the peasantry, the populous independence of the towns, the growth of wool-trade and maritime commerce. All the Angevins were men of strong but conflicting character; none was without physical bravery, bodily activity, passionate emotions. Even the worst were men who superstitiously respected some form of religion, while they violated its spirit: like Henry II, jesting and drawing pictures at Mass, but dying before the chapel altar at Chinon; or Richard, after an agony of repentance for his sins, recovering, to plunge into them afresh. All inflicted, and in turn suffered, the ancestral curse, the pangs of filial or fraternal ingratitude. None is contemptible, save, perhaps, Henry III; none, save John, fails to win some sympathy. They must remain to us as they were to their contemporaries—a marvellous race, with many elements of greatness, with immense personal endowments, and a certain mysterious shadow hanging over all; whose work for the most part was destined to pass away, but through whom other results were brought about, destined to be of incalculable value and indestructible permanence.

Angles, THE. If identity of name and general probability be held fair proofs of identity of race, the Angles (Angli, Anglii), after whom this land is called, are first mentioned in the "Germania" of Tacitus (written about A.D. 98), as dwellers to the north of the Elbe. Fifty years later Ptolemy writes of them as occupying the left bank of the same river, apparently in the neighbourhood of the modern town of Magdeburg; but his statement seems to have been due to a geographical error. There can be little doubt that their real position was on the neck of the peninsula of Jutland, between the Jutes on the one hand and the Saxons on the other, in the area which is now known as Schleswig, but which an English writer of the tenth century (Ethelward) specifically names Anglia Velus, or Old England. Next to nothing is told us of the Angles in written history. Tacitus gives details of their worship of a goddess Nerthus ("Mother Earth"); and traditions of early Anglian kingship have survived in the stories preserved in both Danish and English literature of the warlike achievements of King Wermund and his son Offa (fourth century A.D.). Scholars are satisfied that they were of Low-German stock, and were closely akin to, yet distinct from, the Saxons, having a speech that, though essentially the same as the Saxon, showed more frequent marks of Scandinavian influence. But, like the Saxons, they were of pure German type; Roman civilization had never reached them. A legal code, the Laws of the Anglii and Werini, which has been attributed to various dates between the sixth and ninth centuries, and which presumably belonged to them, survives as a record of native usages in an intermediate stage between those of the "Germania" and of the earliest-known English system. In the sixth century, at various but unknown dates, and by many but unconnected expeditions, the Angles crossed over to Britain, and conquered to their own use the whole of the east coast from the Stour to the Firth of Forth. Pushing steadily their encroachments westwards, and slaying, expelling, or enslaving the bulk at least of the natives, they eventually formed the powerful kingdoms of Mercia, Northumbria, and East Anglia, with not a few smaller states; and fought and prospered until two-thirds of the conquered land had passed into their possession. This great movement is believed to have caused an exhaustive migration of the race. Bæda is our authority for a report that their fatherland was without inhabitants even in his time. Yet some will have it that their name still abides there in the local term Angeln. In Britain, though they just missed winning political supremacy, they fixed their name ineffaceably on the whole German population and the land it lived in. Many have speculated upon, but none gained any solid knowledge of, their distinguishing characteristics; it would seem, however, that wherever they differed from their Saxon brethren, they more nearly resembled their Danish cousins.

Anglesey (Latin, Mona; Welsh, Môn), an island and county of North Wales, was in the earliest times celebrated as the headquarters of Druidism, and therefore of resistance to the Romans. It was conquered by Suetonius Paulinus in A.D. 61, and again more thoroughly by Agricola in 78. On the withdrawal of the Romans, it became the centre of the power of the kings of North Wales, or Gwynedd, and Gildas calls the famous Maelgwn "insularis draco." Yet it was conquered, with much other Welsh territory, by Edwin of Northumbria (Bæda, ii, 5), and perhaps this Anglian conquest explains Nennius—"Mona insula quæ Anglice Englesei vocatur id est insula Anglorum." But Northumbria soon fell, and the "isle of the English" became Welsh again. It contained Aberffraw, the chief palace of the kings of Gwynedd. During the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, it was repeatedly ravaged by the Danes, who very probably effected permanent settlements in it. After the Norman Conquest, it became the battleground of Irish Dane, native Welsh, and Norman adventurers. Under William Rufus, it was more than once captured by Earl Hugh of Chester, when "the French reduced all to be Saxons" (Brut-y-Tywys, sub an. 1096). Again, in 1098, it was the scene of the exploits of Magnus of Norway, and of the death of Hugh. But it soon got back its liberty, and has retained to this day that intensely Welsh character ("Môn mam Cymru") which makes its name so misleading. It continued the home of the princes of North Wales until the fall of Llewelyn ap Gruffyd annexed the principality to the Crown, and it became one of the three shires into which Gwynedd was then divided. Anglesey, PEERAGE OF. In 1628 Sir Francis Annesley, of Newport Pagnell, Bucks, was created Baron Mountnorris in the peerage of Ireland, and Viscount Valentia. It was this nobleman who was arbitrarily tried and condemned to death by Strafford, when lord-deputy in 1635. Arthur, 2nd Viscount Valentia (1614-86), was, in 1645, sent as commissioner to Ulster to oppose Owen Roe O'Neill. After the death of Cromwell, he was president of the council of state, and took a considerable share in bringing about the Restoration. In 1660 he was created Earl of Anglesey in the peerage of England. During the life of Richard, 6th Earl of Anglesey, the title and estates were claimed by James Annesley, who asserted that he was the son of the 4th earl. [For the litigation which ensued on this claim, see ANNESLEY'S CASE.] As a result of this litigation, it was held that the earldom of Anglesey became extinct in 1761, on the death of the 6th earl. In 1815 the title of Marquis of Anglesey was conferred on Henry Paget, Earl of Uxbridge. [ANNESLEY, PAGET.]

Anglo-Egyptian Sudan. This region—bounded on the north by Egypt; on the west by the French Congo; on the south by the Belgian Congo and Uganda; and on the east by Abyssinia, Eritrea, and the Red Sea—was annexed to Egypt by Mehemet Ali, 1820-3. In 1881, under the Mahdi (Mohammed Ahmed), it revolted against Egypt, which at that date had passed under Franco-British protection. An Egyptian army under Hicks Pasha, attempting reconquest, was destroyed (November 1883). General Gordon (q.v.), sent by Britain (which in 1882 had assumed the whole burden of protection) to arrange for the evacuation of the Sudan, was killed at Khartoum (January 1885). The Sudan was recovered by Kitchener 1886-98, and placed under Anglo-Egyptian control (1899). The con-dominion was not formally affected by the British recognition of Egyptian independence in 1922. A subsequent demand made by the Egyptian Nationalists—and punctuated by the murder of the governor-general, Sir Lee Stack, on November 20, 1924—for the abolition of Britain's share in the administration of the Sudan, was rejected by the British government under Mr. Ramsay MacDonald.

Anglo-Saxon is a word which has been commonly applied to the aggregate of the Teutonic inhabitants of Britain who lived under native institutions, up to the date of the Norman Conquest; to the earliest form of the English language of which memorials survive; and, by a curious modern usage, to the sum total of the men of English speech and origin, to whatever nation they may belong, who are now scattered over the globe. The exact meaning of the word is not obvious. Freeman ruled "Anglo-Saxon" to be a condensation of the phrase "Angles and Saxons," construing both its component parts as nouns; whilst the ablest of his predecessors took the compound to mean "properly Saxons of England, as distinguished from Saxons of the continent," in which case the former half must have the force of an adjective. A scrutiny of the oldest forms of the word, whether English or Latin, would seem to justify the latter conclusion rather than the other. These forms are: in English, Ongol-Saxna and Angul-Seaxna; in Latin, Angul-Saxones and Angli-Saxones. Now, if Ongol cyn and Angel cyn be—as they usually are—construed into “English kin,” we cannot easily escape the necessity of construing Ongol-Saxe, Angul-Seaxe, and Angul-Saxones into “English Saxons.” And the Latin form seemingly admits of the same construction more readily than it does that of “Angles and Saxons.” Camden, therefore, and Kemble would appear to have had some show of reason, the first for naming (“Remains Concerning Britain,” pp. 24, 25) the inhabitants of England before the Norman Conquest “English-Saxons,” and their tongue “English-Saxon,” the second for calling his great work “The Saxons in England.” On the other hand, Freeman’s explanation would unquestionably, if language permitted it, be a far more satisfactory one. An Anglo-Saxon king was certainly a king of Angles and Saxons; the population he reigned over was composed of Angles of the north and east, as well as Saxons of the south and west. It is noteworthy, however, and perhaps significant, that the word was barely recognized by the men of the time to which it is now so often given; neither in the Chronicle, nor in Ethelweard—nor, indeed, in any purely native English historical record—is it once found. So long as these men were distributed into separate states, they looked upon themselves as Saxons or as Angles; when they fell into political unions they became, when contemplated as members of one community, Englishmen. When native writers would contrast West Saxons, East Anglians, and Northumbrians with their insular foes or continental neighbours, they had no other designation for them than “Engle,” no other for their speech than “Englisc.” This is the first reason that has moved some scholars to drop this and every cognate word altogether in writing, and use “English” as a descriptive epithet of every part of our history and every form of our language. The men whom Edgar and Harold ruled called themselves “English kin”; even Alfred, mere King of West Saxons as he was, is represented in the Chronicle as having been “King of all the English kin except the part that was under the wield of the Danes.” It is thought better to call the people as they called themselves. And undoubtedly the name Anglo-Saxon has led to misconceptions. It has misled people into thinking that their forefathers were not their forefathers, that the nation which was (temporarily) overthrown at Senlac was not essentially the same nation (in spite of the subsequent admixture of Danish and Norman blood) that, 750 years later, overthrew Napoleon, into thinking the language of the Chronicle a different tongue from the language of Carlyle. The “unhistorical and conventional term Anglo-Saxon conveys,” wrote Palgrave, “a most false idea of our civil history. It disguises the continuity of affairs, and substitutes the appearance of a new formation in place of a progressive evolution.” On the other hand, it is urged that as regards the language, at least, the name is necessary. To insist upon calling both the earliest and latest forms of our literary language “English,” is to assert identity where there is no identity; to prevent misconception, therefore, we must alter the name either of our own or of Alfred’s tongue. To do the second were not easy. But those earlier were the days of Angles and Saxons, if ever Angles and Saxons were; it surely ought to be at least fairly accurate to speak of their written language as the Anglo-Saxon form of English. And as to the people—seeing that during those days the Angles and Saxons, though coalescing, had not yet coalesced into a well-blended national unity—there is perhaps no intolerable error in describing their era as the Anglo-Saxon stage in the history of the English nation.

[J. R.]

Anglo-Saxon Chronicle is the name given to an historical document of the very first importance for the whole earlier portion of English history. It is in the form of annals, beginning with the Christian era, and terminating at various dates in the various copies, the most prolonged ending with 1154.

The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle is sometimes spoken of in the plural, as the Anglo-Saxon Chronicles; and each form of expression may be justified. The extant copies are so far alike in their contents that they can be regarded as variations of a common original, such hypothetical original being a compilation made in the ninth century. But the divergences are great even within this earlier part, and they tend in the continuations to a separation so wide as to produce in some cases a total independence of one another before the close. No one can really study this document without finding that there is at least equal propriety in the plural designation. [CHRONICLES.]

Manuscripts: There are six manuscripts, and some fragments of a seventh. These manuscripts have been designated by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G. They have each and all been identified (at least proximately) with one or other of the great religious houses of the southern part of the island. The first (A) has been assigned to Winchester; the second (B) was probably compiled at St. Augustine’s, Canterbury; the third (C) is manifestly from Abingdon; the fourth (D) appears to have been kept first in some northern monastery—perhaps Ripon, and later to have been sent south to the diocese of Worcester; the fifth (E) is from Peterborough, and is the most distinctly local of the whole series; the sixth (F), in the two languages Latin and Saxon, is from Canterbury. The seventh (G) is little more than a late copy of A. Of this last manuscript only three leaves have escaped the fire of 1731; but this loss is alleviated by the fact that this manuscript has been printed in full, and without admixture, by Wheloc (Cambridge, 1643). The places of deposit of these manuscripts are as follows:—A, in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge; B, C, D, F, G, in the Cotton Library, British Museum; H, in the Bodleian.

Of all these manuscripts, the Peterborough Chronicle (H) is the one of which the date and occasion of its production have been most satisfactorily made out. There was a great fire at Peterborough in August 1116, which destroyed all the monastery except the chapter-house and the dormitory; most of the town was burnt also. All the books were probably lost. Five years later, in 1121, we find this new Chronicle, which must have taken time to collect and compile, brought down to the date of the current year in one handwriting. A new hand continues the history in 1122. We know from other sources that this was counted an epoch at Peterborough. The Latin "Chronicon Petroburgense" (Camden Society), of which the object was to describe the administration of Abbot Robert, which dates from 1274, begins with 1122.

Division of Contents. The first five hundred years is a literary compilation, made at a comparatively late date, from Latin authorities; then follows a mixed period down to A.D. 735, in which the greatest part is from Bede, with a few original annals interspersed. These annals are the earliest material proper to the Saxon Chronicle. From this date onwards our Chronicles are the highest source for nearly all the history they contain. As a whole, the Chronicles belong to the south, but there is an important exception to this general character, in a series of annals between A.D. 737 and 806, embodied in the Worcester Chronicle (D), and manifestly derived from Northumbrian and Mercian sources, not otherwise known. The best and strongest writing appears with a natural propriety in the reigns of Ethelred and Alfred, the greatest crisis of the national life. In 1066 we may be struck with the fact that only one Chronicle (D) describes the battle of Hastings. A new and peculiar interest attaches to the later continuations of the Peterborough Chronicle (H). Here we see the language admitting gradual changes, and this goes with other points of internal evidence to link the records very closely with the events.

The earliest Latin historians are in close relation with the Saxon Chronicles. Florence of Worcester, who died in 1118, and whose latest annal is 1117, is for a large part of his work simply a translator of these Chronicles, especially of D. Asser is indebted to A. Henry of Huntingdon made large use of the Saxon Chronicles; and where he deviates from them his credit is deteriorated thereby. In general, it may be asserted that the existence of the Saxon Chronicles tends greatly to increase our confidence in the early Latin annalists. When we see how closely they have for the most part followed these vernacular annals, we are able to feel assured that in instances where vernacular authority fails, it was probably possessed by the Latin historian. This is the case where Simeon of Durham produces material that we have no other trace of, and which is therefore attributed to some lost northern chronicles.

Editions: After Wheloc, the next editor was Gibson (Oxford, 1692), who constructed a text by a collation of several manuscripts. Both Wheloc and Gibson gave Latin translations, and Gibson's is, for the time, excellent. The first translation into English was by Miss Gurney. It was privately and anonymously printed (Norwich, 1819). The next edition was in 1823, by Dr. Ingram, with English parallel to the Saxon. The next edition appeared in the folio "Monumenta Historica Britannica" (1848); and here the plan of a composite text was carried to its extreme perfection. In 1861 appeared the Rolls edition, by Thorpe, where all the texts are printed parallel in vol. i, with a translation in vol. ii. In 1865 came "Two Saxon Chronicles Parallel, with Supplementary Extracts from the Others," ed. J. Earle (Oxford). A later edition is that of C. Plummer (Oxford, 1892).

Anglo-Saxon Kingdoms.

Much that specially distinguishes the development of our national history is due to the fact that the English Conquest was carried out, not by a single people or confederation of peoples, but by independently-acting bodies of adventurers who were sprung from a common stock, and had been living for ages under similar institutions. For thus it came about that, when the success of the long series of separate invasions was assured, and at least half of Britain south of the isthmus of Forth and Clyde had received an English population, and passed under the sway of the English system of rule, this newly-subjugated land was necessarily divided among a large number of distinct, almost isolated, kingdoms and states. By the last quarter of the sixth century, all the eastern and southern coast, from Queensferry to Portland Bill, formed an exclusive sea-board for an Anglian, Saxon, Frisian, and Jutish territory, while a traveller might still make his way from Stirling to the shores of West Bay entirely through Celtic land, without having once to cross tidal water save at the point where the Severn broadens into the Bristol Channel. But the line that parted the two races was somewhat irregular, and, owing to incessant warfare between them, continually changing. In the upper reaches of the English side of the island, two kingdoms had established themselves—Bernicia and Deira, stretching, the former from the Forth to the Tees, the latter from the Tees to the Humber. These are both usually reckoned among the states founded by the Angles, though certain inquirers profess to have detected a Frisian element in their population. Below the Humber a cluster of Anglian settlements—Gyrwas, Lindiswaras, Mercians, Middle Angles, and others—covered a broader area of considerable but indefinable length, and would seem to have been already consolidating into the great kingdom of the Marchland, or Mercia. East Anglia, comprising the North-folk and the South-folk, filled the space between the lower half of the Mercian land and the eastern sea, and had the Stour as its southern boundary. Between the Stour and the Thames dwelt the East and the Middle Saxons, already, it would appear, united into a single kingdom. Westward to the lower Severn and the Forest of Selwood, and southward to the English Channel, spread the kingdom of the West Saxons, in which Surrey had probably been already included. The belt of cleared land that ran, thrust in between the huge forest of Anderida and the sea, from Chichester harbour to the Rother, formed the territory of the South Saxons. In these three southern kingdoms, therefore, we may find the Saxon constituent of the English race in Britain. The Kentish kingdom must have had pretty much the same limits as the present county of Kent. It represented, with the Isle of Wight and the part of Hampshire bordering upon Southampton Water, the area of Jutish settlement. It must also be borne in mind that, scattered over the newly-conquered country, there were not a few smaller states, such as the Hwiccas, the Gyrwas, the Meanwaras, either independent or owing an incomplete allegiance to one or other of the kingdoms; that Deira and Bernicia showed a disposition to combine into one state, had already once combined, and were sure to become soon permanently incorporated into a Northumbrian kingdom, while the co-existence of the two dioceses of Rochester and Canterbury, from the first organization of the Church in England, has led to the belief that there may have been originally two kingdoms in Kent, the earliest dioceses being generally co-extensive with kingdoms. As yet these several kingdoms and states—at any rate, the greater among them—held aloof from one another. Nor had they yet learned—perhaps the resistance of the natives did not allow them the necessary leisure—even to quarrel among themselves. In fact, each, as a rule, went about its business of fighting with the Welsh, of settlement and apportionment of the soil, of general organization, on its own forces only; they had few relations with one another; the conditions that made the first step towards union possible did not exist. It is true that Ella, the first king of the South Saxons, is represented by Bæda as holding a sort of imperium over the “provinces” south of the Humber; but this can scarcely be held to imply an actual territorial domination. An imperial king of the South Saxons in the fifth century is inconceivable. It seems more probable that the word “imperium” bears its accepted classical sense, and implies merely some kind of military confederacy among the invaders, under South Saxon leadership. In another century, however (c. 685), a great change had taken place. The southern part of Northumbria now stretched from sea to sea, its western border-line joining the coast at the head of Morecambe Bay. Mercia had grown considerably towards the south and the west; part of the lower Dee and half the Wye flowed within her confines, and her kings had pushed their conquests from Wessex almost to the Bristol Avon and the upper Thames. But Wessex had helped to make up for these losses by extending her western frontier to the mouths of the Parret and Exe, and by taking Wight within her kingdom. East Anglia, Essex, Kent, and Sussex, having no weaker race in their neighbourhood to encroach upon, were substantially unaltered.

Among these kingdoms a state of things had arisen which Milton in his ignorance of the real facts of the case only caricatures when he calls their mutual dealings “the wars of kites or crows, flocking and fighting in the air.” Strife and bloodshed were universal; no kingdom escaped them; even Christianity brought a sword; by far the greater number of battles that are henceforward recorded were fought between Englishmen. Indeed, the several peoples seldom came together save as enemies. And in the course of this warfare the vicissitudes of success were many and sudden; the irresistible conqueror of one day was the hunted fugitive or mangled corpse of the next. Ceawlin of Wessex, after years of nearly unbroken success, in which Briton and Jute went down before him, was, in 591, himself beaten down by his own subjects, and driven from his kingdom. Kent then rose to greatness under the guidance of Ethelbert, who won a sort of supremacy that is stated by Bæda to have reached the Humber, at the same time that another restless warrior, Ethelfrith, was making the might of Northumbria terrible to the north and west of that river. But Ethelbert shrank back, and Ethelfrith fell in battle before the growing power of Redwald, King of the East Angles; and for a few years Redwald held the foremost place among the kings that ruled south of the Humber. Then the turn of Northumbria came: in 630 the authority or influence of her king, Edwin, bore undisputed sway from the Forth to the English Channel, save in Kent alone. Then Penda of Mercia vanquished and slew Edwin (633), and seized a part of his supremacy; but was himself vanquished and slain in 655 by a successor of Edwin’s, Oswy, under whom Northumbria regained a fair share of her former ascendancy. But with the death in battle of her next king, Egfrid, in 685, the glory and greatness of the northern kingdom passed away for ever. For a hundred and forty years longer she kept her independence, and at times acted with vigour to the north and west; but her part in determining the destiny of England was played out. These were not futile fightings, after all. The kingdoms were merely taking the best way they knew of settling among themselves which was the most worthy to fulfil the trust of making England a nation. To bringing about this end, the newly-founded Church proved an effective ally. Her authority, being an undivided force that proceeded from a single centre, and her organization covering the whole land, gently drew the separate communities together, made the idea of unity familiar, and must have fostered a vague longing for political union. And the practical effacement of all the smaller kingdoms except East Anglia must also have done something to smooth the way towards this consummation. Essex sank, first into a Mercian, then, seemingly, into a West Saxon dependency; in the last quarter of the seventh century Ceadwalla of Wessex and his successor, Ina, reduced Sussex and Kent beneath their dominion; and these states, without as yet losing their separate existence, never again enjoyed a separate political life.

In the rivalry that was thus narrowed to Mercia and Wessex, the tide of success, during the greater part of the eighth century, ran decidedly in favour of the former; one of the Mercian kings, Ethelbald, was strong enough to fasten his yoke on the neck of Wessex itself. And, though the stubborn land succeeded in shaking off this yoke by a decisive victory at Burford (752), Offa, a later Mercian king, managed in his long reign (757-96) to raise his power to an unexampled height. Wessex was beaten in battle, and driven below the Thames; Essex and Kent had become almost parts of the Mercian kingdom; and in 793 a deed of the foulest treachery gave Offa the command of East Anglia. From the Welsh, too, the masterful king wrested the wide sweep of scrub-land that lay round Pengwern, and on the site of this place built the town of Shrewsbury (Scrobbesbyrig, Scrub-bury), and made the dyke that is still called after his name the western limit of his kingdom, thus bringing the area of England almost to its farthest expansion on the side of Wales. But the sceptre was destined for Wessex, notwithstanding. Pressed down from her northern frontier, and forced, as it would appear, to give up Surrey and Sussex also, she never paused in her slow advance towards Cornwall. Somerset was completed, and the making of Devonshire begun; by the end of the century the Exe, from source to sea, was a West Saxon river. With the first years of the next, Ecgbert, a wise and valiant descendant of earlier kings, came from exile in Charlemagne's dominions, to take on himself the rule of the kingdom; and under his direction the West Saxons went steadily forward on the path that led to national greatness. Ecgbert was long content to repel Mercian invasion, and to push his conquests farther into the Cornish peninsula; in his reign Devon reached its final limits, and the men of Cornwall were driven to accept him as their overlord. At length, in 825, on the field of Ellandune, Mercia and Wessex measured their strength for the last time: and there the might of Mercia was broken. Ere the year was over, Sussex and Surrey had rejoined, Kent and Essex been added to, the victorious kingdom; and the East Anglians had successfully revolted from Mercia, and put themselves under the protection of Ecgbert. The crowning year of triumph for Wessex was 829; then a single campaign made her king master of Mercia, and awed Northumbria into submission; from Edinburgh to Land's End he was supreme lord or immediate king. Of the nature and measure of this West Saxon supremacy, no exact knowledge can be gained; doubtless it gave the right to demand help in war, and a commanding voice in the higher concerns of each kingdom. An unlooked-for force created the conditions that converted this supremacy into actual kingship. Northumbria, Mercia, and East Anglia, though bound to Wessex, still remained distinct kingdoms, each with its dependent king. These kingdoms the Danes laid in ruins; and after the narrow escape of Wessex from the same fate, the line of the Lea, the Ouse, and Watling Street divided England into two political systems, Wessex and the Danelagh, that were practically two hostile camps. Between these, after Alfred's death, the battle was fought out to the bitter end; and this end, when it came—as it did in the reign of Edgar (959-75)—made the whole of England a single kingdom. But either in this or in Canute's reign, the country between the Forth and the Tweed—the Lothians, as it is called—fell, or was torn, away from England: under what circumstances there is no record to tell us.

Angoulême, or ANGOUMOIS, a province in the south of France bounded on the north by Poitou and on the south by Périgord, was united with England by the marriage of Henry II with Eleanor of Aquitaine. In 1220 it passed into the possession of the Count de la Marche, on his marriage with Isabella of Angoulême, widow of King John. In 1303 it escheated to the French crown on the death without issue of Count Hugh XIII. By the Treaty of Brétigny (q.v.) in 1360, it was restored to England, only to be reconquered by the French in 1372.

Angria was a pirate-chief, who occupied the rock of Gheria, off the Malabar coast of India. His depredations had caused him to be regarded as the scourge of the adjacent seas. Clive, on his return to India, in 1756, and Admiral Watson, with the British fleet, attacked and destroyed his station.

Angus (the older name for the counties of Forfar and Kincardine) was the territory of one of the great Pictish tribes or sub-kingdoms, and was governed by a succession of Celtic "mormaers," one of whom, Dufugan, is styled "Comes" in the reign of Alexander I. After him there is a succession of five Celtic earls. Maud, the heiress of the last of these, carried the earldom by marriage first to the family of the Comyns, then to that of the Umfreilles, lords of Prudhoe and Redesdale in Northumberland. In 1298-9 Gilbert de Umfreville was summoned to parliament as Earl of Angus. It is probable, however, that this was merely a courtesy title, and that the Umfreilles were in reality summoned in virtue of their English barony. The last of the family to be summoned as Earl of Angus was Gilbert, who died in 1381. In the meantime their Scottish estates had been confiscated by Robert Bruce and bestowed upon the Stuarts of Bonkyl, who are styled earls of Angus from 1329 onwards. In 1377, on the death of Thomas Stuart, the Scottish earldom passed to his daughter and heiress Margaret. She had by William, 1st Earl of Douglas, an illegitimate son George, in whose favour she resigned her estates in 1389. [DOUGLAS, THE PEERAGE OF.]

Angus, McFergus (d. 761), obtained the Pictish throne, 731, after defeating the previous king, Alpin, at the junction of the Tay and the Earn, and annihilating the forces of Nectan MacDerili at Loch Inch. In 732 Angus invaded Dalriada, and drove its king to Ireland. In 736 he again laid waste the kingdom of the Scots, taking the capital, Dunad, and throwing Dungal into prison; this devastation was repeated in 741, when Dalriada for some years sank into the position of a Pictish dependency. Shortly afterwards Angus entered into an alliance with Eadbert of Northumbria against the Britons of Strathclyde, who submitted in 766.

Anlaf (or OLAF) Cuaran (d. 980), was the son of Sihtric, Danish King of York. After his father's death Anlaf went to Dublin, but soon left Ireland for Scotland, where he married the daughter of Constantine, King of Alban. It was this match which probably provoked Athelstan's invasion of Scotland in 933. Anlaf next appears as his father-in-law's ally at Brunanburh (q.v.) in 937. In 942 he was chosen to succeed his cousin Anlaf Guthfrithson as King of York, but his position was contested by Regnald Guthfrithson, his cousin. In 944 Edmund drove both claimants from their kingdom; but Anlaf again appeared in arms in 949, and was received by the people, till in 952 he was driven abroad for the last time by his turbulent subjects. He now ruled in Dublin for several years, and commanded at the great battle of Tara; but his defeat there by the high king of Ireland seems to have wrought a change in the old warrior, for he started the same year on a pilgrimage to Iona, where he died.

Anlaf (or OLAF) Guthfrithson, King of Dublin and Northumberland, succeeded his father as King of Dublin in 933. He came with a great force of Irish and Danes to the assistance of his cousin Anlaf Cuaran at the battle of Brunanburh (q.v.), whence he fled, as the English song of triumph tells us, "over the dark water Dublin to seek." On the death of Athelstan (940) he was called by the Northumbrians to rule over them. He roused the Five Boroughs (q.v.) against Edmund and captured Tamworth; but being beset at Leicester made peace with the English king. He died in 942.

Annates, or FIRST-FRUIT, were the first year's income of newly-appointed archbishops and bishops, which was exacted by the pope before he would confirm the election. Their exaction was unpopular, and a statute of Henry IV's reign had referred to them as "a horrible mischief and damnable custom." It was not, however, until 1532, in the course of the conflict between Henry VIII and the pope, that a bill was brought in declaring, that whereas "annates had risen, grown, and increased by an uncharitable custom, grounded upon no good or just title, and the payment thereof was enforced by the restraint of bulls, against all equity and justice," the payment of such annates should be discontinued, and that any bishop making such payments should forfeit all his lands and goods to the king, whilst any bishops whom the pope refused to consecrate for non-payment of first-fruits, should be consecrated in England, and "should enjoy their spiritualities and temporalities as completely as if they had obtained their bulls from Rome." The operation of this act was, however, suspended for a time, as Henry waited to see whether the threat would suffice to induce the pope to grant him the wished-for divorce from Katharine of Aragon. When no concessions were forthcoming the rupture with Rome took place, and the statute was re-enacted in 1534, whilst a clause was introduced providing that archbishops and bishops should not "be presented to the Bishop of Rome, otherwise called the Pope, for confirmation, or sue out any bulls at his court; but that they should be elected by congé d'élire." In consequence, the payment of episcopal first-fruits to the pope ceased from this time, but they were paid instead to the Crown. In 1704 the profits from this source were appropriated by the queen to the assistance of the poorer clergy. This was the origin of "Queen Anne's Bounty" (q.v.).

Anne, QUEEN (b. February 6, 1665, s. March 8, 1702, d. August 1, 1714), the last of the Stuart sovereigns, was the second daughter of James II (while Duke of York) and Anne Hyde. She was bred a Protestant by the express command of Charles II, under the care of Dr. Henry Compton, afterwards Bishop of London. While she was still very young, her hand was sought by George Lewis, electoral prince of Hanover, who eventually succeeded her on the English throne; but in 1683 she married George, brother of Christian V, of Denmark. Prince George was a personage completely without talent, capacity, or ambition, so that throughout his life his political position was altogether insignificant. Already, before her marriage, Anne had conceived what were perhaps the two strongest emotions of her life. The teaching of Compton, a zealous Anglican, who had suffered for the cause of Church and king in the rebellion, had made her a steadfast and devoted adherent of the Church of England. The design of altering the succession to the throne, on condition that Anne would become a Roman Catholic, entertained by the French and English courts, was nullified by the steady attachment of the princess to the Protestant faith; and Anne had already conceived that violent affection for Sarah Jennings (who became in 1678 the wife of John Churchill) (q.v.), which lasted during the greater portion of her life. It was owing chiefly to the Churchill influence that Anne consented to notify to William of Orange her approval of his landing, and that in the crisis of affairs she fled from Westminster to Dorset's house in Epping Forest. In spite of the efforts of her uncle, Clarendon, she made no objection to the accession of William III and Mary. She was herself declared heir to the throne, failing issue to the sovereigns, and an allowance of £50,000 settled on her. Soon after the Revolution she gave birth to William, Duke of Gloucester, the only one of her numerous children who survived infancy (and he died in 1700 at the age of eleven). Anne gradually became completely estranged from the king and queen, and a party, of which the Churchills were the heads, was formed about her in opposition and known as the "Princess Party." One of the points this party constantly pressed forward was an increase in Anne's income. In 1691 Anne's estrangement from the king went so far that she wrote a letter to James II, begging his forgiveness. On the disgrace of Marlborough, in 1692, Anne quarrelled with her sister, the queen; her guard of honour was taken from her, and she was treated with injudicious coldness and disrespect. After the death of Mary, a formal reconciliation was made, through the mediation of Somers, but there was little friendship on either side. Anne resided at St. James's Palace during the remainder of William's reign, with some of the state befitting the heiress to the throne.

With the death of William in 1702, Anne became queen, and reigned over England during a period of twelve years crowded with important events, and singularly distinguished by illustrious men. The earlier portion of the period was that in which the influence of the Marlboroughs prevailed; in the second that of their opponents was predominant. By the year 1702 the Tories, Godolphin, Nottingham, Normanby, and Pembroke, had supplanted the great Whig ministers, who were chiefly responsible for the Revolution Settlement. The war was entered upon with vigour, under the auspices of Marlborough and Godolphin; a commission was appointed to draw up terms of union between England and Scotland; and the union of the two rival East India Companies accomplished. The chief military events of the year were the capture of Venloo, Ruremond, and Liège, and the expedition against Vigo Bay. In 1703 violent opposition was offered in the Scots parliament to the Union scheme. The Methuen Treaty was concluded with Portugal. Queen Anne's Bounty (q.v.), for the augmentation of the livings of the poorer clergy, was instituted. Next year some changes occurred in the ministry. The high Tories, Nottingham, Jersey, and Seymour, who thwarted Marlborough's war policy, were dismissed, and their places supplied by the moderate Tories, Harley and St. John. In July Gibraltar was captured, and Marlborough won the great battle of Blenheim in August. An attempt to tack the Occasional Conformity Act to the Land Tax Bill was defeated in the Commons. The Aylesbury election case (q.v.) threatened a permanent breach between the two bodies of the legislature. In 1705, Peterborough, in Spain, captured Barcelona, and established the authority of Charles II in Catalonia and Valencia. Commissioners were appointed by the Scots parliament to discuss the terms of the Union in London. It was gradually becoming evident that Marlborough would have to rely on a Whig ministry. In 1707 the chief event was the consummation of the Union with Scotland. The royal assent was given in March. Marlborough gained the battle of Ramillies, thereby driving the French from the Netherlands; but in Spain Charles II had to evacuate Madrid. Mrs. Hill now began to supplant the Duchess of Marlborough in the royal favour, and the influence of Harley began to be appreciable. He instituted a series of intrigues in company with St. John, with a view to driving the Whig ministers from office. Meanwhile Louis had made offers for peace, which were rejected. In the following year Harley's intrigues, which took the form of an attack on the naval administration, were discovered, and he was forced to resign. On the failure of a composite ministry, the Whig junta came into power. The military events of the year were unfortunate. In Spain the allies were utterly defeated at Almanza; nor was Eugene's attack on Toulon successful. In 1708 the Pretender made an unsuccessful expedition to Scotland; and Marlborough, in Flanders, gained a great victory at Oudenarde. The queen suffered great grief from the loss of her husband, to whom she was sincerely attached. Meanwhile, it was evident that the Whig ministry was insecure. Once more Louis offered to treat. His terms were rejected; and Marlborough won a bloody victory at Malplaquet. In 1710 important changes took place at home. Mrs. Hill, now Mrs. Masham, had completely supplanted the Duchess of Marlborough in the royal favour.

The nation was weary of the war; and the injudicious prosecution of Dr. Sacheverell by the Whig ministry produced a violent outcry against them. Sunderland and Godolphin were dismissed, and Harley was entrusted with the formation of a Tory ministry. The conference at Gertruydenberg resulted in nothing. In Spain the allies gained victories at Almenara and Saragossa, and Charles was once more established in Madrid; but these results were neutralized by the defeat of Stanhope at Brihuega. It soon became evident that the new ministry had determined on a peace policy, and that some of them, at all events, were willing that the Stuarts should be restored. The chief event at home in 1711 was the formation of the South Sea Company. Harley, now exceedingly popular on account of Guiscard's attempt to stab him, rapidly opened negotiations for peace. Marlborough's campaign in the year was resultless. On his return he was violently attacked in parliament, and deprived of his office. Twelve new peers were created, in order to "swamp" the majority in the House of Lords. In 1712 Ormonde was placed in command of the army, with instructions to attempt nothing. A conference was opened at Utrecht, and the terms of peace were laid before the House. In July Ormonde separated from the allies. Marlborough quitted England in November, and remained abroad until the queen's death. The Treaty of Utrecht (q.v.) was signed in March 1713. Meanwhile, the failing health of the queen threw open the succession question. Harley was evidently unwilling to consent to a return of the Stuarts; but no such scruples restrained St. John, now Viscount Bolingbroke. The remodeling of the army was entrusted to Ormonde, but the scheme failed owing to the neglect of Harley to supply the necessary funds. As a blind, Bolingbroke introduced into the House a proposition that the Protestant succession was in no danger. The design of the Whigs to bring the Electoral Prince over to England was thwarted by the wise caution of George of Hanover, and by the evident dislike of the queen to such a step. Bolingbroke now saw that he must drive Harley from office; he therefore introduced his Schism Bill, which Harley, who was of Low Church principles, could not support. He was accordingly dismissed. Everything was now in Bolingbroke's favour, but his plans were foiled by the fatal illness of the queen. As she lay on her death-bed, she was induced by a deputation of the council to entrust the lord treasurer's staff to Shrewsbury, now firm in his attachment to the house of Hanover. There is considerable reason, nevertheless, to believe that Anne would have consented to her brother's succession to the throne if only he would have changed his religion.

Anne was very popular with the nation, but this, perhaps, was due rather to the fact that she was the last of the dynasty, which, in spite of its faults, retained a strong hold on the sympathies of Englishmen, than to any special merits of her own. She was a woman of somewhat narrow intellect, violent prejudices, and weak judgment. Her strongest political passions were devoted attachment to the Established Church, and dislike to the Whigs, whom she regarded as the enemies of legitimacy and of royalty itself; but, except when her prejudices and her obstinacy were roused, she had little strength of will, and was easily led by her female favourites. While she was under the fascination of the Duchess of Marlborough, she lent herself readily to the great schemes of the duke; when, subsequently, the influence of Abigail Hill was completely established over her, she allowed herself with no less willingness to countenance the projects of Harley. Of taste and wit she had little, and she showed scarcely any conception of the great intellectual movement which has rendered her reign an illustrious period in English literary history. She had, however, some compensating qualities. Her private life was exemplary; she was a good wife and a devoted mother. Her long and much-tried friendship with her haughty favourite was, at any rate, a testimony to the goodness of her heart and the strength of her affections. "Scarce any person," says Lord Stanhope, "ever endured more for a friend, or from a friend." As applied to her private character, at least, the familiar appellation of "good" Queen Anne is, perhaps, not undeserved.

Anne Boleyn, QUEEN, second wife of Henry VIII (1507-36), was the daughter of Sir Thomas Boleyn, who married the Lady Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the Duke of Norfolk. She was in her youth taken by her father to the French court, but returned in 1522. She is described as a little lively brunette, with long black hair and beautiful eyes. She was the object of much flirtation in the English court, and Henry VIII, beginning from idle gallantry, advanced to an uncontrollable passion for her. Honours and emoluments were showered upon her father. At last, in 1527, Henry VIII resolved to divorce Katharine that he might marry Anne, whom he lodged magnificently in his palace. The momentous proceedings to obtain a divorce were entrusted to the charge of Wolsey, and when, in 1529, his failure was manifest, his fall rapidly followed. Henry VIII still pursued his efforts to obtain a divorce, and meanwhile went about the country in company with Anne Boleyn. This created much indignation amongst the people, and the mode of life of the king and Anne Boleyn was generally regarded as dishonourable. The vacillation of Pope Clement VII had lasted too long for his firmness to be successful; when, at the end of 1532, he issued a brief, bidding Henry to take back Katharine, and forbidding him to marry Anne Boleyn, Henry VIII had gone too far to retrace his steps. On January 25, 1533, he was privately married, and the new archbishop (Cranmer) pronounced his divorce from Katharine. The marriage with Anne was then avowed, and confirmed by the archbishop, and the new queen was crowned in June. On September 7 she gave birth to a daughter, Elizabeth. But Anne Boleyn had only a brief enjoyment of the position for which she had waited so long. On January 7, 1536, Katharine of Aragon died, and Anne Boleyn could not conceal her delight. Shortly afterwards she brought into the world a dead child, to the king's great disappointment, as he wished for a male heir. He looked on Anne's conduct with suspicion. The light-heartedness and brilliancy which had once attracted him now seemed to be culpable frivolity. On May-day the king abruptly left some games at which he was present with the queen, and on the next day Anne was committed to the Tower on the charge of treason and adultery. Her brother, Lord Rochford, Henry Norris, Smeaton, a musician, and Brereton and Weston, gentlemen of the bedchamber, were apprehended as her accomplices. Smeaton and Norris made some confessions of guilt, but it is hard to estimate how far they were true. That Anne was frivolous, and had behaved with some indecorum, may be admitted; but opinions must continue to differ as to the degree of her guilt. She was arraigned before a commission of twenty-seven peers, presided over by the Duke of Norfolk. The evidence of the confessions was regarded as sufficient for her condemnation. Cranmer was induced to declare her marriage null and void, and on May 19, 1536, she was beheaded.

ANNE, DAUGHTER OF EDWARD IV (1475-1511), was married in 1495 to Lord Thomas Howard, son of the Earl of Surrey, by whom she had one son, who died in infancy.

ANNE, DAUGHTER OF RICHARD, DUKE OF YORK (d. 1475), was married first to Henry

Holland, Duke of Exeter (q.v.), from whom she was divorced, and secondly to Sir Thomas St. Leger.

ANNE NEVILLE, QUEEN (1456-85), wife of Richard III, was the younger daughter of Richard Neville, the great Earl of Warwick. In 1470 she was betrothed (though it is doubtful whether she was actually married) to Edward, Prince of Wales, son of Henry VI. After his death at Tewkesbury, in 1471, she was sought in marriage by Richard, then Duke of Gloucester. Clarence, who had married her sister Isabel, strongly opposed the match, and disguised her as a cookmaid; but she was discovered by Richard, married to him in 1473, and bore him a son in 1476. In 1483 she was crowned queen with Richard. In 1484 her young son died, "an unhappy death," according to the Continuator of the "Croyland Chronicle"; and the queen did not long survive him, dying on March 16, 1485.

ANNE OF BOHEMIA, QUEEN (1366-94), wife of Richard II, daughter of the Emperor Charles IV, was married to Richard in 1382. Her sweet and gentle disposition earned for her the title of "Good Queen Anne," and her influence seems to have had some effect in mitigating the violence and disorder of her husband's reign. It is said that the cruel reprisals taken on the Kentish revolt were discontinued at her intercession; and that the quarrel between the king and the citizens of London, which culminated in the riot of 1392, was healed by her mediation. In one instance only does her influence appear to have been bad. She is reported to have worked for the divorce of the king's favourite, de Vere, Earl of Oxford, from his wife, who was connected with several of the great noble families, in order that he might marry one of her Bohemian ladies. Anne of Bohemia was said to be well versed in the Bible, and to have read it in a Bohemian or German version; but there is little evidence to support the view that she and her attendants, English and Bohemian, actively favoured Wyclif. There is, however, little doubt that the connexion between England and Bohemia, brought about by her marriage, did much to make the writings of Wyclif better known on the continent, and especially in Germany. The proscriptions of the "Merciless" Parliament (q.v.) of 1386 were specially directed against the queen's attendants, and King Richard afterwards declared, at the trial of the Earl of Arundel, that the queen was three hours on her knees before the earl, pleading with tears for the life of Sir Simon Burley, one of her esquires.

Anne of Burgundy (d. 1432) was the daughter of John Sans Peur and sister of Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy. She was married in 1423 to John, Duke of Bedford (q.v.).

Anne of Cleves, QUEEN (1515-57), fourth wife of Henry VIII, was the daughter of John, 3rd Duke of Cleves, by Marie, daughter of William, Duke of Jülich, Berg, and Ravensberg. Anxious to secure for England the goodwill of the Schmalcaldic League, Thomas Cromwell, after the death of Jane Seymour, proposed to Henry an alliance with the German Protestant princes by means of a marriage with Anne of Cleves; and the king, who was greatly pleased with a portrait he received of his intended bride, willingly lent himself to Cromwell's proposition. Landing at Deal December 27, 1539, Anne proceeded to Rochester, where Henry first saw her. Her person, however, failed altogether to come up to the expectations he had formed from her portrait. He called a council to consider if there was any possibility of getting out of the marriage engagement to her without involving himself in a quarrel with her family. A sort of prior contract between Anne and Francis, son of the Duke of Lorraine, was, however, the only respectable objection to the marriage that could be raised; and this, when named to the Duke of Cleves's ambassadors, was completely disposed of by an offer on their part to produce a formal renunciation of the contract. Henry was therefore obliged to submit to the distasteful marriage, which was celebrated at Greenwich on January 6, 1540. For a time Henry was able to treat his queen with a fair show of respect; but after the execution of Cromwell, the original proposer of the marriage, he sought no longer to conceal his feeling of aversion for her. The marriage was finally annulled, and the decision to that effect duly ratified by parliament, on three grounds, viz., (1) that she had been previously contracted to the Duke of Lorraine; (2) that he, Henry, had not inwardly given his consent; (3) that the marriage had never been consummated. As some consolation to Anne for this loss of position, it was arranged that she should be treated as an adopted sister, and that she should enjoy the honours of precedence next to the queen and the king's daughter. These terms, and the further promise of an annual settlement of £3,000, procured Anne's willing assent to the proposed divorce. She passed the remainder of her days in England, where she died at her palace of Chelsea, July 16, 1557. By Queen Mary's orders her funeral was solemnized in Westminster Abbey with regal splendour.

Anne of Denmark, QUEEN (1574-1619), wife of James VI of Scotland and I of England, was the second daughter of Frederick

II, King of Denmark, and was married to James in 1589. She seems to have been at one time a Roman Catholic, and at her coronation as Queen of England she refused to receive the sacrament according to the rites of the English Church. But she took little part in politics, and the Roman Catholic party quickly found it was useless to hope for anything from her. With the exception of some occasional interference in the cause of a favourite, she seems to have contented herself with entertaining the king and his courtiers with balls and masques. She was never on very good terms with her husband, and took great delight in making him jealous and exposing him to ridicule. She is reported to have been on rather intimate terms both with the Earl of Moray, who was assassinated (it is suggested with the king's connivance) by the Earl of Huntly, and with Alexander Ruthven, brother of the Earl of Gowrie, who met with a similar fate. The most pleasant fact that is recorded about her is her intercession for Sir Walter Raleigh's life. Her character has been very differently represented, but perhaps Hume's estimate, that she was "a woman eminent neither for her vices nor her virtues," is on the whole the fairest one.

Annesley, ARTHUR, 5TH EARL OF ANGLESEY (d. 1737), held several posts in Ireland in the reign of Queen Anne. In 1711 he hastened from Ireland to take part in the debates on the war, and commented severely on the exhaustion of the country, hinting that Marlborough had averted peace from interested motives. But on a subsequent occasion he attacked the ministry, and publicly apologized for the part he had played in politics. During the last years of Queen Anne he was one of the leaders of the faction of Hanoverian Tories whom Swift calls the "Whimsicals." He was one of the lords justices appointed to administer the kingdom between the death of Anne and the arrival of George I.

Annesley Peerage Case, THE (1743), arose out of a disputed claim to the honours and estates of the Anglesey peerage. Soon after the assumption of the title by Richard, 6th earl, James Annesley, who professed to be the son of Lord Altham, elder brother of the earl, laid claim to the title and estates. The claimant, who was popularly known as "the unfortunate young nobleman," stated that he had been kidnapped in infancy by his uncle's orders, and sent to the American colonies. On November 11, 1743, he commenced an action against his uncle in the Irish Court of Exchequer. The result of the trial (which was said to have been the longest known up to that time) was that he gained a verdict, but made no further effort to obtain his title. On the death of Richard, 6th earl, in 1761, the right of his son Arthur to succeed him was disputed. The Irish House of Lords confirmed his title. The English House of Lords, however, held that the earldom of Anglesey had expired with the father of this nobleman, who, notwithstanding, continued to sit in the Irish parliament as Viscount Valentia, and was subsequently created Earl of Mountnorris.

"State Trials," xvii, 1189, etc.

Annesley's Case (1719) produced an important constitutional dispute between the English and the Irish Houses of Lords. A suit for the possession of certain lands in Kildare, between Hester Sherlock and Maurice Annesley, had been decided in favour of the latter by the Irish Court of Exchequer. On appeal, the Irish House of Lords reversed the decision. This might have been considered final; but Annesley appealed to the English House of Lords, who affirmed the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, and ordered Annesley to be put in possession of the estate. The court made an order accordingly, but the sheriff of Kildare refused to execute it. He was thereupon fined £1,200, and brought his case before the Irish House of Lords. That body resolved, after taking the opinions of the judges, that the final right of appeal from the Irish courts lay with them, and ordered the barons of the exchequer into custody for acting on the decision of the English House. The latter, however, caused a bill to be brought in (which passed by a majority of 63), asserting the inferior position of the Irish House of Lords, and depriving it of all appellate jurisdiction whatsoever. This act was a mere stretch of power, for the Irish Lords had frequently entertained both writs of error and appeals in equity.

Annuities are certain sums of money paid yearly, and are charged upon the person or personal estate of the individual from whom they are due. If an annuity is charged upon real estate it is called a rent charge. Before the reign of Anne the annuities which had been granted by the Crown as a reward for services performed, or for other reasons, had been charged upon the hereditary revenues, and it had been held that the king had power, in law, to bind his successors. On the accession of Queen Anne an act was passed to restrain the alienation of any portion of the hereditary revenues for a longer period than the life of the reigning sovereign; so that it became the practice to re-grant annuities and pensions at the beginning of a fresh reign. On the establishment of a civil list under George III, government annuities were charged on it instead of on the hereditary revenues; and the indiscriminate granting of pensions by the Crown was checked by act of parliament, 1782, the Irish annuities being regulated in 1793, and the Scottish in 1810. In 1837 the right of the Crown to grant pensions was restricted to £1,200 a year, and to "such persons as have just claims on the royal beneficence." The system of granting annuities as a political bribe, which had been much in favour under the Stuarts, was done away with in 1705, when holders of government annuities were declared incapable of sitting in parliament, though the act was occasionally evaded by the granting of secret pensions. The system of raising government loans by means of annuities began in 1692, when the "Million Act" empowered the raising of that sum for the expenses of the French war by means of a tontine annuity, and several similar statutes were passed during the war of Queen Anne's reign. During the Austrian Succession and Seven Years' Wars, government annuities were frequently granted by way of bonus or premium to the subscribers of government loans. In 1773 a measure was passed through the House of Commons, under the auspices of Burke, to enable the working classes to invest their savings in the purchase of deferred annuities, but it was rejected by the Lords. In 1779 the government was authorized to raise £7,000,000 by annuity. "The government of that period," says Mr. Walford, "was driven to great extremities for raising money; nearly every session one or two Annuity Acts were passed, generally accompanied by a lottery." Acts were passed on the subject in 1808, 1817, and 1863; the last named, besides consolidating and amending the law on government annuities, inaugurated the system of granting annuities for small amounts through the medium of savings banks.

Anselm, Sr. (1033-1109), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at or near Aosta. His father, a vassal of Maurienne, was a man of some wealth and position, but of unthrifty habits and violent temper. When only fifteen Anselm ardently desired to enter the monastic life, but his father refused his consent. A severe illness did not soften the old man, and when his mother's death removed the last barrier to the father's tyranny, Anselm crossed the Alps with a single attendant to seek a career and escape his father's oppression. He spent three years in Burgundy, and was thence attracted to Normandy. After a sojourn at Avranches, where Lanfranc had once taught, Anselm removed to Bec, now flourishing under Lanfranc as prior. After a severe course of study and discipline he took the vows, at the age of twenty-seven. Three years later he was elected prior on Lanfranc's removing to Caen. His administration made Bec inferior only to Cluny in general repute and superior to it in learning. Not only did Bec turn out great scholars, but Anselm infused a high intellectual tone into the whole monastery. He now published his famous "Proslogion" and "Monologion," and in 1078, when Herlwin died, was made abbot. This office led to several visits to England, to look after the estates Bec had obtained from the Conqueror. These visits made him widely known among all classes of Englishmen. He renewed his connexion with Lanfranc, now archbishop, became acquainted with Eadmer of Canterbury, his future biographer, and established cordial relations with Earl Hugh of Chester. He had a good word to say for English saints like Alphege when Lanfranc denied their claims to martyrdom. Lanfranc died in 1089, and everyone recognized in Anselm the one man who could, as at Bec, continue Lanfranc's work and keep William II in check. But William kept the see vacant four years, to secure, with the rich temporalities, freedom from unpleasant advice. In 1092 Anselm again visited England, very unwillingly, lest he should be accused of ambition, but overcome at last by the importunity for spiritual consolation of Earl Hugh, now very ill. Anselm was still in England when a sudden illness stirred Rufus's sluggish conscience, and he resolved to atone for his past crimes by making the Abbot of Bec archbishop. Anselm was almost dragged before the sick king's bed, and after a show of resistance, ludicrous if not sincere, was positively forced to accept the office. But if archbishop he would maintain all the rights of his church. Only on William's promise to resign the temporalities, to listen to Anselm's advice in things spiritual, and to acknowledge Urban II instead of the imperial anti-Pope Clement, did he submit to consecration (December 4, 1093). William soon recovered, relapsed into his old ways, and quarrelled with Anselm. Anselm's present of 500 marks was scornfully rejected as inadequate. His desire for the convocation of a council to check the tide of profligacy and profanity was equally unheeded. At last William's refusal to acknowledge Urban, or to allow Anselm to go to Rome to receive the pallium from that pope, led to a definite rupture. The Great Council of Rockingham (q.v.) failed to make Anselm give way to William; but the king ended the dispute himself by secretly acknowledging Urban, and getting from him Anselm's pallium. The fresh difficulty of Anselm's refusal to accept it from lay hands was got over by his taking it himself from the high altar of his cathedral. But within a year William summoned him before the Curia Regis on a charge of inadequately fulfilling his feudal obligations in the Welsh war. Anselm now appealed to the pope, wrung from Rufus a licence to travel, and left England in October 1097. William at once seized on the estates of his see. At Rome, Anselm soon found that Urban, though very friendly, was too wary to quarrel with the English king. While in Italy he took part in two councils. At Bari he defended the double Procession against the Greeks. At the Lateran he shared in excommunicating all concerned with the sin of lay investiture. Tired of fruitless waiting, Anselm left Italy in the early summer of 1099, and lived chiefly at Lyons, till William's death and Henry's need of friends recalled him from exile. But though Henry had urged Anselm's immediate return, he required him before long to renew his homage, and be again "invested" with his archbishopric. Thus the investiture contest at last crossed over into England, but was conducted in a spirit different from that displayed by Gregory VII and Henry IV. Anselm absolutely refused to yield; Henry insisted on prerogative and precedent; but king and prelate always treated each other with the utmost courtesy. An agreement to refer the matter to the pope led only to Paschal II's strong support of Anselm; and as Henry would not give way, the primate went into exile a second time, in 1103. In 1105 Anselm felt compelled to threaten excommunication, but his ultimatum led to an interview and reconciliation with Henry, when the famous compromise was devised which was confirmed at a gemot held in London in August 1107, and which half a generation later was accepted at Worms by pope and emperor. In 1106 Anselm returned. He gave canonical consecration to the bishops irregularly appointed during the rupture, and efficiently aided Henry against the feudalists. He found time to compose a treatise on the Agreement of Grace and Predestination with Free Will. He died April 21, 1109, aged seventy-six, and was buried next to Lanfranc at Canterbury. Not till the end of the fifteenth century did he receive formal canonization from the worst of popes, Alexander VI; but long before this Dante had placed him in paradise among the greatest saints of Christendom. Anselm's personal character was lofty and pure. But the saint in private life was also a churchman and a politician of high rank, the successful governor of a great abbey and greater see, and the author of the investiture compromise. He represented the highest ideals of mediæval Christendom. His contest with William and Henry was to him a struggle for principle and divine law against mere force and worldliness. That it involved the subordination of budding nationality to dying cosmopolitanism, the subjection of the state to a spiritual tyranny as ruthless as that of William, could not be seen by Anselm.

As the precursor of at least one side of scholastic philosophy, Anselm has an equal claim to fame. Although his unsystematic treatises became unduly neglected when brought into competition with the vast and methodical tractates of the later schoolmen, he, more than anyone else, gave that impulse to justify Scripture and the Church by reason and dialectic, which was the dominant idea of the most characteristic school of mediæval philosophy. In the "Monologion" he tried to "elicit from the necessity of reason, without the aid of Scripture, the idea of God and the real foundation of it," by recourse to the Platonic theory of "ideas," as expressed by St. Augustine. In the "Proslogion" he pursues the same line still further, and anticipates Descartes's famous principle "that the idea of God in the human mind necessarily involves the reality of that idea." His "Cur Deus Homo" attempts to establish a logical and rational theory of the Incarnation, and has profoundly influenced all subsequent speculation on that subject. His crude realism passed away with the advent of more systematic thinking, but the impulse he gave remained permanent.

Anselm's works are in Migne ("Patrologiæ Cursus Completus"). "Cur Deus Homo" has been translated into English (Oxford, 1858), and the "Monologion" and "Proslogion" into French, with comments, in Bouchitte's "Rationalisme Chrétien" (Paris, 1842). Some of the "Meditations" have been done into English by Dr. Pusey.

Badmer's "Vita Anselmi" (printed in the Rolls Series) and "Historia Novella" (printed in Migne, "Patrolog., v, 159) are our great sources for the personal and political career of Anselm. After 1093 his history is the history of the time, and much therefore can be got from the general authorities for the period. They are fully and elaborately worked up in E. A. Freeman's "William Rufus." Dean Church's "Saint Anselm" is still the best general account of him in English, better than that in Dean Hook's "Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury." An elaborate, though not altogether satisfactory, "Life" was published in 1883 by M. Rile; also biographies by J. M. Rigg, 1896, and R. W. Church, 1895. [T. F. T.]

Anson, GEORGE, 1ST BARON (1697-1762), in 1716 became second lieutenant of H.M.S. Hampshire, and during the two following years sailed under Admiral Byng in the Mediterranean. In 1724 he attained the rank of post-captain. He visited South Carolina, and founded the town of Anson (1733). In 1740 he was dispatched with six vessels to sail round Cape Horn and rifle the shores of Peru. Beseet by terrible storms, he appointed the island of Juan Fernandez as a rendezvous for his ships. Meanwhile scurvy broke out. The vessels at length arrived at the island, except the Wager, which was wrecked. The Spanish fleet sent to attack them was driven back into the Rio de la Plata. Foiled in his attempt to catch the Spanish treasure ship, Anson sailed westward from America with the Centurion, his sole remaining ship, and arrived at Spithead in June 1744, after an absence of three years and nine months, during which he had circumnavigated the globe. He was at once appointed rear-admiral of the blue and commissioner of the admiralty. In 1746 he was made vice-admiral. In the following year he commanded the Channel squadron, and defeated De la Jonquière off Cape Finisterre. For this exploit he was raised to the peerage. In 1749 he became vice-admiral of Great Britain, and in 1751 first lord of the admiralty. He commanded at the descent on Cherbourg in 1758. Three years later he was promoted to the high rank of admiral of the fleet. Anson's talents were of a rather mediocre order, and scarcely bore a proportion to the honours and success he attained. He was dull and somewhat unready in business, so that it was said of him after his famous expedition that he had been round the world but never in it. He was, however, a man of great courage, coolness, and determination.

Anstruther, ROBERT (1768-1809), was quartermaster-general to Sir Ralph Abercromby's army in Egypt, in the campaign of 1801. In 1808 he went to Portugal with the reinforcements for Sir Arthur Wellesley's division, and was present at the battle of Vimeiro, in command of a brigade. In the subsequent campaign of this year he commanded the rear-guard of Sir John Moore's army during the retreat. He died of exhaustion and fatigue, brought on by his exertions during the campaign, the second day after the army arrived at Corunna, and was buried in that city by the side of his commander.

Antigua, with Barbuda (q.v.) and Redonda as dependencies, forms one of the Leeward Island presidencies. Discovered and named by Columbus in 1493 after a church in Seville, it remained unoccupied until settled by the English from St. Kitts in 1632. Included in Willoughby's grant of 1663, it was ravaged by the French in 1666, but recaptured in 1667 and ceded to England by the Treaty of Breda (q.v.). In 1736 a slave revolt was crushed with severity. Moravian missionaries had mitigated the slave system, which was abolished unconditionally at the general emancipation. Crown colony government with a partly elective legislative council was adopted in 1898 (8 out of 16). It is the seat of government of the Leeward Islands Federation, but has a local nominated executive council and a legislative council of eight official and eight unofficial members.

Antwerp, THE SURRENDER OF (1706), was an important advantage for the allies in the War of the Spanish Succession. The town was the key to the Scheldt fortresses, and in fact commanded the whole of Brabant and West Flanders. Marlborough was so convinced of its importance that he termed his plans against it "the great design." The fortress had previously been occupied by Bouffiers, who had driven Opdam from it. After the battle of Ramillies, Cadogan was sent to summon the town. Marlborough awaited the news with anxiety, as a siege would cause great delay. The inhabitants were, however, to a man in favour of their new king, and the French were therefore compelled to give up the town. For the remainder of the war it remained in the hands of the allies.

Appa Sahib became regent of Nagpur in 1816. He sought assistance from the British, and a subsidiary treaty was concluded May 27, 1816, which provided that a force of 6,000 infantry, and a regiment of cavalry, together with the due proportion of artillery, should be subsidized by the Nagpur state at an expense of 7½ lacs per annum; and that the raja should engage in no foreign negotiation without the concurrence of the British government. On February 1, 1817, Appa Sahib mounted the throne with the title of Madhogi Bhonsla. Anxious to be freed from dependence, he entered into the Mahratta confederacy against the British, while professing the most inviolable attachment to the latter. On hearing of the attack made on Mr. Elphinstone by Baji Rao on November 5, he inveighed against such perfidy in very strong terms, though at the same time he was preparing his resources for a treacherous attack on the British residency. He was twice dethroned, and died a pensioner of Ranjit Singh.

Appeal of Treason. [TREASON.]Appeals to Rome. [PAPACY.]

Appellants, or LORDS APPELLANT, was the name given to the nobles who in 1387 "appealed" of treason Richard II's friends, de Vere, Neville, de la Pole, Tressilian, and Bramber. When it was known that the king, with the aid of his supporters in various parts of the country and the citizens of London, was attempting to resume the full exercise of his authority, of which he had been deprived by the commission forced on him the previous year, the Duke of Gloucester, after defeating Vere at Radcot Bridge (q.v.), marched with a large body of troops to London, and compelled Richard (November 17) to receive a petition of complaint against his counsellors. The Appellants exhibited the bill of impeachment in the "Merciless" Parliament (q.v.), which met in February 1388, and, in spite of the protests of the judges, it was carried. Three of the ministers had already escaped from the kingdom; but Tressilian and Bramber were arrested and put to death. The Appellants were five in number—the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earls of Derby, Nottingham, Warwick, and Arundel. [RICHARD II; GLOUCESTER, THOMAS, DUKE OF.]

Appellate Jurisdiction is "the jurisdiction exercised by a court of justice at the instance of a person complaining of the decision of another court called, in reference to the court of appeal, the court below." Before the Norman Conquest no suit could be carried to a higher tribunal until it had been first heard in the hundred court; thence an appeal lay to the shire-moot, and thence to the witenagemot, which was the final court of appeal. Under the Norman kings, appeals were decided in the Curia Regis; while the appeal from the ordinary law courts under Henry II lay to the sovereign as the source of justice, and to the Concilium Ordinarium. By degrees, however, petitions for redress were addressed to the chancellor rather than the king; and in the reign of Edward III the Court of Chancery was constituted as a court of equity, but not of appeal. The Concilium Ordinarium (and not the Commune Concilium) was for long the only court of appeal; by degrees its appellate jurisdiction passed to the House of Lords, whose power to hear common law appeals has never been questioned. In 1671, however, in the famous case of Shirley v. Fagg (q.v.), the Commons denied that the Lords could hear appeals from equity; but this right, first asserted in the reign of Charles I, has never been attacked since. In 1358 the Court of Exchequer Chamber was created as an intermediate court of appeal between the common law courts and the House of Lords; the powers of this court were extended in 1585, and reconstituted in 1831. Under Henry VIII, appeals from the ecclesiastical courts to Rome were forbidden under the penalty of præmunire, and appeals from the archbishops' courts were declared to lie to the king in Chancery, who was to appoint Lords Delegates of Appeals to hear appeals from the admiralty, ecclesiastical, and baronial courts. In 1833 this appellate jurisdiction was transferred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. By the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (36 & 37 Vict., c. 60) of 1873, the appellate functions of this committee, and of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, were transferred to the High Court of Appeal constituted by that act, with appellate jurisdiction from all courts of common law and equity, and from the Palatine Courts of Durham and Lancaster. The final appeal was still left to the House of Lords. [CHANCERY; EXCHEQUER CHAMBER; LORDS, HOUSE OF.] [F. S. P.]

Apprentices are persons bound by indentures to serve a master for a certain period, receiving in return for their services maintenance and instruction in their master's craft. The system of apprenticeship in England is of very ancient date, and probably was instituted as early as the trade guilds themselves. In mediæval times the principle of combination amongst members of one trade was universally recognized, and in order to practise any craft it was necessary to become free of the company or guild of that craft. This freedom was obtained by serving an apprenticeship of so many years; and as the number of apprentices which each master was allowed to take was usually limited, a material check was placed upon the numbers of those who were privileged to exercise each trade. Although the system of apprenticeship existed in England from about the twelfth century, and is occasionally referred to in acts of parliament (e.g., 12 Rich. II, c. 3), it was not until 1563 that the famous Statute of Apprentices (5 Eliz., c. 4) was passed. By this act no person was allowed to exercise a trade unless he had previously served a seven years' apprenticeship to it; though the restriction was later construed as not affecting trades which were established in England after the passing of the statute. Manufacturers accordingly disregarded its restrictions. This act was thus found very burdensome, and although it was judicially interpreted to apply only to towns, it was suspended for the cloth trade in 1803, and altogether repealed in 1814 on the recommendation of a committee of the House of Commons; some reservations were, however, made "in favour of the customs and by-laws of the city of London and of other cities, and of corporations and companies lawfully constituted." The Statute of Apprentices, notable for the evidence it exhibits of growing national unity at the time of its passing, had been at best an attempt to stereotype conditions which the rise of industrial and commercial (as against agricultural) interests was already rendering obsolete. Apprenticeship served also as a device for finding work for the destitute. In 1601 it was enacted that the overseers of a parish might bind pauper boys as apprentices until their twenty-fourth year, and girls until the age of twenty-one, or marriage. In 1728 the age for boys was reduced to twenty-one. In 1845 an act was passed which regulated the binding of boys apprenticed on board vessels, such boys to be between the ages of twelve and seventeen. The terms of apprenticeship in Ireland and Scotland were much less than in England, varying from five to three years, and in Scotland, says Adam Smith, "the corporation laws are less oppressive than in any part of Europe." Apprenticeship, though not now necessary, except in a few cases (as that of solicitors and the like), is frequently entered into by contract. The apprentices of the Elizabethan and Stuart periods were usually the sons of yeomen and tradesmen, and, being forbidden to wear the genteel rapier, carried a stout bat or club. Hence the cry when an uproar commenced—"Prentices! clubs!" From the time of the Tudors the apprentices of London were the special "champions of mercantile jealousy arrayed against aristocratic arrogance; and are to be found in almost every London riot, until they were finally the conquerors at Marston Moor and Naseby." By 1833 the practice of wholesale apprenticeship of pauper children to capitalist manufacturers had practically ceased; while the system of voluntary apprenticeship by contract, which lived on, was becoming a troublesome and unsatisfactory means of poor relief.

Appropriation of Supplies. The successive maxims, the enforcement of which finally secured to the Commons the complete control of taxation, were: (1) that the parliament alone could grant supplies, and the Commons alone originate such grants; (2) that their petitions for redress must be answered before supplies should be granted; (3) that the right to grant includes the right to decide the appropriation of the grant for definite purposes, and to demand the audit of its expenditure. The parliament of the sixteenth century saw the two former of these claims constantly evaded by the arbitrary or underhand action of the Crown. They began also to see that the way to counteract this, and to counteract at the same time the extravagance or dishonesty of the minister of the Crown, was by putting in force the third claim. This had been suggested in the early struggles of the thirteenth century; as in 1237, when the Crown offered to allow a committee of the great council to supervise the expenditure of the grant then asked for. The plan comes forward again in 1262 and in 1266; its importance, however, was not yet realized. No doubt under Edward I it was felt to be enough that parliament alone should make grants, while under Edward III, parliament advanced to the principle of redress before supply; yet the principle of appropriation was, even in these reigns, plainly exhibited in the custom of explaining to the country in the writ of summons to parliament what the specific purpose was of the grant about to be demanded, whether for a French, a Welsh, or a Scottish war, or for defence of the seas, or for protection against invasion. Indeed, under Edward III the grant was commonly stated to be made for this particular purpose; while in 1377 the grant for defence of the seas is put by the Commons into the hands of the London citizens, Walworth and Philpot, to expend; and in 1390 is clearly displayed the distinction between the ordinary and the war expenditure, ten shillings and thirty shillings respectively being allotted to each, out of the forty shillings tax on every sack of wool. The principle thus established was fully accepted in the Lancastrian reigns. Tonnage and poundage (q.v.), for instance, became the recognized appropriation for defence of the seas, as the household expenses were supposed to be provided out of the Crown lands; and Fortescue wished the principle carried farther, so that the Crown lands should be redeemed, and inalienably set apart for such extraordinary expenses as embassies, pensions, protection against invasion, etc. It was, in fact, the increasing poverty of the Crown that directed attention to the distinction of the various heads of expenditure, and the need of a strict system of appropriation; and it was natural, therefore, that when the Crown, in Yorkist and Tudor hands, became wealthy as well as despotic, these distinctions, and the appropriations among them, should be lost sight of. Parliament met but rarely; tonnage and poundage were granted for the king's life; benevolences filled up the royal coffers, already enriched by forfeitures; and not till the reign of Charles II is the control resumed by the old means—the first case being in 1665, when a grant was made for purposes of the war alone. After the Revolution, ministers brought in annual estimates of the sums required under different heads; and Fox's resolution in 1781 would have effected this still more completely, by making it illegal to issue any moneys not appropriated by parliament. This has now become a constitutional rule, and in the annual estimates the sums asked of parliament are specifically appropriated for their several purposes, and the budget voted item by item. The principle has been completed by the reforms originated by Burke, which have reduced the civil list (q.v.) to an amount fixed to meet the actual personal and royal expenses of the sovereign, and relieved him of many payments for national objects, so that parliament no longer has schedules of Crown debts to pay off at intervals, and its strict rights of appropriation now extend over Crown expenses as over all other heads of public expenditure.

Aquablancia (AIGUEBLANCHE), PETER OF (d. 1268), was a Savoyard who came to England in the train of Eleanor of Provence, queen of Henry III. He was made Bishop of Hereford c. 1240, and by his financial exactions became one of the most obnoxious of the foreign advisers of the king. He was driven from his see by the barons in 1263, and his goods were sequestrated.

Aquitaine, THE DUCHY OF, in the south of France, which comprised Guienne, Périgieux, Limoges, Auvergne, Saintonge, La Marche, Poitou and Gascony, besides smaller territories, was first brought into connexion with England by the marriage of Henry II with Eleanor, heiress of the last Duke of Aquitaine. John lost Poitou, and under Henry III the English dominions steadily dwindled until by 1247 they comprised little more than the towns of Bordeaux and Bapaume and their environs. In 1259, however, the Treaty of Abbeville or Paris (q.v.), conferred Gascony to the English king, to be held as a fief of the French crown, and even enlarged its frontiers. For a short while in Edward I's reign, Gascony was occupied by the French; and one of the chief causes of the war with France in the reign of Edward III was the attempt of Philip VI to regain possession of the duchy. In 1360 the Treaty of Brétigny (q.v.) once more secured Aquitaine to the English king, with the addition of Poitou, but not including Auvergne. But the renewal of the war brought defeats and losses on the English, with the result that in 1374 there once more remained to them nothing of Aquitaine save some small pieces of territory round Bayonne and Bordeaux. Henry V won back part of the province, only for his son to lose everything; and the final result of the Hundred Years' War was the incorporation of Aquitaine into the French kingdom.

Arakan is a division of British Burma, lying along the eastern coast of the Bay of Bengal, extending from Chittagong to Cape Negrais. The district at one time belonged to the Moguis, and was subsequently partly in the hands of the Portuguese. In 1783 it was conquered by the Burmese, by whom it was ceded to the British as a result of the first Burmese War in 1826.

Arbitration, INTERNATIONAL, is the reference of their differences by two nations to an independent person or body for judgment. It differs from civil arbitration in that the international award has no legal sanction by which it can be enforced. Between 1820 and 1900 there were 172 cases of international arbitration; and Great Britain was a party in more of these than was any other government. The best-known awards are those of the Alabama Case in 1872 [GENEVA AWARD], the Bering Sea dispute (1893), the British Guiana boundary question (1899), the Alaska boundary dispute (1903), the Newfoundland Fisheries dispute (1904). The Hague Tribunal was set up in 1900 to take cognizance of such cases between nations, and the Venezuela dispute (1903) among others was referred to it. A new era for arbitration began with the establishment of the League of Nations, all members of the League undertaking to submit to arbitration or to the League Council all disputes likely to lead to war. This principle was endorsed by Lord Balfour on July 6, 1925. An attempt to elaborate it, made in the Geneva Protocol of October 1924 (q.v.), was repudiated by the British government, which was largely instrumental in substituting for it the Locarno Pact of October 1925 (q.v.).

Arbuthnot, JOHN, M.D. (1667-1735), author, wit, and physician, was the son of a Scottish Episcopal clergyman. About 1704 accident threw him in the way of Prince George of Denmark, Queen Anne's husband, and he became the queen's physician, and the intimate friend of the foremost political writers of the Tory party. In 1712 he wrote a political allegory, "The History of John Bull," which Macaulay calls the most humorous political satire in our language. Its object was to throw ridicule on the War of the Spanish Succession. In 1714 he joined Swift, Pope, and other Tory men of letters, in founding the Scriblerus Club, the object of which was to chastise literary quacks. The first book of their uncompleted work, "The Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus" (1741), was undoubtedly by his pen.

Archæology. So far as Britain is concerned, archæology, i.e., the science of human antiquities, throws invaluable light on three obscure periods, viz., (1) the Prehistoric; (2) the Romano-British, and (3) the Anglo-Saxon.

I. PREHISTORIC. For the incalculably extensive ages of this unrecorded period archæology furnishes the sole source of positive information. Five cultural periods can be distinguished, viz., (1) Eolithic, marked by exceedingly rude flint implements found in the tertiary plateau gravels of Kent and elsewhere. The human origin of these was long questioned, but recent opinion seems to tend decisively towards their recognition; (2) Palæolithic, distinguished by artifacts left in (a) the gravel deposits of ancient rivers, and (b) the cave-dwellings of primitive man, such as Kent's Cavern near Torquay. With these must be classed such human remains as the Piltdown skull discovered near Lewes in Sussex in 1912; (3) Neo- lithic, which includes not only flint and bone implements of a highly finished type, but also burial-mounds, hill-fortresses, and stone-circles (such as Stonehenge, the date of which is estimated at c. 1680 B.C.), as well as a number of lake-dwellings (e.g., Glastonbury); (4) Bronze, not sharply distinguished chronologically from the Neolithic Age, probably inaugurated in Britain c. 1800 B.C. by the advent of invaders of the so-called "Aryan" or "Celtic" type. (5) Iron, into which the Bronze Age was merged three or four centuries before the Christian era. For details concerning these Prehistoric periods see Sir John Evans, "Stone Implements of Great Britain," and "Bronze Implements of Great Britain"; Boyd Dawkins, "Cave Hunting and Early Man in Britain"; H. F. Osborn, "Men of the Old Stone Age"; J. M. Tyler, "The New Stone Age in Europe"; D. A. Mackenzie, "Ancient Man in Britain."

II. ROMANO-BRITISH. Archæology has considerably modified the views of historians concerning the condition of the British peoples at the time of the Roman conquest. Coins, implements, ornaments, relics of dwellings and traces of models of cultivation reveal a civilization much more highly advanced than would be gathered from the descriptions left by Cæsar (see Hodgkin, "Political History of England," vol. i, chap. iii). As to the period of the Roman occupation the rich results of excavations at Silchester, Corstopitum, Wroxeter, and elsewhere; the careful investigation of the remains of villas in many parts of the country, combined with casual discoveries of inscriptions, coins, pottery, and implements of all sorts on innumerable sites, have filled in with detailed information our otherwise scanty knowledge of the Romano-British civilization of the first four centuries of the Christian era (see F. Haverfield, "The Romanization of Roman Britain"; B. C. A. Windle, "The Romans in Britain").

III. ANGLO-SAXON. The archæological remains of the Early English period are much scarcer than those of the Romano-British era. Anglo-Saxon buildings were less durable than the Roman; coinage poorer and scantier; implements more ephemeral. Traces, however, of the open-field system of cultivation were sufficient at the close of the nineteenth century to enable Mr. F. Seebohm to reconstruct the story of the agricultural economy of the pre-Norman period. Discoveries in various Jewish burial grounds in Kent, Sussex, Hampshire, and the Isle of Wight have not only thrown new light on Jewish civilization, but have led to the conclusion that the Jewish settlement in Southern Britain was both earlier and more extensive than the Chronicles would cause us to suppose. Investigations in the Thames Valley, moreover, have pointed to the necessity of a radical revision of the common view respecting the method of the West-Saxon conquest of Hampshire; archæological evidence suggests a descent from the Thames Valley rather than an ascent from Southampton Water.

Archbishops. The territorial extent of an archbishop's authority is called a province, from the name of an administrative division of the Roman Empire. Archbishops do not form an order apart from bishops. An archbishop in England has a bishop's authority within his own diocese and is also chief of the clergy, and has power to correct the faults of bishops throughout his province. The design of Gregory the Great, who dispatched the mission under Augustine in 597, was that there should be two metropolitan sees in England—at London and York—following the twofold division of the Roman province. Augustine, however, dwelt at Canterbury, which thus became the seat of the southern metropolitan. England was not wholly converted from Kent. Different missions succeeded at various dates in the kingdoms into which the land was divided, and in consequence a danger arose from lack of unity in the Church. From this she was saved by Archbishop Theodore (q.v.) (669-90). His plan was to unite the whole Church under the supremacy of Canterbury, and he gathered all the bishops together in one synod at Hertford (673). After his death his scheme perished. Pope Gregory's plan was revived as more in accordance with local sentiment, and in 734 the see of York was made an archbishopric. Offa, King of Mercia, attempted to give expression to the brief period of Mercian supremacy by setting up a third archbishopric at Lichfield, but his experiment lasted only from 787 to 803. In 1143 Henry of Blois, Bishop of Winchester and papal legate, applied to Pope Innocent II to convert his see into an archbishopric and rid him of the authority of Canterbury, but did not attain his object. [Gregory's intention had been that the primacy should be enjoyed in turn by the two metropolitans, but his plan was never executed, and before the Norman Conquest York was always inferior in dignity to Canterbury. After 1066, however, the question of the relation of the two provinces became acute. In 1070 Lanfranc, who realized that the supremacy of Canterbury was vital to both the religious and the secular interests of England, demanded from Thomas of Bayeux a formal profession of obedience, as a preliminary to his consecration as Archbishop of York. Thomas refused to accede to his request, and a conflict ensued which ended at length in 1072 in the submission of the northern metropolitan. But the settlement was not definite.] In 1093 Thomas of York objected to the application to the Archbishop of Canterbury of the title "Metropolitan of All Britain," on the ground that it infringed the metropolitan rights of his own see. His objection was allowed and the expression "Primate of All Britain" was substituted. As late as 1119 Thurstan of York defeated an attempt to exact from him a formal profession of obedience to the archbishop. The Welsh bishops owned the authority of Canterbury. An unsuccessful attempt was made in 1199 to restore to St. Davids the archiepiscopal dignity which it had in the time of the British Church. Until 1152 the Irish bishops received consecration from the Archbishop of Canterbury; and in the twelfth century his authority in Scotland was disputed by the Archbishop of York, until in 1188 the Scottish Church was made immediately dependent upon Rome. The Archbishop of Canterbury had, therefore, a kind of patriarchal authority. Lanfranc has been described as "Patriarch of the West," and Anselm was greeted by Pope Urban II as the pope and patriarch of a second world. The position of the primate in the state was one of great importance, and he has always stood next after the sovereign, whom it is his duty to crown. The right of electing the archbishops pertained, as in the case of bishops, to the chapters of their churches. The dignity of the see of Canterbury caused frequent interference with the right of the monastic chapter of Christ Church. A voice in the election was claimed by the suffragan bishops, but their claim was disallowed by Innocent III. The Crown interfered oftener and more directly in the appointment of one who was its constitutional adviser than in the case of other elections. The pope managed in many instances to secure the election of his nominee. His influence was ensured (1) because it was held necessary that the archbishops should receive from him the pall, an ecclesiastical vestment, without which an archbishop did not consecrate bishops; (2) and because (in later times) the pope also granted to the archbishop the authority of a legate. The right of the Archbishop of Canterbury to the legatine commission was asserted by Archbishop Anselm, and finally gained by Archbishop Langton in 1291. This right did not preclude the visits of special legates a latere, but it was an infringement of it to grant a permanent legatine commission for England to anyone else, as in the case of Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, since the Archbishop of Canterbury was legatus natus. The Archbishop of York also had the pall, and from about 1350 the legatine commission. The provincial jurisdiction of the archbishops was exercised in their Provincial Courts. The judge of the Provincial Court of Canterbury was the Official Principal. In the Court of Arches, so called because held in St. Mary le Bow (de Arcubus), the Dean of Arches exercised the archbishop's jurisdiction over certain peculiars, or parishes exempt from the ordinary episcopal jurisdiction. As the offices of Official Principal and Dean of Arches were usually vested in the same person, the Court and Dean of Arches came to be inexactly spoken of as if they signified the court and judge of the archbishop's provincial jurisdiction. The final appeal from this court lay, after the breach with Rome, to a body called the High Court of Delegates (25 Henry VIII, c. 19). By 3 and 4 Wm. IV, c. 41, the appellate jurisdiction of this court was conferred on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The office of Official Principal, both of Canterbury and York, is now, by the Public Worship Regulation Act (37 and 38 Vict., c. 85), merged in that of a judge appointed by the archbishops, subject to the approval of the sovereign. This judge exercises the provincial jurisdiction of both archbishops as the Official Principal of the Arches Court of Canterbury and the Chancery Court of York. The archbishops summon and preside over the provincial synods or Convocations (q.v.). The Archbishop of Canterbury, or in his absence the Archbishop of York, presides over meetings of the Church Assembly under the constitution of 1919, and acts as chairman of the House of Bishops. [CHURCH OF ENGLAND.] [For Archbishops of Dublin, St. Andrews, etc., see CHURCH OF IRELAND; CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.] [In 1920, following upon the disendowment and disestablishment of the Welsh Church, an Archbishop of Wales was created, the Bishop of St. Asaph being elected to the new office.]

Architecture. In England there are many remains—chiefly of a sepulchral character—of the people who dwelt in the land before the coming of the Romans. These prehistoric relics may be roughly classified as (1) monoliths, single stones standing upright; (2) cromlechs, or table-stones, consisting of one large stone supported by others, as at Kit's Coity House, Aylesford, Kent; (3) stone circles, as at Stonehenge, Avebury, and Long Meg and her Daughters, near Penrith; (4) barrows, oblong or round, which consist of mounds of earth containing sepulchral chambers. These barrows are scattered over the country, but are generally found on moorland. Besides these, there are traces of lake dwellings—houses built on wooden platforms supported by piles driven into the bottom of lakes, accessible by planks from the mainland. There are also traces of sculptured ornaments on boulders of stone, which are especially frequent in Northumberland. There are, again, earthworks of camps and the foundations of fortified villages to be found in many places amongst the hills.

When the Romans came to Britain they brought with them the art of building in stone. They built towns and houses, which, however, were all destroyed, though the sites of Roman villas, their mosaic pavements, the hypocausts, or cellars with flues to warm the house, may be still traced in many places. But the greatest memorials of Roman building are their military works, especially the great wall extending from the Tyne to the Solway, whose course may still be traced, with its military stations and remains of buildings outside. The station of Housesteads, near Hexham, has been called "the English Pompeii." After the departure of the Romans the English conquest drove the Britons from the cities, which fell into decay. The English themselves lived in villages, in houses built of clay, or wood, or wattles. After their conversion to Christianity they began to build churches, of oaken planks, sometimes covered with lead. Benedict Biscop, a Northumbrian thegn, went over to Gaul and brought back workmen, who, at the end of the seventh century, built a stone church, or basilica, for the monastery of Wearmouth. Wilfrid followed, and built churches at York and Hexham, remains of which may still be seen. Still, before the Norman Conquest architecture did not make much advance in England. Stone towers were built with wooden naves, and the remains of what is called Saxon architecture are few. The tower of Earls Barton Church, in Northamptonshire, is one of the most important examples.

The Norman Conquest gave the signal for a great age of ecclesiastical architecture in England. Vast cathedrals were built in the massive, round-arched style which had gradually developed from the Roman constructions, and which is known as Romanesque or Norman. Of this style, very striking specimens are the cathedrals of Norwich, Peterborough, and Ely, and Malmesbury Abbey. The cathedral of Durham shows an attempt at emancipation from the traditions of the Norman builders. The introduction of the pointed arch, which was probably first employed in rebuilding the east end of Canterbury Cathedral after the fire in 1174, made a great change in architectural construction. The activity in the way of church building in the north, as shown in the Yorkshire abbeys, still further developed an English style of architecture, which first made itself manifest in Lincoln Cathedral (1200), and Salisbury (1220-58). This style, which is known as the Early English, is remarkable for its lancet windows, which are either single or grouped in graceful designs. The increase of the use of painted glass as a necessary part of church decoration led to an adoption of French principles and the introduction of geometrical tracery, which marked the architecture of the reigns of Edward I and Edward II. The Angel Choir at Lincoln, the abbeys of Tintern and Gainsborough, and the chapel of Merton College, Oxford, may be given as examples of the progress of this geometrical style. It lasted, however, but a short time; the restlessness which marked the reign of Edward III was expressed in the desire for new inventions, and geometrical tracery gave way to flowing or curvilinear tracery of the style that is called Decorated, specimens of which may be seen in Carlisle Cathedral. It would seem that the vagaries of the Decorated style awakened a reaction. In the flowing tracery strength and construction were alike lost sight of, till the Perpendicular style was hailed with delight as being sounder. This style was first made popular by William of Wykeham, in his buildings at Winchester and at Oxford, and prevailed for above a century, during the fourteenth and first half of the fifteenth centuries. Its characteristics were a stern regard to the needs of construction. Straight lines ran from the bottom to the top of the window, which was regarded as merely a frame for painted glass. Regularity and proportion were everywhere insisted upon, and fancy was no longer allowed a place. The chapel of King's College, Cambridge, is a good example of the Perpendicular style, but there are many instances to be found in every locality of a style which was so long in use.

The development of ecclesiastical architecture was the chief feature of this period. England produced no great municipal buildings. The towns did not rise to the same independent position as that which fostered the development of municipal architecture on the continent. The dwellings of the barons were military fortresses, and were at first reproductions of the castles of Normandy. Castle-building, however, soon became an eminently English art. The massive keeps of the Norman castles were surrounded by curtain walls connecting one tower with another, and weaving the whole pile into a strong and picturesque mass of buildings. In the reigns of the Edwards these castles assumed their largest proportions, and their remains are to be seen most clearly on the Welsh and Scottish Marches. Some may be traced in ruins, others have been altered into modern dwellings, but still retain many of their ancient features. The castles of Alnwick, Berkeley, Chepstow, Kenilworth, Warwick, Rochester, and Windsor are amongst the most striking examples. Another class of mediæval buildings peculiar to England is found in the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, and the schools of Eton and Winchester. Taking as their model monastic buildings, the architects adapted them to the conditions of secular life, and built quadrangles round the chapel and common hall. The great hall was, moreover, a feature of the castle, and received the greatest architectural care, particularly in the construction of the roof. The halls of the royal palaces of Westminster (Richard II) and Eltham (Henry IV) still remain as examples of the constructive ingenuity of their builders.

The Tudor reigns saw a great increase in the material prosperity of England and in its internal quiet. The suppression of the monasteries removed one of the principal supports of ecclesiastical architecture. The comforts of domestic life increased. The castles and fortified manor-houses of the troubled times of the Middle Ages were either abandoned or were converted into dwelling-houses more suitable for peaceful times. At first this was done in accordance with the principles of Gothic architecture. But the movement of the Renaissance towards a revival of the classical style had begun in Italy, and spread over France. It was long in taking possession of England, but it affected it unconsciously in details. The style known as Jacobean was Gothic in feeling, but adopted with some timidity classical ornamentation. It corresponded to the change through which England was passing in religion and literature alike. The memorials of this style are chiefly to be found in dwelling-houses. Churches were not required, as the number already existing was more than ample for the population. The University of Cambridge, which was at that period very flourishing, has some excellent examples in Caius and Clare Colleges, and in Neville's Court in Trinity. The great houses that were now built served for some time as models for English houses. They differed from the designs in vogue on the continent, and showed an adaptation to the needs of English climate. They were built round court-yards, after the old fashion; but the entrance was on the outside, and the windows of the main rooms looked outwards to the country, not into the court-yard. Knole may be taken as an example of the Gothic style of dwelling-house. Longleat, Temple Newsam, Longford Castle, Hardwicke Hall, and Hatfield House are examples of various forms of classical adaptations. All of them are picturesque, graceful in proportions, and comfortable in their arrangements, though their ornamentation shows learning misunderstood and improperly applied. The most conspicuous instance of this is the gateway of the Bodleian Library at Oxford, where the five orders of classical architecture are piled one upon another, and the whole is crowned by Gothic pinnacles.

In the reign of Charles I the architectural style of the Italian Renaissance found its full development in England under the influence of Inigo Jones, an architect of great ability, who studied in Italy under the last great Italian architect Palladio. On his return to England, Inigo Jones designed a mighty palace for the king at Whitehall. The Banqueting House was executed from his designs, but the troubles of Charles I prevented the plan from being carried out. Jones's scheme was conceived on a gigantic scale; had it been executed, the Palace of Whitehall would have been the most splendid in Europe. Jones showed the possibility of dignified simplicity in a Protestant church, by the building of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, the first ecclesiastical building of any importance since the Reformation. The Restoration found its architect in a man of real learning and cultivation, Sir Christopher Wren, whose earliest work is the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford. The Great Fire of London, in 1666, gave Wren an opportunity, such as few architects have enjoyed, of modelling the architectural aspect of a great city. He prepared a plan for the rebuilding of London, which unfortunately was not carried out. However, he was asked to rebuild St. Paul's Cathedral and nearly fifty other churches. In St. Paul's Cathedral Wren built the largest and most splendid church, after St. Peter's in Rome, that had been attempted in the classical style. Besides this, he studded the city with graceful steeples, that lent dignity to the proportions of St. Paul's dome, which towered above them. The chief of these are the spires of Bow Church; St. Bride's, Fleet Street; St. Michael's, Cornhill; St. Stephen's, Walbrook; and St. Dunstan's-in-the-East. In all his buildings Wren showed great constructive ingenuity and a delight in solving difficult problems, though at times he has allowed this to overcome his artistic taste. Few cities bear so clearly the impress of one man's architectural genius as does London that of Wren.

The successors of Wren in the beginning of the eighteenth century were Hawksmoor, who built the church of St. George's, Bloomsbury, and Sir John Vanbrugh. Vanbrugh, a Dutchman by descent, was happy in the opportunity of having entrusted to him a monumental work of national importance. He was commissioned to build Blenheim Palace as a gift of the nation to the Duke of Marlborough. His plan is vast and grand. He certainly aimed at giving enduring stability to his work. But though the general design was dignified, there is a clumsiness and a lack of proportion in the adaptation of details that leave an impression of heaviness and gloom. In the building of Castle Howard Vanbrugh shows the same attempt at grandeur, but with more sobriety. An architect whose work shows more artistic feeling is James Gibbs, whose most important buildings are the church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields and the Radcliffe Library at Oxford.

The middle of the eighteenth century saw a development of the study of classical archæology, which immediately reacted on architecture. Especially Stuart's work on "The Architecture of Athens," commenced in 1762, affected popular taste. The architecture of the Italian Renaissance, which had hitherto been pursued in England, was classical in sentiment, and used classical details while freely adapting them to its own purposes. The end of the eighteenth century saw a learned revival of pure classical architecture, freed from its Italian adaptations. This absolute copying of classical antiquity became a fashion. Churches were built like Grecian temples, as, for instance, the church of St. Pancras, with its caryatid porticoes and model of a small temple erected by way of a spire on a larger one. No large building was erected except in the severest classical style, with portico, whether needful or not. The British Museum is one of the least successful of the buildings of this school; St. George's Hall at Liverpool is one of the most happy. But this classical revival in architecture was soon met by a Gothic revival, which may be said to date from Horace Walpole, but took a great hold on popular taste after Beckford's revival of Fonthill Abbey in the shape of a gentleman's house. Its architect, Wyatt, was entrusted with the restoration of several of our cathedrals. Houses were built in the form of Gothic castles or abbeys. The rage for strictly classical imitations was succeeded by a rage for exact reproduction of Gothic designs. The writings of Britton, Rickman, Pugin, and many others lent the resources of careful archæology to this revival, which corresponded also with the Tractarian movement within the English Church. In obedience to the desire of restoring the assumed reverence and faith of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, churches throughout England have been "restored," or brought back, to what some ingenious archæologist guesses to have been their original aspect. Innumerable churches have been built in imitation of Gothic models; and in secular buildings, the Houses of Parliament, and more recently the Law Courts, were erected in Gothic style, and have taxed the ingenuity of their architects to find the accommodation necessary for modern purposes in buildings constructed in the style of an age when such purposes were unknown.

Arcot, DEFENCE OF (1751). The victories of the confederation formed by Duplex against the English were checked by the expedition to Arcot under Clive. Chanda Sahib was obliged to detach a large force, thereby relieving the pressure on the British garrison cooped up in Trichinopoly. The fort of Arcot was defended only by a low and lightly-built parapet; several of the towers were decayed, and the ditch was partly choked up. From the day of its occupation, August 31, 1751, Clive had been incessantly employed in repairing the defences, but the place seemed little capable of standing a siege. The troops fit for duty had been reduced by casualties and disease, and it was with a small body that Clive sustained for seven weeks the incessant assault of 10,000 native troops and 150 Europeans. On the last day of the siege the enemy endeavoured to storm the fort, but they were repulsed on every point, and next morning retired from the town.

Ardanesbi, BATTLE OF (719), was a naval engagement fought between the two branches of the Scots of Dalriada—the Cinel Gabran and the Cinel Loarn, who were rivals for supremacy, Dunchadt, King of Kintyre, was chief of the Cinel Gabran, and Selvach, at the head of the Cinel Loarn, the latter being defeated. Ardanesbi, according to Skene, is "probably the point of Ardminish, on the island of Gigha."

Ardren, EDWARD (d. 1583), was implicated in a project for the assassination of Elizabeth, by the confession of his son-in-law, the conspirator John Somerville. He had incurred the enmity of the Earl of Leicester, and, after an unfair trial, was executed at Tyburn, December 1583. His guilt, however, is very doubtful, and he probably fell a victim to the enmity of Leicester.

Ardwulf (EARDWULF), King of Northumbria (796(?)–810), was placed on the throne after the murder of Æthelred. He found anarchy throughout the kingdom, but eventually succeeded in restoring something like order by making a treaty with Cenwulf of Mercia, whose kingdom had been the refuge of all Northumbrian conspirators. In 808 he seems to have been driven from the throne by a rival claimant. He fled to Europe, where he visited the courts of the Emperor Charles the Great and Pope Leo III; and by their mediation he was restored to the throne in 809.

Argaum, BATTLE OF (November 29, 1803), was fought during the Mahratta War, between General Wellesley and the Raja of Berar. The raja, who had been long pursued by Wellesley, attempted to raise the siege of Gawilghur, a strong fortress in the Berar territory, and was caught by Wellesley on the plain of Argaum. Though late in the day, Wellesley resolved to engage, but his troops had no sooner come within range of the enemy's guns, than two battalions, who had behaved with distinguished gallantry on the field of Assye under a far hotter fire, broke their ranks and fled. Fortunately the general succeeded in rallying them, or the battle would have been lost. They returned to the field, and after some hours of severe fighting, the Berar troops were compelled to retreat. The raja abandoned all his cannon and ammunition; and few of his troops would have escaped, if there had been an hour of daylight left.

Argyll, EARLS AND DUKES OF. [CAMPBELL.]

Argyll, PEERAGE OF. In 1445 Sir Duncan Campbell of Lochow, the head of the great Argyllshire family of the Campbells, was raised to the peerage as Lord Campbell, by James II of Scotland. His grandson, Colin, was created Earl of Argyll in 1457. He married Isabel Stewart, daughter of the Lord of Lorne, and added to his titles that of Lord Lorne. Archibald, the 8th earl, who was subsequently executed for treason in 1661, was created a marquis in 1641. His son Archibald, 9th earl (who was restored to the family estates and the earldom), was attainted for treason in 1685. The attainder was reversed at the Revolution of 1688, and Archibald, the son of the last-named earl, was advanced to the dignity of Duke of Argyll. His son John, 2nd duke, received an English peerage as Duke of Greenwich in 1719. He left no male issue, and his English honours ceased; but his daughter Caroline was created in her own right Baroness of Greenwich. His Scottish honours devolved on his brother Archibald, 3rd duke, from whom they passed to his nephew Archibald, the ancestor of the present holder of the title. John, the 5th duke, was created a peer of England as Baron Sundridge in 1766. [CAMPBELL.]

Arikera, BATTLE OF (May 13, 1791). After the capture of Bangalore, during Lord Cornwallis's campaign in Mysore, Tipoo was encamped between Cornwallis and Seringapatam, with his right resting on the Cauvery. Lord Cornwallis hoped by a night march to turn the enemy's left before daylight, and cut off his retreat; but a terrific storm arose, and delayed the march. In the morning Lord Cornwallis gained a hill commanding the left of the enemy. The attack became general along the front, and was assisted by Maxwell's flank attack along the hill, and Tipoo's army was already wavering when Colonel Floyd and the cavalry charged his rear-guard and nearly destroyed it.

Arkinholm, BATTLE OF (May 1, 1454), was fought in the valley of the Esk between the supporters of James II of Scotland and James, Earl of Douglas, and his brothers. The rebels were defeated. Archibald Douglas, Earl of Moray, fell in the combat; Hugh Douglas, Earl of Ormond, was captured and beheaded; and James Douglas was forced to take refuge in England. [DOUGLAS.]

Arklow, THE BATTLE OF (1798), was fought during the Irish rebellion. The town was defended by General Needham with 120 Ancient Britons, 800 Irish militia, 300 Durham Fencibles, and some yeomanry, against Father John Murphy, who led some 27,000 rebels with a few guns to the attack. During the action, Father Michael Murphy, who had joined the rebels under Father John Murphy, was shot. In spite of the determined fury with which they came on, the rebels were beaten back with great loss, and had to give up the idea of marching on Dublin.

Arlington, HENRY BENNET, EARL OF (1618-85). [BENNET.]

Armada, THE SPANISH, is the name usually applied to the great military and naval expedition dispatched by Philip II of Spain against England in 1588. The equipping of his great fleet was protracted by his incorrigible habits of delay and hesitation, but it is probable that it was ready to sail in 1587. It might in any case have been kept waiting one year more till the Prince of Parma had his army ready in Flanders, but, however that may be, it was delayed by Drake's vigorous action on the coasts of Portugal and Andalusia. Early in 1588 the damage he had done was repaired and the Invincible Armada sailed from Lisbon in the latter days of May. It was commanded by Don Alonso de Guzman, Duke of Medina Sidonia, who succeeded to the command on the death of Don Alvaro de Bazan, the Marquis of Santa Cruz. It consisted of 132 vessels, manned by 8,066 sailors, and 2,088 galley-slaves. It carried 21,621 soliders, and 2,680 pieces of artillery. The provisions of food and ammunition were abundant, but the ships were ill-fitted for the navigation of the Channel, of which the Spanish sailors knew nothing. From the beginning it met with losses and misfortunes. It was scattered by a gale immediately after leaving Lisbon, during which one galley went down, and two were seized by the slaves, who revolted and overpowered the soldiers. It was not till Friday, July 22 (N.S.), that Medina Sidonia could rally his ships, and sail from Corunna. On Thursday, July 28, the fleet was off the Lizard, and had its first sight of the English fleet on Saturday the 30th. The English lord high admiral, Lord Howard of Effingham, had thirty ships of the Royal Navy, and a large number of volunteer ships, with him, and was assisted by Drake, Hawkins, Frobisher, Winter, Raleigh, and other seamen. The Armada was steered for Calais Road. On Sunday, July 31, some fighting took place, in which the unwieldy Spanish ships were completely outmanœuvred. They were built so extremely high, and drew so few feet of water in proportion, that they could not carry enough sail. The handy English vessels closed and drew off as they pleased. Our seamen, acting on the principle which has always been followed in the English navy, trusted to their rapid and accurate artillery fire, and refused all temptations to board the enemy, whose vessels were crowded with soldiers. The first encounter proved the wisdom of this system of tactics. The flagship of the Andalusian squadron was disabled, and fell into the hands of Drake after a long fight. The Armada, arranged in the half-moon formation which had been adopted at Lepanto, continued its way through the Channel, keeping indifferent order. On August 2 there was another indecisive cannonade off Portland, in which the English seamen followed their usual system of attack; and though they did not do the Spaniards any considerable damage, they further proved their superiority in seamanship, and convinced the enemy that he could only hope to fight them on their own terms. By Saturday the 6th, the Armada had reached Calais, and waited for the Prince of Parma, who was to join it from Flanders. But the prince, by one of the extraordinary oversights which ruined all Philip's plans, had no armed ships, and was closely blockaded by the Dutch. On Sunday night (August 7) the English admirals sent fire-ships among the Spaniards, who cut their cables and stood to sea in a panic. On Monday they were fiercely attacked, and soon became utterly disorganized. On Tuesday, August 9, the Armada, greatly diminished by loss of vessels, which had been sunk or compelled to strike, or driven on shore, was drifting helplessly on the coast of Zeeland. A sudden change of wind saved it for the moment, but the crews had no more stomach for the fight. By the next day they had quite lost heart and begun to fly to the north. They were followed for some distance by a few English vessels, but there was no effectual pursuit. Elizabeth's fleet had been ill-provided with powder and shot, and still worse with food. They had put to sea in a hurry, and they had moreover been now engaged almost incessantly for days. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that after three general engagements and numerous skirmishes the ships were out of ammunition. The shortage of provisions is less excusable. It appears, however, that the volunteer vessels were almost as badly found as the queen's, and that what is often called Elizabeth's parsimony was in fact lack of experience in equipping a large force. The brunt of the fighting fell on the vessels of the Royal Navy; the volunteers, though they proved the spirit of the nation, and helped to make a moral impression on the Spaniards, did comparatively little of the real work. The preparations on shore were probably distinguished more by spirit than efficiency, but they were never tested, and it is impossible to know what they would have done. It must not be forgotten that, though the Prince of Parma had a veteran force in Flanders, the majority of the soldiers on board the Armada were as raw as the English militia. The Spaniards straggled home round the north of Scotland, through continual storms, in which the greater part of their vessels went down or were driven on shore. Only fifty-three ships reached Spain, and the loss of life was so terrible, that it was said that every family in the country lost a member.

The standard historians of Elizabeth's reign, and Camden, Fuller, or Hakluyt, need scarcely be mentioned, and the same may be said of Froude and Motley. There is a very good account of the Armada in Southey's "Life of Lord Howard of Effingham." Several accounts by eye-witnesses are to be found in the "Documentos Ineditos" (Spanish State Papers), particularly in vols. xiv and xlviii. Later works—J. A. Armagh, THE SCHOOL (OR UNIVERSITY) OF, was the centre of early Irish monastic civilization and learning. It was from here that the scholars who made Ireland famous throughout Christendom came. The best known among the Irish scholars said to have been trained at Armagh is John Scotus Erigena, whose death may be placed in the year 875. Even the capture of Armagh by Olaf's Danes was not sufficient to destroy entirely its school and its fame for learning. The continuance of the existence of a school there is vouched for by the proceedings of the Synod of Clare (1162), which decided that no one was to be a lector or reader in any monastic church in Ireland who was not an alumnus of Armagh. The presence of foreign students can be traced at least as far as the eleventh century. The existence of a learned body in Armagh is all the more remarkable as the see was, during the eleventh century, almost always in the hands of laymen.

Armagh, THE SYNOD OF, was held in 1170, when the Irish prelates, alarmed at the English invasion, which they regarded as a divine visitation, determined that all English slaves should be set free.

Armed Neutrality. In 1780 a coalition known as the First Armed Neutrality was entered into by the northern powers, who resented the right of search which was claimed by Great Britain in respect of all neutral vessels. In the treaty then made between Russia,

Sweden, and Denmark, the principle was proclaimed that "free ships make free goods," that the flag covers the merchandise, and that a port is to be considered blockaded only when a sufficient force for its blockade is in front of it. There was some ground for the contention that the rights of neutrals on the sea should be the same as on land. At this time Great Britain was in the midst of the war with the American colonies; France and Holland were also at war with her; and the right of search was indispensable, if she was to make any use of her naval superiority. Nevertheless, pressed as she was, it was impossible for her to take any active steps in opposition to the treaty, though she continued to exercise her right, which had been admitted by the several powers in former treaties. The armed neutrality was abandoned in 1781; in 1793 Russia entered into a treaty with Great Britain, which expressly recognized the right of search on neutral vessels; and in the same year America made a similar treaty with Great Britain. But in 1799 Napoleon, by a remarkable exercise of diplomatic skill, induced the Americans to adopt a maritime code on the basis of the Armed Neutrality of 1780; and at the same time the other powers saw an opening for a profitable trade with France, if the right of search were abolished. The principles of the Armed Neutrality were accordingly revived, and the determined persistence of the British government, combined with the skilful diplomacy of Napoleon, induced the northern powers again to enter into a coalition, known as the Second Armed Neutrality (1800), to enforce its principles. The British government acted with decisive energy. A fleet was dispatched to the Baltic; and the bombardment of Copenhagen, followed by the death of Tsar Paul, effectually broke up the northern coalition. On June 17, 1801, the Maritime Convention of St. Petersburg was opened; and finally a series of treaties was made between Great Britain and the northern powers by which the Armed Neutrality was abandoned, but the right of search was strictly defined, and it was agreed that blockades must be efficient to be valid. Arminians was the name sometimes given to the High Church party in the reign of Charles I. Strictly speaking, the Arminians were those Dutch Protestants who followed Arminius (Hermans), in opposition to the more rigid followers of Calvin. The party was the fruit of the reaction which had arisen in the beginning of the seventeenth century in the minds of many men against what seemed the bigotry of extreme Protestantism, and which made them inquire whether the Reformers, in their desire to get rid of the evils of popery, had not also destroyed much that was vital in Catholic Christianity. In the Netherlands the controversy between the Arminians and "Gomarists" led, early in the seventeenth century, to violent commotions. To disputes of dogma were added those concerning the rights of the Church with reference to the authority of the civil government in ecclesiastical affairs. The Arminians, with their leanings to the doctrines of Zwingli, maintained the right of the state to conduct the government of the Church, in conformity with the model of Scripture, and urged that, by the independence claimed by spiritual authority in the Reformed Church, a new popedom was being set up. The Gomarists, on the other hand, strictly adhering to the principles of Calvin, demanded the complete autonomy of the Church. This schism spread to the political world, and after being silenced in Holland by the decrees of the Synod of Dort in 1619, Arminianism took firm root in England, and was welcomed by many who shared in the reaction against Puritanism. A violent controversy began between Calvinists and Arminians. James I attempted to silence it (1622); but, in fact, in his later years, the king, who had been a Calvinist all his life, and had even written a book against Vorstius, the successor of Arminius, leaned towards Arminianism. For the Synod of Dort, by ascribing equal authority to all ministers of God's Word, no matter what their position, indirectly condemned the English Church. The Puritans and Presbyterians regarded the spread of Arminianism with great dislike, and on March 2, 1629, the Commons resolved that "whosoever shall bring in innovation in religion, or by favour seek to introduce Popery or Arminianism, shall be reputed a capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth." But Arminianism continued to gain influence among the High Churchmen, and the term came to be applied generally to all those who objected both to the Roman and Calvinist doctrines and theory of Church government (though they considered the Roman Catholic Church as corrupt and unsound), and who wished that the English Church should occupy a middle position between Rome and Geneva. Charles I and Laud were claimed by this party as its champions. They were supposed to be equally averse to Romanism and Puritanism, and they were regarded by the English Arminians as the great defenders of the Church from the dangers which threatened her on both sides. After the Restoration the name "Arminian" fell into disuse. [LAUD.]

Arms and Armour. In the Anglo-Saxon period body armour consisted of the "byrnie" or coat of leather, reinforced in the case of wealthy or important persons by rings of iron or brass, or by scales or disks of metal or horn. Chain mail seems also to have been in use before the Norman Conquest. The helmet was fashioned of leather or metal, or sometimes of a combination of both, and was generally conical in shape, being in the eleventh century often furnished with a nasal to protect the face from injury. The shield was circular and was generally made of linden-wood, covered with leather, painted or ornamented with metal studs, and finished in the centre with a projecting boss or "umbo." The chief weapons of offence were the iron sword, the lance or spear, the javelin, dagger, and axe. No essential differences distinguished the equipment of the Danes from that of the Anglo-Saxons, save for a tendency to greater elaboration of design, and the use of crude leg-defences of "cuir-bouilli." The Bayeux tapestry supplies us with valuable evidence as to the arms and armour of the Norman conquerors of England, and for about a century after 1066 these remained essentially unchanged. The typical equipment of the knight of both the Norman and the early Angevin periods consisted of the "hauberk" or mail shirt, furnished later with sleeves, fitting closely to the wrist, and with a coif covering both head and neck, and the conical iron helmet fitted with a nasal and sometimes with a neck-guard. Leg-coverings designed to protect the outer part of the limb when the wearer was in the saddle were occasionally but by no means generally worn. A kite-shaped shield, painted at first with some simple design, but later with the armorial bearings of the owner, was carried; and the characteristic weapons of offence were the lance, which appears also to have fulfilled the functions of a javelin, the axe, sword, mace, and bow. The Normans were essentially horsemen, but in the eleventh and early twelfth centuries no protection of any kind would seem to have been provided for the animal as distinct from its rider. From the time of Richard I onwards, however, the elaboration of the defences of both horse and knight proceeded apace. The surcoat of linen or silk which came into general use in John's reign was the most conspicuous feature of knightly costume for the next two centuries, but its military significance was negligible. Of greater importance was the universal adoption of the "gambeson"—a padded or quilted garment worn in conjunction with the "lorica" or coat of mail; the evolution from the very imperfect leg-guards of the Norman period of complete mail hose; the extension of the sleeves of the hauberk to form first mittens and later gloves for the protection of the hands of the combatants, and the substitution for the light Norman headpiece of the heavy and cumbrous pot-helm, which outlasted the thirteenth century. Finally, in the later years of Henry III the transition from chain to plate began with the application to such exposed parts of the body as the elbows, knees, and shins of plates of metal strapped on above the mail. Simultaneously with these developments came the introduction of horse-armour. The light, flowing "trapper" or "couverture" of linen or silk which figures so prominently in contemporary pictorial representations of warfare stands to the defence of the horse in much the same relation as that in which the surcoat stands to the armour of the knight—its purpose, that is, was ornamental rather than strictly utilitarian. More effective protection was afforded by the housings of mail or of gamboised and quilted textiles, which came into fashion in the second half of the thirteenth century, and were gradually supplemented by "chamfrons" or body-plates of "cuir-bouilli" or metal, in much the same way as the mail of the knight was supplemented by "coudes," "genouillères," and "jambes" of solid iron. The evolution in the Edwardian period of a new type of body armour was in no small measure a response to the contemporary development of new and efficient weapons of offence, among which were conspicuous the cross-bow and the long-bow. In order to afford protection to the knight and man-at-arms against the hail of arrows which by the beginning of the Hundred Years' War was becoming the chief peril of the battle-field, the use of plate was steadily extended until, by the end of the fourteenth century, mail had been reduced to the position of a mere auxiliary to the main defences of both horse and rider. During the following century and a half plate reached its highest development, and for sheer grace of outline and beauty of workmanship, the body armour of the fifteenth century—the "Gothic" period—has seldom been equalled. For a time, in fact, the progress of defensive equipment was more rapid than that of offensive appliances. The knight in full panoply of plate was virtually immune from injury by such traditional weapons as the lance, sword, or arrow. He had become a kind of mobile fortress or redoubt. To unhorse him was practicable, but his dispatch was a matter of greater difficulty. This explains the growing popularity in the later Middle Ages of weapons of percussion such as the pole-axe, mace, and flail, and of staff-weapons of the type of the halberd, partisan, glaive or bill, the curved blades and pointed spurs of which were devised to penetrate the interstices of the plate. With the evolution of fire-arms the science of offence gradually gained ground once more at the expense of that of defence; but their introduction cannot be regarded as the sole or even as the main cause of the ultimate disappearance of body armour in the seventeenth century. Of more importance was the fact that defensive armour was beginning to defeat the ends for which it had been devised. The intolerable weight of the full knightly panoply hampered the wearer and destroyed his mobility. James I said of it that it was "an admirable invention; for while it protected the wearer from being hurt, it effectually prevented, by its weight, his causing injury to others." Hence the use of full armour was gradually discontinued in actual warfare, although it was still employed in the mock warfare of the tournament. The Civil Wars of 1642-53 mark an important stage in the process of decline, which by the end of the century was virtually complete.

Arms, ASSIZE OF. [ASSIZE.]

Armstrong, SIR JOHN, of Gilnockie (d. 1528), the famous freebooter and hero of a stirring ballad, was the head of a powerful family which held practically independent power on the borders of England and Scotland and the "debatable land." The Scots government, however, regarded the Armstrongs as robbers, and James V determined to suppress them. In 1528 the king entered the border country at the head of a powerful force. Sir John Armstrong came to meet the king in great state, and attended by a train of gentlemen. He was immediately seized and hanged.

Army. [MILITARY SYSTEM.]

Army Plot (1641) was an attempt to use the English army, which had not been disbanded after the Scottish War, to coerce the parliament. There were two distinct plots for this purpose: (1) Percy Wilmot and other officers and members of parliament proposed to induce the officers of the army to sign a declaration that they would stand by the king: (a) if parliamentary pressure were put upon him, either to compel him to assent to the exclusion of the bishops from the House of Lords, or to force him to disband the Irish army before the Scots were disbanded; (b) or if the full revenue he had enjoyed for so many years were not placed in his hands. At the same time, a plot somewhat similar, but contemplating the direct employment of force, was being contrived by Sir John Suckling and Henry Jermyn with the approval of the queen. They intended to commence operations by placing the command of the army in the hands of the Earl of Newcastle and George Goring (q.v.). Charles at first endeavoured to get the two parties to work together, and finding this impossible, decided against Suckling's plan. Goring, seeing no prospect of becoming lieutenant-general, betrayed the plot to the Earl of Newport, through whom it reached Pym (April 1). Meanwhile, Suckling had by no means abandoned his scheme, and he was also arranging an attempt to rescue Strafford from the Tower. Pym made use of his knowledge of this double plot to secure the agreement of the two Houses, and the support of the people. On May 3 the Protestation was drawn up, on the next day it was taken by the Lords, on the 5th it was agreed that a bill should be brought in to provide against the dissolution of the parliament, on the 8th that bill and the Attainder Bill both passed their first reading in the Lords. The king, left without any support, gave his assent to both bills on the 10th. Percy, Jermyn, Suckling and others fled to France, but were declared guilty of high treason. Thus the first attempt to use the army against the parliament gave fresh strength to the popular party. (2) At the end of May or the beginning of June, Daniel O'Neill was sent by the king to sound the officers of the army as to the feasibility of bringing up the troops to London if the neutrality of the Scots could be secured. At the same time one of the officers was entrusted by the king with a petition, to which he was to obtain signatures in the army. The petition protested against the unreasonable demands of the popular leaders, the diminution of the king's "just regalities," and the tumultuous assemblies round the Houses of Parliament. It concluded with a promise to defend king, church, parliament, and laws. The leaders of the army repudiated the petition, and O'Neill was obliged to fly, but the king still persisted in his intrigues for this purpose both during his journey to Scotland and his stay in that country. The knowledge of this new plot made Pym, on the outbreak of the Irish Rebellion, demand that the king should employ only such ministers as parliament should approve; otherwise the Commons would be obliged to provide for Ireland without the king. He followed this by bringing the evidence before the Commons, who passed a resolution affirming that there was "a second design to bring up the army against the parliament, and an intention to make the Scottish army stand as neutral." This event did much to secure the passing of the "Grand Remonstrance" (q.v.).

Arnee, BATTLE OF (June 7, 1782), took place in the Mysore War between the British, under Sir Eyre Coote, and the troops of Hyder Ali, commanded by the Sultan in person. After an indecisive action, Hyder retreated.

Arrah, DEFENCE OF (1857). On July 25 three native regiments plundered the town and station of Arrah, and, headed by Koor Singh, a zemindar, who had rebelled, attacked a house where sixteen Englishmen and sixty Sikh police had taken refuge and fortified themselves. Mr. Boyle, an engineer, was the life of the defence, until Major Vincent Eyre, of the artillery, formed a small field force, with which he released the garrison on August 3.

Arran, EARLS OF. [HAMILTON.]

Arran, JAMES STUART, EARL OF (d. 1596). [STUART.]

Arran, PEERAGE OF. 1. SCOTTISH.—In 1467 Sir R. Boyd was created Earl of Arran. His widow married James, Lord Hamilton, and the earldom passed into that family. [HAMILTON.] 2. IRISH.—In 1693 Charles Butler, warden of the Cinque Ports, and master of the ordnance in Ireland, second son of Thomas, Earl of Ossory, the son of James, Duke of Ormonde, was created Earl of Arran. The peerage, however, became extinct with him. The present peerage was conferred on Sir Arthur Gore in 1758. He was the descendant of Sir Paul Gore, captain of a troop of horse in Elizabeth's reign, who arrived in Ireland and obtained large grants of land in County Mayo. [STUART.]

Arras, THE BATTLE OF (April 1917), one of the leading battles of the Great War, originated in the strategical positions produced by the battles of the Aisne (1914) and the Somme (1916, q.v.), on the western front. The allied attack, preparations for which had been begun as early as October 1916, was directed towards crossing the river Scarpe and turning the newly-constructed Hindenburg Line by an advance on Cambrai. The attack opened on April 9 and closed on May 5 without having achieved its objective. Although the German front line and part of the second line succumbed to the opening onslaught, the strength of the German reserves, combined with the allies' lack of adequate artillery support and the exhaustion of the French after the Somme campaign, spelt failure. The British casualties numbered 132,000.

Arras, THE CONGRESS OF (1435), was assembled for the purpose of making peace between England, Burgundy, and France. Ambassadors came from England, France, Burgundy, the pope, the Council of Basle, Castile, Aragon, Naples, Portugal, Sicily, Cyprus, Navarre, Poland, Denmark, Milan, and Brittany. The French offered to cede Normandy and Guienne to the English, but this was indignantly refused, and the Treaty of Troyes was insisted upon, certain territories south of the Loire being offered to Charles of France. This being rejected, the English representatives withdrew, and a treaty of peace and alliance was signed between France and Burgundy, by which the latter power agreed not to treat with the English without the sanction of the King of France.

Array, COMMISSIONS OF, were first issued under Edward I—though their germs may be discerned at a much earlier date. They authorized certain individuals—usually men of military experience—to press for service in the king's army a number of men in their district, or sometimes all men capable of bearing arms and undertaking military duties. Under Edward I the forces thus raised were paid by the king, but under Edward II and Edward III the cost usually fell on the townships which furnished the men. The commissions were extremely unpopular, and Edward III had to promise in 1327 that all troops levied by this means should in future be paid by the king—a promise, however, which was not kept. In 1352 and 1402 it was provided that no commission of array should issue without "the common assent and grant of parliament," and the statute of Henry IV further provided that, except in case of invasion, none should be constrained to go out of their own counties, and that men chosen to go on the king's service out of England should be at the king's wages from the day they left their own counties. As thus defined, commissions were issued probably in the later Lancastrian, and certainly in the Yorkist and Tudor reigns. In the latter period, however, the commissioner of array became gradually merged in the lieutenant of the county, who eventually became the lord-lieutenant of modern times. [MILITARY SYSTEM.]

Arrest, FREEDOM FROM, is the special privilege of members of both Houses of Parliament, and is enjoyed by them during the session, and for forty days before and after, except in cases of treason, felony, or breach of the peace. The earliest mention of an analogous privilege is in a law of Ethelbert in the sixth century, which provides that "If the king call his people to him, and any one there do them injury, let him compensate with a twofold 'bot,' and fifty shillings to the king." In 1290 this privilege was confirmed by Edward I, who, in reply to a petition from the master of the Temple that he might distrain for the rent of a house held of him by the Bishop of St. Davids, replied that, "It does not seem fit that the king should grant that they who are of his council should be distrained in time of parliament." So too in the Prior of Malton's case, in 1315. The first recognition of the privilege by act of parliament was in 1433, when it was enacted that any assault on a member on his way to parliament was to be punishable by a double fine; though in 1404 Henry IV had replied to a petition that a threefold fine might be inflicted for such an offence, that though he admitted the privilege, the existing remedy was sufficient. The existence of the privilege was thus, by usage and by statute, clearly established; but frequent violations occurred under the Angevin and Lancastrian kings. In 1301 Henry Keighley was imprisoned by Edward I after the Parliament of Lincoln. In 1376 Peter de la Mare, the Speaker of the Good Parliament, was imprisoned at the instance of John of Gaunt; whilst in 1453 occurred the famous case of Speaker Thorpe (q.v.), who was imprisoned during the prorogation of parliament at the suit of the Duke of York. The Commons tried to obtain his release "for the dispatch of the business of parliament," but, failed, though the judges held that "if a member were arrested for any less cause than treason, felony, breach of the peace, and sentence of parliament, he should make his attorney and be released to attend in parliament." Thorpe, however, was not released, owing to the influence of the Duke of York. In 1460 Walter Clerk, member for Chippenham, was arrested "for a fine to the king, and damages to two private suitors," whereupon the Commons demanded and obtained his release. In 1477 John Atwyll, member for Exeter, was imprisoned for debt, but was released on the petition of the House. Up to the reign of Henry VIII arrested members had obtained their release either by special act of parliament if they were imprisoned in execution after judgment, or by a writ of privilege issued by the chancellor if confined on mesne process (i.e., after the commencement of a suit before judgment); but, in 1543, in the case of George Ferrers (q.v.), who had been arrested as surety for a debt, the House demanded his release by virtue of its own authority, and on the refusal of the sheriffs to liberate him committed them to prison for contempt, their proceedings being confirmed by the king. From this time members were usually released by the serjeant by warrant of the mace, not by writ (as in Smalley's case, 1575). In 1603 occurred the case of Sir Thomas Shirley, whom the warden of the Fleet refused to release for fear of becoming personally liable for his debt. This led to an act discharging from all liability the officer from whose custody a person having the privilege of parliament has been delivered, and enabling the creditor to sue out a new writ on the expiration of the period of privilege. The privilege of freedom from arrest for some time belonged not only to members of parliament but also to their servants (as in Smalley's case, 1575, and Johnson's case, 1621), but in 1770 a statute (based on earlier statutes of William III and Anne) confined the privilege to the persons of members, owing to the frequent abuse of the privilege, which was used as a means of escape from debt. [Imprisonment for debt was abolished in 1869.] As lately as 1880 it was decided on precedents that the duration of the privilege is forty days before and after the meeting of parliament; on the ground that the time must be clearly defined. The House of Commons has always maintained its powers of imprisoning its own members for contempt, as in the case of John Stone in 1547, and Arthur Hall in 1581. The right of a member of parliament to claim freedom from arrest has never been allowed to extend to criminal offences; and though in 1572 Lord Cromwell obtained his release after committal for contempt of court, in more recent times members committed by courts of law for open contempt have failed in obtaining release by virtue of privilege, "though," observes Sir Erskine May, "each case is still open to consideration when it arises." [PARLIAMENT.]

Arthur, KING, the famous British and Christian hero of romance, had already become the centre of much Celtic legend, especially in Brittany, when Geoffrey of Monmouth published, in 1130, his "Historia Britonum." This work, though it poisoned the very fountains of history, acquired, in spite of protest (e.g., by William of Malmesbury), wide popularity, and became the source of that elaborate legend of Arthur and his Round Table which has inspired so much that is best in literature. Geoffrey's fictions were largely regarded as history, until, by an inevitable reaction, Milton and most of the eighteenth-century writers were led to disbelieve that any Arthur had really lived. Gildas, nearly a contemporary, makes no mention of him. The earliest really historical notices of Arthur are found in Nennius and the Welsh tenth-century chronicle called "Annales Cambriae" (MS. A). Nennius says ("Mon. Hist. Britan.," 73-4), "Artur pugnabat contra illos [videlicet Saxones] cum regibus Britonum; sed ipse dux erat bellorum, et in omnibus bellis victor exstitit." He then gives a list of Arthur's twelve victories, ending with the battle "in monte Badonis." This the "Annales Cambriae" place in A.D. 516, and make Arthur a Christian hero. The same authority places his death at the battle of Camlan, in 537. Will this evidence compensate for the silence of Gildas? All really depends on our estimate of Nennius. Many, like Milton, repudiate Nennius as a "very trivial author"; but others, including such great nineteenth-century authorities as Guest and Skene, have fully accepted his authority, though recognizing the fragmentary and unequal character of the series of treatises that collectively go by his name. Skene ("Four Ancient Books of Wales," "Celtic Scotland") claimed that Arthur was the leader of the Northern Cymry of Strathclyde and Cumbria against the Saxons; and identified places in those regions as the scenes of the twelve battles—Mons Badonis being Bouden Hill, near Lulithgow. Arthur, according to this view, was not a king, but a temporary general, the "Gwledig," who led the combined hosts of the princes of the Northern Britons to unwonted victories. He was the successor of the Roman generals of the legions encamped along the Pictish wall. His victories led to the restriction of the Saxons to the country east of the Pennine range, and so created the Cumbrian kingdom. He died defeated by a revolt of the heathen British, perhaps in alliance with the Saxons. Guest placed the scene of Arthur's victories in the western border-land of the growing state of the West Saxons (e.g., Mons Badonis he locates at Badbury, in Dorsetshire). Elton ("Origins of British History") doubtfully followed Skene; while Professor Rhys ("Celtic Britain") regarded Arthur simply as the "ideal champion of the Brythonic race," whether in Wales, Cumbria, Cornwall, or Brittany. The consensus of recent opinion seems, however, to be definitely in favour of the historicity of Arthur.

Arthur of Brittany (1187-1203)—the son of Geoffrey Plantagenet—had, as third son of Henry II, a better hereditary claim to the English throne than his uncle John, Henry's fourth son. His mother, Constance of Brittany (q.v.), had, however, prejudiced his chances of the succession partly by her championship of the independence of her duchy and partly by her alienation of the old queen Eleanor. When, therefore, Richard I died, in 1199, England and Aquitaine declared for John; and Arthur, who could only rely upon the support of the barons of Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, was forced to seek the alliance of Philip Augustus of France. War broke out between Philip and John, but the former was more eager for his own interests than for Arthur, and very soon a peace was concluded, by which Philip's eldest son Louis was to marry Blanche of Castile, John's niece, John giving her the county of Evreux as a marriage portion. Arthur, who was betrothed to one of Philip's daughters, was forced to do homage to John for Brittany in 1200. Two years later, however, Philip accepted the appeal of John's malcontent Lusignan barons, and cited the English king to Paris. On John's refusal to obey the summons, Philip declared war and once more espoused the cause of Arthur, whom he invested with Brittany, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, and Poitou. Arthur commenced operations by attacking his grandmother Eleanor at Mirabel; but he was captured by John, who imprisoned him, first at Falaise, and afterwards at Rouen, where he died. The manner of Arthur's death is unknown, nor is it ever likely to be determined with certainty. The generally received account of his death, which has been consecrated by tradition and poetry, was that he was murdered by his uncle's own hand, and his body thrown into the Seine. The peers of France found John guilty of the murder, but it is doubtful how far this can be accepted as confirmation of the accusation.

Arthur, PRINCE (1486-1502), was the eldest son of Henry VII. His marriage with Katharine of Aragon was first agreed upon between the Kings of Spain and England in March 1489, when he was not yet three years old, and he was little more than fifteen when the actual wedding ceremony was celebrated at St. Paul's, November 14, 1501. Bacon describes the young prince as a studious youth, and learned beyond his years. His name of Arthur was a graceful acknowledgment on Henry's part of his own British descent through Sir Owen Tudor.

Articles, THE LORDS OF THE, possibly first appointed in the reign of James I (1406-37), became gradually a recognized part of the legislative machinery of Scotland. The "Lords" consisted of a committee chosen equally from each estate to prepare the various measures, which, when completed, were laid before the estates for final adoption or rejection. An earlier form of delegation is found under David II, when, in 1367, the three estates transferred their authority to a general commission, so that they might be free to return home to gather in the harvest. William III endeavoured to remodel the system in 1689. He ordered that the Lords should consist of twenty-four persons, eight being chosen from each estate, and took away their power of rejecting absolutely any motion laid before them. The estates, however, voted that a permanent committee was objectionable, and in 1690, after several further suggestions had broken down, William gave his assent to a measure abolishing the Lords of the Articles, and providing for temporary committees, to be elected as occasion might arise. [ESTATES.]

Articles of Grievances, voted April 1689 by the Scots Estates, protested against sundry laws which were held to be burdensome and dangerous, and were intended to show William III in what cases reforms were needed. The estates complained chiefly of the laws passed in the parliament of 1685; of the reference of legislative proceedings to permanent committees to the injury of free parliamentary discussion; and of the act of 1669 which made the sovereign head of the Church. The Articles of Grievances differed from the Claim of Right in that the former laid down fundamental rules of the constitution which had been violated by James II; the latter merely petitioned for certain necessary reforms.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Articles of Religion. In England, as in other European countries, the Reformation period was marked by several attempts to codify or embody in an authoritative form the articles of religious belief. With a view to putting an end to discussion, Henry VIII, with the aid of his theological advisers, compiled a "Book of Articles," which was laid before convocation in 1536, and subscribed by all its members. These Articles established the Bible, the three creeds, and the first four councils as the basis of belief; limited the Sacraments to three, baptism, penance, and the Eucharist; declared that, though the use of images, the worship of saints, and the ritual of the church services had not in themselves power to remit sins, yet they were useful to lift up men's minds unto God; accepted purgatory, but denounced pardons, and masses for the dead. These Articles pleased neither the Reformers nor the Romanists, and were accepted merely at the king's command. In 1539 Henry VIII's policy led him to check the growth of the reforming doctrines, and parliament passed the bill of the Six Articles (q.v.), which affirmed transubstantiation, the reception of the communion under one kind, the celibacy of the clergy, the binding power of vows of chastity, private masses, and auricular confession. Soon after the death of Henry VIII, in the parliament of 1547 the Statute of the Six Articles was repealed. In 1551 an order of the council was issued to Archbishop Cranmer bidding him frame Articles of Religion. This task the archbishop discharged with caution and deliberation. He consulted with others, circulated a rough draft, and laid it before the council. After many revisions it was handed for final consideration and emendation to five of the royal chaplains, and to John Knox, the Scottish reformer. Though it was thus discussed and revised, the draft was in the main the work of Cranmer and his friend Bishop Ridley, who is said to have supplied the greater share of learning. There is some doubt whether or not these Articles were submitted to convocation; but the evidence seems to show that they were. Finally, they were issued in 1553, with the royal mandate to all the bishops ordering them to call on all clergy, schoolmasters, and churchwardens, to subscribe. These Articles of Edward VI, from their number, are sometimes known as the Forty-two Articles. They show that Cranmer in framing them used the Lutheran Confessions of Faith, especially the Confession of Augsburg, though he did not merely copy them. The accession of Queen Mary within two months of the publication of the Forty-two Articles did not give them much time to sink into the minds of the clergy. On the accession of Elizabeth, Archbishop Parker was called on to provide for the troubled condition of ecclesiastical matters. In 1559 Eleven Articles were issued by authority, to be held by all clergy. They were limited to the definition of fundamental truths, and the points in which the Church of England held the Roman practice to be superstitious. These were meant to be temporary only, while Parker reconsidered the Forty-two Articles of Edward VI. He revised them, and laid the results of his revision before convocation in 1562. As Cranmer had used the Confession of Augsburg, Parker made further use of the Confession of Wurtemberg. In his revision he omitted four of the original Forty-two Articles—the tenth, "Of Grace"; the sixteenth,

"Of Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost"; the nineteenth, "All men are bound to keep the Moral Commandments of the Law" (the first part of which was added to the seventh); and the forty-first, against "Heretics called Millenarii." He added four others—the fifth, twelfth, nineteenth, and thirtieth of the present edition. Besides these greater changes, the phraseology was altered in many points. The convocation made further alterations, and several important omissions. It struck out the end of the third Article, concerning the preaching of Christ to the spirits in prison, and entirely discarded three Articles—"The souls of them that depart this life do neither die with the bodies, nor sleep idly"; "The resurrection of the dead is not yet brought to pass"; "All men shall not be saved at the length." The Articles, now reduced in number to thirty-nine, were submitted to the queen, who further struck out the present twenty-ninth Article, "Of the wicked which eat not the Body of Christ in the use of the Lord's Supper." She further added to the twentieth Article the clause, "The Church hath power to decree rites or ceremonies, and authority in controversies of faith." The Articles were originally in Latin; but an English translation was soon issued of the Thirty-eight Articles as they passed the revision of the queen and council. In 1571 the Articles were committed by convocation to Bishop Jewel for editorship. They were then put into their present form, and were issued both in Latin and English—both versions being authoritative and official. The twenty-ninth Article was restored, and the other alteration of the queen, on the authority of the Church to determine rites and ceremonies, was retained in the English Articles, but omitted in the Latin. The Thirty-nine Articles were then approved by parliament, and a statute was passed requiring subscription from all candidates for holy orders. From this time forward they have been the standard of the opinions of the Church of England. Accordingly, the "Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical" passed by convocation in 1603, and confirmed by royal authority, enacted excommunication as the penalty to anyone who "declared the Thirty-nine Articles to be erroneous, superstitious, or such as he may not with a good conscience subscribe unto." But these canons, not having been passed by parliament, are binding only as ecclesiastical law on the clergy, not on the laity. As regards the legal aspect of the Thirty-nine Articles, the act of 1571 enacted that no one should be admitted to a benefice till he had subscribed the Articles in the presence of the ordinary, and publicly read them in the parish church, with a declaration of his unfeigned assent. The canons of 1603 further enacted that no one should teach, either in a school or in a private house, unless he subscribed the Thirty-nine Articles and obtained a licence from a bishop. The Act of Uniformity, passed in 1662, embodied this provision. The Toleration Act of 1689 exempted from the penalties of existing statutes against conventicles such dissenting ministers and teachers as should subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles, omitting the thirty-fourth, thirty-fifth, thirty-sixth, and the words of the twentieth which declare that the Church has power to decree rites and ceremonies. Those who had scruples about infant baptism were exempted from subscription to part of the twenty-seventh Article. This act was the beginning of a period of indulgence and security from persecution to Dissenters, which went on till in 1779 was passed the Dissenting Ministers Act, enabling Dissenters to preach and act as schoolmasters without any subscription to the Articles. From this time forward subscription to the Articles ceased to be a test for the exclusion of Dissenters, except in the universities. At Oxford, the Earl of Leicester as chancellor had, in 1581, imposed subscription to the Articles before matriculation. At Cambridge, subscription, since 1616, was required of all who took a degree. Thus, Dissenters could not enter the University of Oxford; they might be educated at Cambridge, but were not admitted to any of the endowments. These disabilities were not removed till the passing of the University Tests Act in 1871, which exempted laymen from any religious test. Thus the Articles have ceased to be used as a standard of orthodoxy for any save the clergy of the Church of England. Even in their case it was felt that subscription to a body of doctrinal statements was an excessive obligation, if it was meant to imply literal agreement with every sentence contained in them. To avoid further ambiguities, and to relieve scrupulous consciences on this point, the Clerical Subscription Act of 1866 did away with subscription in the case of the clergy, and substituted a declaration of assent to the Thirty-nine Articles and the Prayer Book.

Articles of War are framed by the Crown for the better government of the army and navy. Those which are in force for the army were first authorized in 1714, and are confirmed annually in the Mutiny Act, the Articles of War for the navy being based on a bill passed in 1749 (repealed 1860). The Articles of War, "which are to be obeyed as being the commands of a superior officer," are divided into sections, some of which correspond to clauses in the Mutiny Act; others, however, though they relate to subjects in the latter, are occupied with definitions of the crime and the punishment appropriate to it. There are some Articles, moreover, which have no counterpart in the act. It is to be observed that the legality of the Articles of War, as of other orders, may itself become the subject of examination and controversy in a court-martial; but the Mutiny Act, being part of the statute law, must be obeyed without question. In 1879 the Army Discipline Act consolidated the provisions of the Mutiny Act and the Articles of War. This was amended by the Army Act of 1881, which provided a fairly complete code of military law. [MILITARY SYSTEM.]

Articuli Super Cartas were certain articles, twenty in number, supplementing the Great Charter and the Charter of the Forests, which were accepted by Edward I in the parliament which met in March 1300. The most important clauses are those which appoint commissioners to investigate all cases in which the charters had been infringed; those which reform and regulate the jury system; those which remedy the abuses of purveyance and of the jurisdiction of the royal officers; and those which order that no common pleas shall be held in the Exchequer contrary to the form of Magna Carta, and forbid the issue of common law writs under the privy seal. One article, which has been called "a curious relic of the ideas of 1258," allows the office of sheriff to be elective in counties where the office is not of fee or heritable. There were also articles regulating administration of the forests, and limiting the royal jurisdiction over them.

Arundel, EARLS OF. [FITZ-ALAN: HOWARD.]

Arundel, PEERAGE OF. Roger de Montgomery, one of the most trusted followers of William the Conqueror, received, besides grants of land in Shropshire, vast estates in Sussex, including the castle and honour of Arundel. In 1102, upon the forfeiture of Roger's son, Robert de Bellême, the honour of Arundel passed to the Crown, and was settled by Henry I on his second wife, Adela of Louvain (q.v.), who, after the king's death, conveyed it to her second husband, William de Albini, afterwards Earl of Sussex. William de Albini, the son of this marriage, received, like his father, a grant of the third penny of the county of Sussex; and is styled Earl of Sussex, as well as Earl of Arundel. In 1243 Hugh de Albini, Earl of Sussex and Arundel, died without issue, and part of his estates, including the honour of Arundel, passed to his nephew, John Fitz-Alan, Lord of Clun and Oswestry. He and his sons are styled Lords of Arundel only; Richard Fitz-Alan (d. 1302) being the first to resume the title of earl. His son Edmund was beheaded in 1326, and his honours forfeited. They were, however, restored to Richard, his son and heir, in 1331. In 1580 Henry Fitz-Alan, 25th earl, died without male heirs, and the earldom and estates passed by the marriage of his daughter Mary to Philip, son of Thomas, 4th Duke of Norfolk. Philip was summoned to parliament as Earl of Arundel. The earldom has since continued in the line of the Fitz-Alan Howards, Dukes of Norfolk. The peerage of ARUNDEL of WARDOUR was conferred in 1605 on Sir Thomas Arundel, a distinguished soldier, who had fought in the wars against the Turks, and had been created a Count of the Holy Roman Empire by Rudolph II. Arundel, THOMAS (1353-1414), was the third son of Richard Fitz-Alan, Earl of Arundel, and was made Bishop of Ely in 1374. He joined Gloucester in his opposition to de la Pole and other ministers of Richard II, and in 1386 was appointed chancellor. On the banishment of Neville he received the archbishopric of York, and retired from the chancellorship in 1389. He was chancellor again from 1391, till his appointment to the archbishopric of Canterbury in 1396. Next year he was accused with Gloucester, his brother the Earl of Arundel, and Warwick, of treason, and at the king's request was translated by the pope to the see of St. Andrews. He was banished from the realm, and concerted with Bolingbroke plans for regaining power in England. He accompanied Henry on his expedition to England in 1399, and on the deposition of Richard received once more the archbishopric and the chancellorship. He strenuously supported the rights of the Church during the remainder of his life, and was instrumental in getting the statute De Heretico Comburendo passed. He held the chancellorship again from 1407 to 1409, and from 1412 to 1413.

Arundell, SIR THOMAS OF LANHERNE (d. 1552), was educated in Wolsey's household and enjoyed the favour of Henry VIII, who appointed him in 1535 a commissioner for the suppression of the monasteries. He married Margaret, the sister of Queen Catherine Howard. He was a partisan of the Protector Somerset, in whose fall he was involved. He was executed on a charge of treason, February 1552.

Asaf-ud-Dowlah (d. 1797) succeeded his father, Shuja-ud-Dowlah, as Vizir of Oudh, in 1775, and was ultimately recognized by the emperor. A treaty was concluded with the British, by which the vizir agreed to surrender Benares and certain other districts. This vizir misgoverned, as his father had done, and by 1781 was in a state of the greatest pecuniary embarrassment. Hastings therefore concluded an arrangement with him, one main object of which was to relieve him from burdens which he professed himself totally unable to bear. His reign was a mixture of oppression, sensuality, and poverty. [HASTINGS.]

Ascalon (mod. ASKALAN), a town on the coast of Syria, about twelve miles north of Gaza, was a place of great strength and importance in the earlier Crusades. It was to this town that Richard I led the crusading army after the fall of Acre in the early part of 1192. On the way his troops were intercepted by a great Saracen army, under the command of Saladin, said to number over 300,000 men. The two wings of the Christian army were broken; but the centre, commanded by Richard himself, held firm, and at last drove back the enemy in great disorder. The Saracens are said to have suffered heavy losses. The victory threw the town of Ascalon into the hands of the Crusaders.

Ascension Island, situated in the South Atlantic, was discovered by the Portuguese on Ascension Day, 1501. It was never colonized until it was seized by the British in 1815, during the captivity of Napoleon in the neighbouring island of St. Helena.

Ascham, ANTONY (d. 1650), an author "of much reputation," was sent by the Commonwealth, in 1650, as ambassador to Madrid. A few days after his arrival there, he was assassinated by some refugee Royalists. The murderers, with the exception of one who was executed, were allowed to escape, public opinion in the Spanish capital being entirely in their favour.

Ascham, ROGER (1515-68), one of the earliest of English Greek scholars, and at one time public orator at Cambridge, became Latin secretary successively to Edward VI, Queen Mary, and Elizabeth, and was also tutor to the last-named princess in 1548, being charged with her instruction in the learned languages. In 1550 he accompanied Sir Richard Morysin, ambassador to the court of Charles V, in the capacity of secretary. On the accession of Queen Elizabeth, Ascham was, in 1559, made a canon of York. As a writer of English prose Ascham deserves high praise. His style, though somewhat rugged, is pithy and vigorous. His work on education, entitled "The Scholemaster," is interesting and valuable. He also wrote "Toxophilus," a treatise on archery, and "A Report of the Affairs and State of Germany," which is of some historical value.

Ashanti. [WEST AFRICA, BRITISH DOMINIONS IN.]

Ashanti, WARS IN. Ashanti first came into conflict with Britain in 1807, and again in 1816, when its ruler defeated the British in two encounters. When war was renewed in 1823 Sir C. MacCarthy, governor of Cape Coast Castle, was defeated and killed. His death was avenged at Dudowah in 1826. A British punitive expedition sent out in 1863 was smitten with fever and withdrew, but in 1873 a force under Sir Garnet Wolseley defeated the Ashantis on November 5 and took Kumasi (q.v.) on February 5, 1874. By the Treaty of Fommanah, signed a week later, King Koffee Kalkali agreed to allow free trade and to discontinue human sacrifices. After an unsuccessful revolt in 1900 Ashanti was finally annexed by Great Britain (1901) and placed under the Governor of the Gold Coast.

Ashburnham, SIR JOHN (d. 1671), a descendant of an old Sussex family, sat in the Long Parliament, and took a prominent part on the Royalist side, and at the outbreak of the Civil War joined the king, and was appointed treasurer and paymaster to the army. He attended Charles I when he gave himself up to the Scots, and immediately afterwards fled to France. In 1647 he returned, and became one of the king's personal attendants, and was the chief contriver of Charles's escape from Hampton Court. The business was mismanaged, and Ashburnham was accused of treachery by the Royalists; for which, however, there seems to be little ground. He remained in England after the king's death, and compounded for his estate, but being detected in sending money to Charles II, he was in 1654 imprisoned in the Tower, where he remained till Cromwell's death. At the Restoration he received large grants of land, and was made groom of the bedchamber to the king.

Ashburton, JOHN DUNNING, 1ST BARON (1731-83). [DUNNING.]

Ashburton Treaty, THE (1842), was concluded between Great Britain and the United States for settling the frontiers of the two countries. It defined them to run along the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude from the great lakes to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver Island, and thence southwards through the middle of that channel to the Pacific. It neglected, however, to define the middle of the channel, and in consequence a dispute, which was settled in 1872 by arbitration, in favour of the United States, arose as to the ownership of the little island of San Juan.

Ashby, SIR JOHN (1642-93), a distinguished naval officer, was appointed captain of the Defiance, and took part in the engagement with the French fleet in Bantry Bay and in the battle of Beachy Head (q.v.). In 1692 he fought in the battle of La Hogue, and, together with Delaval, was entrusted with the pursuit of the French ships. Nottingham afterwards accused him in parliament, together with Admiral

Russell, of negligence in the latter part of the engagements; and though triumphantly acquitted, Ashby seems never to have taken active service again. [LA HOGUE.]

Ashby v. White. [AYLESBURY ELECTION CASE.]

Ashdown (ÆSCDUN). The name of the ridge of chalk hills running east and west between the valleys of the Ock and the Kennet, where was fought, in 871, a great battle between the West Saxons, led by Ethelred and Alfred, and the Danish host, which had spread over East Anglia and invaded Wessex this year. The Danes had seized Reading, and before this town the Saxons were badly beaten. A few days later they again attacked their foes at Ashdown. A desperate battle was fought, lasting all day, and ending in the flight of the Danes. One of their kings and five of their "jarls" fell in the battle. The victory was in great part due to the vigour and promptitude of Alfred, who led one of the two divisions of the Wessex army. [ALFRED.]

Ashe, SIMEON (d. 1662), was one of those clergymen who were ejected from their livings by Laud for refusing to read the declaration concerning the "Book of Sports" (q.v.). He became chaplain to the Earl of Manchester, and had considerable influence with Presbyterian leaders in the war. He was, however, a strong opponent of the Commonwealth, and was one of those who went to Breda to congratulate Charles II on his restoration.

Ashe was present at the battle of Marston Moor, and wrote an interesting and valuable account of the campaign, "A True Relation of the moste chiefe Occurrences at and since the late Battell at Newbery . . . to vindicate the Earle of Manchester" (London, 1644).

Ashta, THE BATTLE OF (1818), was fought between the British troops under General Sir Lionel Smith and Baji Rao. The Peshwa, heaping reproaches on his brave general, Gokla, for having allowed himself to be surprised, fled at once. Gokla, stung by the insult, placed himself at the head of 300 horse, but was defeated and slain by a British cavalry charge (February 20).

Asiento, THE (1713), or the "contract" for supplying the Spanish colonies in the Western world with negro slaves, was at first an arrangement between France and Spain. After the merchandise had been carried on by Genoa and Portugal, it had been undertaken in 1702 by a French company. By one of the stipulations of the Treaty of Utrecht, this right was surrendered to Great Britain, and confirmed by a special treaty of forty-two clauses. After France had resigned the Asiento, Spain was to convey it to Great Britain for thirty years, at the end of which period, and a further term of three years, the traffic was to be wound up. Great Britain was to furnish 4,800 negroes annually. With the Asiento Great Britain was to have the right of sending two ships a year, each of five hundred tons burden, to America with negroes. A contest for this profitable monopoly soon arose between the African and the South Sea Company; the latter were successful, and obtained the fourth part reserved for the queen by the terms of the treaty. On the outbreak of war with Spain, Great Britain lost the Asiento, but it was once more renewed in 1725, and was again restored to her by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748), for the remaining four years which it had to run.

Aske, ROBERT (d. 1537), was a gentleman of Yorkshire, and the chief organizer of the famous rebellion of Henry VIII's reign known as the Pilgrimage of Grace (q.v.). His sympathies with the prevalent discontent seem to have been excited originally by his accidental sojourn at Lincoln during the disturbances there in September 1536. While the various leaders of the movement were executed, Robert Aske had the distinction of being hanged in chains on one of the towers of York. Aske's talents for organization and command, and his moderation and integrity, make him a very remarkable character.

Askew (ASCUE, or AYSCOUGH), ANNE (d. 1546), daughter of Sir William Askew, of Kelsey, in Lincolnshire, was arrested as a heretic for denying the doctrine of the Real Presence in the Sacrament. From her intimacy with Catherine Parr, Anne Askew's prosecution for heresy is memorable, as it revealed, among other things, the hostility of Bishop Gardiner and Lord Chancellor Wriothesley to the queen; for before being handed over to the executioner for the punishment of burning, Anne, in spite of her sex, was made to undergo in the Tower the torture of the rack, with a view of extorting from her in her agony some avowal implicating other court ladies, and possibly the queen.

Asquith, HERBERT HENRY, EARL OF OXFORD AND ASQUITH (1852-1928), was educated at the City of London School and at Balliol College, Oxford. He was called to the bar in 1876, and took silk in 1890. He entered the House of Commons as member for East Fife in 1886, was one of Parnell's counsel before the Commission, and first took office as home secretary under Gladstone in 1892. After the fall of the ministry in 1895 he returned to the bar. From 1903-5 he vigorously opposed Joseph Chamberlain's fiscal policy. In 1905 he became chancellor of the exchequer in the Liberal ministry. On the resignation of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman he was summoned by the king (April 5, 1908), and formed a new cabinet, himself becoming prime minister and first lord of the treasury, retaining this position till 1916, when a coalition government was formed with Mr. Lloyd George as premier. In 1918 Mr. Asquith lost his seat as member for East Fife, but was returned for Paisley in 1920 and resumed his position as leader of the Liberal party. He was created Earl of Oxford and Asquith in 1925, and retired from the leadership of his party in 1926. His book, "Fifty Years of Parliament," appeared in 1926.

Assam. A province of British India lying along the upper valleys of the Brahmaputra, and extending from the frontiers of Bengal to Northern Burma. The country was conquered in the early Middle Ages by tribes from Burma, who, however, gradually assimilated in language and religion with the Hindus. The Mohammedans never succeeded in conquering the country, though they frequently attempted it. In the early part of the nineteenth century the Assamese became closely connected with Burma, and their hostile attitude to the East India Company brought about the First Burmese War, the result of which was the annexation of Assam in 1826. It was placed under the lieutenant-governor of Bengal; in 1874 it was made a separate chief-commissionership, and in 1905 was with Eastern Bengal constituted a lieutenant-governorship. Assandun, THE BATTLE OF (1016), was the last of the battles between Edmund Ironside and Canute. Owing, it is said, to the treachery of Eadric, the English were defeated, and concluded with Canute the treaty of Olney. Assandun is probably to be identified with Ashington, near Rochford, in Essex.

Assassination Plot, THE (1696), was an attempt on the life of William III, first designed in 1695, but postponed by William's departure for Flanders. It grew up side by side with Berwick's plot for the invasion of England by a French army. It was entrusted by the court of St. Germans to Sir George Barclay. Ranke thinks that "all direct evidence" is against the complicity of Louis XIV and James II; though "both of them would have been very ready to pluck the fruit." Certainly Barclay was given a commission by James himself authorizing him to "do such acts of hostility against the Prince of Orange as should most conduce to the service of the king." Barclay landed in England in January 1696, and in conjunction with Charnock and Parkyns hatched the conspiracy. He was joined by a number of James's body-guard, whom he called his Janissaries. It remained to gain twenty more adherents, and but little care was taken in their selection. It was determined to attempt the life of the king on Turnham Green, on his way back to Kensington after hunting in Richmond Park, on February 15. But the hearts of some of the conspirators failed them, and information was conveyed to the Duke of Portland. William thereupon postponed his hunting. Still the conspirators imagined they were undetected; but they were speedily undeceived by the arrest of some of their number, and the issue of warrants against others. A joint address was voted by both Houses of Parliament, acknowledging the Divine goodness which had preserved the king to the people. [FENWICK; ASSOCIATION IN FAVOUR OF WILLIAM III.]

Assaye. [ASSYE.]

Assessment. The assessment of taxation first begins to be really important when direct taxation itself assumes importance with the Norman reigns. The Danegeld (q.v.) of the Anglo-Saxon period was assessed upon the hide. The levy was continued by the Norman kings, and the main purpose of the Domesday Inquest was to ascertain the value of the land for purposes of taxation. A township was rated in Domesday at such and such a number of hides, and paid its Danegeld or hidage accordingly. The towns arranged with the sheriff or the itinerant justices what sums they should pay. After the introduction of knight-service by the Conqueror a new unit of assessment appeared in the knight's fee, and periodical inquests were held to ascertain the liabilities of the military tenants in chief of the Crown. The first of these of which we have record was the great inquest of 1166, the returns to which (the "laite" of the barons) are preserved in the Red and Black Books of the Exchequer. Later compilations were the Book of Fees ("Testa de Nevill") and the various returns relating to the assessment of the feudal aids in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. But Domesday itself was a return sent in to royal commissioners by each hundred and township, a joint work of the royal and popular powers. When, after the Saladin tithe of 1188 (q.v.) upon movables as well as rents, taxation began to fall more and more on personal property, and to advance towards the subsidy of the fourteenth and succeeding centuries, then more than ever the assessment of a tax required the free co-operation of each locality. Only from a jury of neighbours could a due estimate be reached of a man's property. The assessment of taxation was committed to representatives in each district, and taxation itself was rapidly becoming a function for the united representatives of the whole nation. When this latter point is reached in the parliamentary system of Edward I, the matter of assessment loses its main constitutional importance, having already done its work. The knights of the shire, who in 1220, for instance, assess the average on their neighbours, in 1295, assembled in one body, grant the tax, and in the Good Parliament of 1376 demand the right to settle its appropriation. And indeed, as early as 1334, assessment becomes little more than mechanical when the rating of the fifteenth, made in that year and recorded in the exchequer, was thereafter taken as a standard. Henceforth the only question which remains to give trouble is concerned with the assessment of the clergy. When, from the date above given (1188), their "spiritualities," i.e., revenues from fees, etc., came under contribution, the assessment was carried out by the same method of juries of neighbours, until, in 1256, the Norwich taxation made by order of Pope Alexander IV, and in 1291 the valuation superseding it, which was made by order of Nicholas IV, and which covered both "temporalities" and "spiritualities," gave the clergy a permanent independent rate-book, which was acted on till the Reformation. But it left an opening for constant disputes in the next two centuries as to the mode and rate of assessment to be applied; first, to lands acquired by the Church since the valuation of 1291, and secondly as to the large class of chantry priests and private chaplains whom that valuation had left out of account. This clerical valuation and the lay assessment of Domesday, as well as the rating to subsidies of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, were probably far below the real value. Not only were exemptions wide and numerous, but the rating itself was evidently at a nominal valuation. The Domesday hide, for example, omitted unproductive ground; and the later subsidies did not fall on a knight's equipment or a peasant's implements. The lightness of the assessment must, in fact, be set against the burdensomeness of early taxation due to its uncertainty, its wasteful modes of collection, and its suicidally short-sighted principles. When the methods of assessment ceased in the fourteenth century to have a formative effect on the constitution, their chief importance passed. But here, too, the Tudor and Stuart kings, going back for precedents to an age before the national liberties were set on a firm constitutional basis, revived on several occasions more arbitrary methods, and disregarded the valuations which had been accepted for two centuries. Thus the commissioners under Wolsey's great scheme of taxation in 1522, and again in 1525, were to assess each man, clerk or lay, to the value of his chattels. In 1621 the assessors were to disregard old rates, and to rate every man according to their own knowledge, not even accepting his own declaration, and such was the precedent followed in the raising of ship-money. The whole practice, too, of benevolences and of forced loans levied according to official estimates of the individual's property, was an application of arbitrary assessment. Again, in the seventeenth century, with the establishment of the excise arose a question of some practical moment, how this was assessed. Similar points of social interest are connected with the injurious effects of certain taxes, assessed on a false principle, as the window-tax; or the introduction of the income tax, in which recourse has to be made to a rude method of joint assessment by the payer himself and by an official commissioner. But these methods are, as a matter of fact, guaranteed against unjustly operating, by the right of appeal to a higher body or a court of law.

[A. L. S.]

Assize (assisa, assisia) is a word of doubtful etymology; probably at least two words have converged to create the ideas underlying the various senses of the term; viz., (a) assido or assideo, to sit down—i.e., a session or a settlement, the notions perhaps common to most meanings of assize; (b) accido, to tax (cf. excise and assisus redditus). Besides these (c) there must be some connexion with the Anglo-Saxon asetniss, a law (cf. établissement de S. Louis); and (d) Ducange's editors can explain assisia only by reference to Arabic.

Meanings—(1) Session, and, specially, Judicial Session.—This meaning, which is found so early as in the Pipe Roll 2, Henry II, may possibly be the original one; cf. Watsius, "De Jure Vet. Munic. Norm.," i, 56; "assize est une assemblée de plusieurs sages hommes en laquelle ce qui y sera jugié doit avoir produrable fermeté." From this come the "Grandes" and "Petites Assises" of France, and the Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction, called "Cours d'Assises," in the Code Napoléon. The modern English use to denote the court of the justices on circuit is, perhaps by an accident, an example of this use of the word. A specialized case is the old use of assize for—

(2) The Select Body Engaged in Administering the Trial—e.g., Provisions of Oxford, in the "provisum est quod nullus miles non ponatur in juratis vel assisis"—i.e., all knights are liable to be jurymen. The words are clearly synonymous, though the old law books make a distinction. The "sworn men" are also the "men settled" to try a case.

(3) A Law or Ordinance—i.e., the "lex assisa," the settled edict of the king. In reality a law, the "Assize" in this sense professed to be rather an occasional enactment, valid during pleasure, an executive, not a legislative, act. Thus, the mediæval reverence for the "written law," which sprang from the solemn sense assigned to "lex" in the Bible and Roman Law, was respected, and real legislative changes produced by a legal fiction—cf. the Prætor's Edict, the Capitularies of the Carolingians, the Provisions of Henry III, the "Establishments" of St. Louis, all of which had the same object. Instances of such assizes are the "Assises de Jérusalem," a code for the Frank kingdom of Palestine, drawn up by Godfrey of Bouillon and his barons (1099), Henry II's Assizes, of Clarendon, Northampton, Woodstock, Arms, Essoins, etc. ("novas leges quas assisas vocavit"), for which see below; the Assizes of Antioch, Sicily, Rumania, and in Brittany the Assizes of Count Geoffrey in 1185, and the Assize of Count John (against the Jews) in 1239. Wherever Norman or Frank influence went, twelfth-century law assumed the form of assizes.

(4) State Regulations of the Price, Quality, etc., of various Commodities.—A sense kindred to previous paragraph. These were the "assise rerum venalium" of old English and French law. Richard I aimed—not very successfully—at uniform weights and measures (Assize of Measures in Hoveden, iv, 33). John "fecit generaliter acclamari ut legalis assisa panis inviolabiliter observaretur" (Matthew Paris, A.D. 1201). This points to pre-existing custom. There were also assizes of wine, ale, salt, boards, timber, wood, coal, butter, and cheese. These restrictions on trade and on adulteration were kept up quite late—e.g., there were three editions of the assize printed in 1528, 1530, and 1580. In 6 and 7 Wm. IV, acts regulating the assize of bread were formally repealed. They were carried into New England and long kept up there.

(5) A Mode of Trial prescribed by an Assize (in sense of law)—e.g., the Grand Assize of Henry II and the other "real actions," the assizes of Mort d'Ancestor, Novel Disseisin, and Darrein Presentment (see p. 80). Spelman calls them "brevia regia et litigandi formulæ." Assize here means (a) the law; (b) the rule instituted by it.

(6) The Trial itself—e.g., in the assize of Northampton the royal direction to the justices to try robbers (ut faciant assisam de latronibus); cf. "cum brevibus assisarum et placitorum" in royal writ of 1231.

(7) Assessment—i.e., the settlement of the incidence of a tax—e.g., "Dialogus De Scaccario," i, 8. "Fiunt per comitatus communes assisæ a justiciis errantibus—quæ ideo dicuntur communes quia cognita summa quæ de comitatu requiruntur," etc.

(8) A Tax—e.g., "Liber Niger Scaccarii," cap. "De Danegeldo," "ex constitutis duobus solidis summa una quæ communis assisa nuncupatur exrescit"; cf. "levare assisam," to levy a tax.

(9) Fines.—Fixed by courts of justice—e.g., in Brittany, "le seigneur peut demander pour son bétail l'essise ou le dedommage a san choix."

(10) Assisus Redditus.—The fixed rent which customary tenants paid to the lord of the manor, beyond which they were free. This is analogous to the preceding.

The various law glossaries, such as Spelman and the modern works based on him, collect the chief uses of assize; cf. Ducange's "Glossarium Mediæ et Infimæ Latinitatis," and the old law books, Britton, Bracton, etc.

[T. F. T.]

Assize, JUSTICES OF, were originally the persons commissioned to try the petty or possessory assizes. [ASSIZE (5).] At first a special commission of assize was issued on each individual application, but in the later thirteenth century general commissions began to be issued, and in 1272 an ordinance established regular circuits for the justices of assize. Simultaneously the powers of the justices began to be extended in various directions. The commissions of oyer and terminer, and jail delivery, of nisi prius, and of the peace, were added to those above mentioned. In the fourteenth century, therefore, the judges (who were now invariably laymen and professional lawyers) acted on circuit under five separate commissions, but they continued to be known as Justices of Assize, although, properly speaking, the trying of the petty assizes was only one of their functions. By 3 and 4 Wm. IV, the possessory assizes were abolished, so that the present commission is only fourfold, but the name has survived the fact, and the courts of the judges in circuit are still generally called the "assizes," and the town of their meeting the assize town. [JUSTICE.]

Assize, THE GRAND, was a form of inquest by sworn recognitors which was employed in suits to determine the ownership of a freehold. It was established by Henry II as an alternative to wager of battle, which, since the Conquest, had been the ordinary method of trying such cases. The date of its promulgation is uncertain. The year 1179 has been suggested; but recent opinion favours the view that the Grand Assize was of earlier origin than the petty or possessory assizes, and that it was instituted in or about 1160. The procedure was as follows. On the motion of the de facto tenant of the property the Curia Regis stopped proceedings in the local courts pending the inquest. On the application of the plaintiff four knights of the county were selected and summoned through the sheriff to Westminster. There they elected twelve lawful knights of the neighbourhood in which the lands were situate, who, in the presence of the king's justices, were to declare upon oath to which suitor the tenement belonged. If the jury knew the facts they had only to declare their verdict. If not, those ignorant were replaced by better-informed witnesses, until twelve were found who could agree. Their decision was final. The new procedure rapidly superseded the "duellum," which was not, however, finally abolished until 1819. In the meantime the Grand Assize had itself become obsolete; but it only disappeared, with the rest of the "real actions," as a result of the act of 3 and 4 William IV, c. 27. The latest case was that of Davies v. Lownes in 1835-8. The text of Henry's ordinance has not been preserved, but a detailed account of its operation is given by Glanvil, who extols its equity and its superiority to the old procedure.

Assize of Arms, THE, was an ordinance issued by Henry II in 1181. It revived and organized the old national militia, based on the obligation of all freemen to serve in the fyrd. By this assize all freemen were required to provide arms suited to their rank and means. A knight, or possessor of over sixteen marks yearly, provided a coat of mail, helmet, shield, and lance; the freeholder of ten marks, a hauberk, iron cap, and lance; and all burgesses and "tota communa liberorum hominum" a gambeson, iron cap, and lance. Doubtful cases were decided by a jury. Elaborate provisions were annexed for the enforcement of the law. Paralleled in most other European countries, this assize was renewed by Henry III's system of watch and ward, and by Edward I's Statute of Winchester (q.v.).

Stubbs, "Select Charters," ed. H. W. C. Davis, 1913.

Assize of Clarendon, THE (1166), Henry II's first great measure of judicial reform, is remarkable as formally instituting and giving legislative recognition to the employment of a jury in criminal trials, and as establishing a regular connexion between the central and the local tribunals. It represents the first effort of the Crown to constitute a great administrative system. The practice of sending royal commissioners through the country on the king's business was as old as the Norman Conquest. They had been employed by the Conqueror in the collection of the evidence from which Domesday Book was compiled, and by Henry I in the transaction of financial business. Under Stephen we hear of justices travelling over the country from time to time to hear the pleas of the Crown. It remained, however, for Henry II to regularize and stabilize the procedure. The Assize of Clarendon provided that a commission should be sent round to each shire, before whom, in conjunction with the sheriff, juries consisting of twelve men from every hundred and four from every township should present persons accused or suspected of robbery, theft, or murder, or of harbouring evil-doers. All such were to be arrested and brought before the nearest justice, there to submit to the ordeal by water. The adoption of presentment and ordeal had the effect of abolishing in the shire courts the practice of compurgation (q.v.). Other clauses of the Assize limited the power of the feudal courts by directing that all qualified persons should attend the County Court to serve on the juries of presentment, and that no franchise should debar the sheriff from the exercise of his duty in arresting criminals and enforcing the frankpledges. As a further check upon lawlessness, provision was made for the erection of jails in every shire and for the compilation by the sheriffs of lists of fugitive criminals. No unknown wayfarer was to stay more than one night in any borough; new-comers to a county had to find sureties for their appearance before the justices; and no religious house was henceforth to receive into its fraternity any man of humble origin, without inquiry into his antecedents.

Stubbs, "Select Charters," ed. H. W. C. Davis, 1913, 167-73.

Assize of Darrein Presentment, THE, was one of the petty or possessory assizes and was devised as a remedy in cases concerning the possession as distinct from the ownership of an advowson. When a dispute arose over the patronage of a vacant benefice, the right of presentation was held to belong—pending the settlement of the question of title—to the man in possession; and the purpose of the assize was to determine who was the possessor by deciding which of the claimants had presented when the last vacancy occurred. The verdict was given before the king's justices itinerant by a jury of twelve local men empanelled for the purpose by the sheriff. The procedure was instituted by Henry II, but the date of its institution is uncertain. It is alluded to in Glanvil. According to the Charter of 1215 (art. 18), the assize of Darrein Presentment was to be held along with the assizes of Mort d'Ancestor and Novel Disseisin four times a year in the counties, before two of the king's justices; but in the reissue of 1217 (art. 15) it was reserved to the justices of the bench. The process early became obsolete, since the writ "quare impedit" gave an easier means of prosecuting claims to advowson; but it was only abolished with the other "real actions" by the act of 3 and 4 William IV, c. 27.

Assize of Mort d'Ancestor, THE, was one of the petty or possessory assizes. If the heir to an estate were deprived by his lord or by a rival claimant of the tenement which had been in the possession of his predecessor at the time of the latter's decease, he could apply for a writ "de morte antecessoris." Clause IV of the Assize of Northampton (1176) refers to this procedure and perhaps marks its inauguration. Glanvil describes the process of the inquest. The sheriff empanelled a jury of twelve lawful men of the neighbourhood, and the suit was determined by their testimony. If their verdict went in favour of the heir, he took possession of the lands temporarily, leaving the question of ownership, as distinct from possession, to be determined—if challenged—by the more cumbrous machinery of the Grand Assize (q.v.). According to the Charter of 1215 inquests of mort d'ancestor were to be held by the justices in the shire four times a year; but the reissue of 1217 directed that they should be held only once. In 1285, by the second Statute of Westminster, it was enacted that they might be held three times a year, but not oftener. Any case which was found to involve questions of special difficulty might be reserved for the decision of the bench. The procedure became obsolete in post-medieval times, and was abolished by the act of 3 and 4 William IV.

Assize of Northampton, THE, (1176) was a reissue and expansion of the Assize of Clarendon, in the form of instructions to the committees of justices who were to visit the six circuits into which the country was now mapped out. It is marked by the increased severity of the punishments, the lessened trust reposed in the sheriff; and the gradual discrediting of the ordeal as a means of determining the guilt or innocence of the accused. A man presented by the jury for a minor offence was obliged, even if he acquitted himself by the ordeal, to find pledges for his future good behaviour; while, if he were accused of felony or murder, he was compelled to abjure the realm. Confessions of guilt made before the jury were not to be revoked before the justices. By this assize forgery and arson were added to the pleas of the Crown about which inquiry was to be made. The justices were given cognizance of all suits concerning the king down to the value of half a knight's fee "or less," except in cases of special difficulty or importance. The fifth article empowered them to try actions under the Assize of Novel Disseisin (q.v.), while the new procedure under the Assize of Mort d'Ancestor (q.v.), which was perhaps instituted by article 4, also came within their province. Administrative duties of many kinds fell to their lot. They were to make returns of all escheats, churches, and heiresses in the king's gift; to receive the oaths of fealty which, as a result of the rebellion of 1173, were required of all classes of the community, including even the villeins; to supervise the destruction of the castles which had been held against the king and inquire into the custody of the rest; and to register the names of all fugitives and outlaws. The assize was wider in its scope than any other of Henry's reign, and is of political as well as of constitutional interest.

Stubbs, "Select Charters," ed. H. W. C. Davis, 1913, 178-81.

Assize of Novel Disseisin, THE, was one of the petty or possessory assizes instituted by Henry II, and provided a summary remedy in cases of the unjust eviction of a tenant from his free tenement. Such cases had become frequent during the anarchy of Stephen's reign. The assize is called by Bracton "summaria cognitio absque magna juris solennitate," and by the Statute of Westminster II "festinum remedium." It is referred to in the fifth section of the Assize of Northampton (1176), but is mentioned in the Pipe Roll as early as 1166, and may have been promulgated at the Council of Clarendon in that year. The procedure was that on an allegation of unlawful dispossession a writ was issued to the sheriff to empanel a jury of twelve lawful men of the neighbourhood. These declared on oath before the king's justices in eyre whether there had been a disseisin or not. If they found that an eviction had occurred the complainant was at once reinstated, thereby securing the valued option of determining whether proof of ownership should be by the "duellum" or by the Grand Assize. The history of the Assize of Novel Disseisin is parallel to that of the assizes of Mort d'Ancestor and Darrein Presentment. It gradually fell out of use in the sixteenth century, and was abolished in 1833 by 3 and 4 William IV, c. 27. Analogous to it was the Assize of Fresh Force, so-called because the plaint was to be within sixty days of the injury. It was a writ that lay by custom of a town when a man was disseised within the borough. Similar also was the Assize of Nuisance.

Assize Utrum, THE, was originally devised to determine whether land was held by spiritual or by lay tenure. This was an important question in the twelfth century, since all cases concerning land held in frankalmoin were regarded as belonging to the courts christian. The ninth clause of the Constitutions of Clarendon, which provided that disputes between clerics and laymen as to whether a fief was held by ecclesiastical or by lay tenure should be settled by the recognition of twelve lawful men in the presence of the king's justices, perhaps introduced the procedure. In the course of the thirteenth century, however, the nature of the assize was completely transformed. The king's courts gradually obtained a jurisdiction over land held in frankalmoin as exclusive as that assumed by them over land held by any other free tenure, and the sphere of the Church courts was limited to consecrated land and buildings—the actual sites of churches and monasteries and their churchyards. In Bracton's day the ordinary tenant in frankalmoin had the ordinary freeholder's remedies possessory and proprietary; and was denied any others. To this rule, however, the rectors of parish churches afforded an exception. The land belonging to a parish church was regarded as a gift to the church and not to the rector and his successors. The rector was merely the guardian of the church; and though he might have a possessory remedy, he had no proprietary remedy. In the thirteenth century this want was supplied by the Assize Utrum (or Action Juris Utrum) which ceased to be a preliminary pre-judicial procedure deciding the competence of courts, and became an ordinary proprietary action in the king's court—"the parson's writ of right." It retained this character until 1571, when by the restraining act of 13 Elizabeth, c. 10, it was virtually extinguished.

Assize of Woodstock, or the Assize of the Forest, drawn up by Henry II in 1184; was the first code of any elaborateness for the government of the forests, which, from the time of the Conquest at least, were regarded as specially subject to the uncontrolled jurisdiction of the monarch. The forest jurisdiction is arranged on exactly the same lines as the county jurisdiction, just as the manor organization was based on that of the free township. The punishments are said to be milder than those in vogue under Henry I, but the whole assize is full of vexatious clauses, which must have been very irksome to dwellers in the forest. No one can possess a dog or a bow and arrows without a royal licence. Elaborate regulations have reference to the woods and clearings within the forest that belonged to private individuals. All men, from archbishop and earl down to the simple freeholder, are required to attend the forest courts on the summons of the master forester (this was repealed by Magna Carta). All persons over twelve years old dwelling within the forest are to swear to keep the peace of the forest. Hounds are to have their foreclaws cut off, and no tanners or bleachers of hides are to dwell therein, beyond the limits of a borough. [FORESTS.]

Assizes, THE BLACK. A name often given to the assizes at Oxford in 1577, when "a pestilent savour" rose either from the noisome smell of the prisoners, or the damp of the ground, owing to which all present were seized, within forty hours, of fever, and many died (some accounts say, with probable exaggeration, 300), including the chief baron, the sheriff, and a large number of the Oxfordshire gentry.

Assizes, THE BLOODY. A term often applied to the summer assizes of 1685, held in the Western Circuit after Monmouth's rebellion; when Chief Justice Jeffreys sentenced more than 300 rebels to death for treason after the barest mockery of a trial.

Associated Counties was the name given to the counties of Essex, Cambridge, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Hertford, to which were subsequently added Huntingdon and Lincoln. These counties formed an association in 1642 to keep the war out of their own districts and raise an army for the Parliament. The Association was first commanded by Lord Grey of Wark, and subsequently by the Earl of Manchester and Cromwell. Other counties formed similar associations, "but," says Carlyle, "the 'Eastern Association' is alone worth naming. All the other associations, no men of emphasis being in the midst of them, fell in a few months to pieces; only this of Cromwell's subsisted, enlarged itself, grew famous; and, indeed, kept its own borders clear of invasion during the whole course of the war."

O. H. Firth, "Cromwell," 1890.

Association in favour of William III, (1) (1688), was devised by Sir Edward Seymour after the prince had landed in England, in order to bind his supporters by some mutual obligation. It was signed first at Exeter and then in all the western counties. (2) The more famous association, that of 1696, was formed on the discovery of the Assassination Plot. The idea was proposed by Sir Rowland Gwyn, and eagerly adopted by Montagu. The members of the House of Commons, each for himself, solemnly recognized William as rightful and lawful king, and bound themselves to stand by him; and they vowed that, if his life should be shortened by violence, they would avenge his murder, and support the order of succession settled by the Bill of Rights. The measure was opposed by the Tories in the Lower House, headed by Musgrave, on the ground that the formula implied an abjuration, and that William could not be properly described as "rightful and lawful king." Leeds, in order to conciliate opposition in the Upper House, proposed the verbal alteration that it should be declared that William had a right by law to the British crown, and that no other person had any right whatever to that crown. This quibble satisfied nearly all the Tory peers. The country in general was seized with great enthusiasm. The municipal corporations all over the country appended their signatures to similar documents. Everywhere orange ribbons were worn, on which were written in letters of gold the words "National Association for King William."

Association Project (1582) was the name given to the proposal, emanating from France, for associating James VI and his mother, the Queen of Scots, together in the government of Scotland.

Association to Protect Queen Elizabeth, BOND OF, 1584, was an attempt to organize all English Protestants into "a universal vigilance committee" (Froude), to defend the queen against the plots of the papists. In November 1584 Burghley and Walsingham framed an instrument declaring that the signers of it bound themselves together on oath to withstand any attempt against the queen's person, and if any such attempt should be made and should be successful, to pursue to the death the person or persons who had been concerned in it. The association was primarily directed against Mary, Queen of Scots, and was meant to show her partisans that her own death would follow closely on the assassination of Elizabeth. The oath of association was taken with enthusiasm by the nobility, privy councillors, judges, the clergy, and all who held office under the Crown, and a large number of private persons throughout the country. Many of the Roman Catholic nobility and gentry were among those who signed the Bond.

Associations (Ireland) Bill (1825), 6 George IV, c. 4, was directed chiefly against the Catholic Associations. It forbade periodical sittings of political associations, the appointment of committees for more than fourteen days, the levying of money to redress grievances, the administering of oaths, the exclusion of men on account of their religion, and the affiliation of societies. It lasted for three years, but failed to crush O'Connell's agitation.

Assured Lords, THE, consisted chiefly of Scottish nobles taken prisoners at the battle of Solway Moss, November 25, 1542, who, from a long sojourn at the English court, had become to a certain extent identified with English interests. On their return to Scotland after the death of James V, they undertook to serve Henry VIII at the Scottish court, giving hostages to the English king for their fidelity. Henry, however, soon found that their good faith was doubtful, and in 1544 they openly joined the national party. The assured lords consisted of the Earls of Cassilis and Glencairn, Lords Fleming, Somerville, Maxwell, and Oliphant, taken at Solway Moss; together with the Earl of Angus and his brother, Sir George Douglas, who had long been refugees at the English court.

Assye, THE BATTLE OF (September 23, 1803), during the Mahratta War, was fought between an army of 7,000, commanded by General Wellesley, and the great army of Dowlat Rao Sindhia and the Raja of Berar; which, after the capture of Jalnapur on the 2nd, was retreating towards the Ajanta Pass, while the British, in two divisions, under Wellesley and Colonel Stevenson, were attempting to intercept them. The Mahrattas were strongly entrenched, with their left resting on Assye, when Wellesley came up with them, and, without waiting for Colonel Stevenson, resolved to attack them. Wellesley had given the most positive injunctions to the officer commanding the pickets to avoid the cannon planted in the village, but in spite of this he led his troops directly up to the muzzles of the guns, which poured an incessant shower upon the assailants. The indomitable courage and energy of the British troops, however, bore down all resistance, and Sindhia's infantry gave way. The British cavalry then charged, and forced them off the field. The victory was complete; but it was dearly gained by the loss of one-third of the army.

Astley, JACOB, LORD (d. 1651), had served in many foreign countries, and had distinguished himself in Germany under Gustavus Adolphus. He joined the army of Charles I, and, having taken part in the battles of Edgehill, Gloucester, and Newbury, was raised to the peerage. At the battle of Naseby Astley commanded the infantry, and in 1646 he made a last stand at Stow-on-the-Wold against the Parliament. Here he was defeated by Brereton and taken prisoner. He compounded for his estate, gave his parole not to serve any more against Parliament, and spent the rest of his life in retirement.

Aston, SIR ARTHUR (d. September 12, 1649), was a distinguished soldier who had acquired military experience abroad. He was governor of Oxford at the beginning of the Civil War, but was soon after disabled by an injury. At a later period he was governor of Reading. In 1649 Ormonde made him governor of Drogheda, hoping that he would be able to hold out till the rains. This he was unable to do, and on the taking of the place he was literally hacked to pieces by the Puritan soldiers.

Atheling (ÆTHELING) was a title of honour among the Anglo-Saxons, meaning one who is of noble (æthel) blood. In the earlier period the terms Eorlas and Æthel are used to designate the class spoken of by Bæda as nobiles, in all probability "the descendants of the primitive nobles of the first settlement, who, on the institution of royalty, sank one step in dignity from the ancient state of rude independence" (Stubbs). As the nobility of blood became superseded by the nobility of service, the title of Ætheling was gradually confined to the princes of the blood royal, and in the ninth and tenth centuries is used exclusively for the sons or brothers of the reigning king. Though he seems to have held no official position in right of his birth, the atheling was superior in dignity to all men but the king and the great functionaries of the Church, as shown by his "wer-gild." In the "north people's law" of the tenth century the gild of the atheling and the archbishop (and in this case of the "eorl" who corresponds no doubt to the Danish "jarl"), is 15,000 thrymsas, while that of the bishop or ealdorman is 8,000. So too in the laws of Athelstan of Wessex. The atheling attended the witenagemot as one of the magnates of the kingdom, and was one of those who were least frequently absent from it. The name was kept up after the Norman Conquest, and is applied not only to the descendants of Edmund Ironside, but also to princes of the Norman house, such as William, the son of Henry I and Matilda, and possibly to Henry himself.

Athelney (Aethelinga eigge), the Isle of Princes, is situated about seven miles from Taunton. Hither, in 878, Alfred the Great repaired after his defeat by the Danes, and here he remained concealed for nearly a year, when, sallying forth, he defeated the invaders and compelled them to make peace. At that time Athelney was a veritable island in the midst of fens and marshes, but it has since been drained and cultivated.

Biographies of Alfred the Great.

Athelstan (ÆTHELSTAN) (b. 895, s. 925, d. 939) was the son of Edward the Elder and grandson of Alfred. According to William of Malmesbury his mother, Ecgvyn, was of humble origin, and it has been suggested that he was illegitimate. This is, however, improbable. On the death of Edward, the Mercians and West Saxons chose Athelstan as their king, and he was crowned at Kingston-on-Thames. There appears to have been some opposition to his accession, but it was quickly suppressed, and Athelstan soon attained to a position of greater power and dignity than that of any of the preceding West-Saxon sovereigns. One of his sisters married Sihtric, the Danish King of Northumbria, and on his death Athelstan invaded the territories of his successor Guthfrith, repelled him, and annexed his realm. Subsequently he received the homage of Eugenius of Strathclyde, Constantine, King of Scots, and several of the Welsh princes, at Dacre on the Cumbrian border. His success was, however, premature. In 937 a formidable league was formed against the power of Wessex, between the Danes, Scots, and Britons. Constantine, King of Scots, Anlaf Guthfrithson, the Danish King of Dublin, and Anlaf Quaran his cousin, together with Eugenius of Strathclyde and other British chieftains, united their forces. A great battle was fought at Brunanburh (q.v.) on the Solway Firth, in which the league was at length completely defeated with terrible loss. Athelstan's subsequent years were peaceful and uneventful. He signalized his supremacy in Britain by styling himself "Rex totius Britannia" and "basileus," while, by his foreign alliances, he won for Wessex a position of importance in Western Europe. Of his sisters, Eadgifu married Charles the Simple of France; Eadhild, Hugh Count of Paris, father of Hugh Capet; Eadgyth, Otto the Great, Duke of the Saxons (afterwards Emperor); while a second Eadgifu was betrothed to Louis the blind ruler of Provence. Athelstan took a considerable share in the politics of northern France, and it was chiefly by his efforts that Louis d'Outremer, son of Eadgifu and Charles the Simple, was restored to his throne. Athelstan is greatly praised by the chroniclers, and he appears to have been a wise and vigorous ruler. Such of his laws as remain show that his wars and foreign policy were far from absorbing his whole attention. His ordinances were more particularly directed to the enforcement of that system of mutual assurance and association which held so great a place in Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence. One of the most important of his acts was that in which it was laid down that every landless man should have a lord; and the "Judicia Civitatis Lundoniæ," attributed to him, are highly valuable for the history of gilds and civic associations. The chief imputation on Athelstan's character is his alleged murder, by drowning, of his half-brother Edwin, but the story is not well authenticated.

Athenry, THE BATTLE OF (1316), was fought between Felim, King of Connaught, and the English, under William de Burgh and Richard de Bermingham. The losses of the O'Connors were appallingly heavy, and the hope of restoring a Gaelic kingdom was destroyed. The O'Connors were ostensibly fighting in the interest of Edward Bruce.

Atherton Moor, or ADWALTON, THE BATTLE OF (June 30, 1643), was a skirmish fought between the Royalists, under the Earl of Newcastle, and the Parliamentarians, under Fairfax. The latter were completely routed, and the capture of Bradford (from which Atherton Moor is some four miles distant) by the Royalists was the immediate result.

Athlone, GODERT DE GINKEL, EARL OF (1630-1703). [GINKEL.]

Athlone, THE CAPTURE OF (June 19-30, 1691), was Ginkel's first important success over the Irish followers of James II under the French general, St. Ruth. The town was surrounded by ramparts of earth, and lay partly in Leinster and partly in Connaught. The Shannon, which is the boundary of the two provinces, rushed through Athlone in a deep and rapid stream, and turned two large mills which rose on the arches of a stone bridge. Above the bridge, on the Connaught side, a castle towered to the height of seventy feet. Fifty or sixty yards below the bridge was a narrow ford. On June 20 Ginkel assaulted the English quarter and mastered it with trifling loss. On the 22nd he opened fire on the castle. On the 30th he resolved to try the ford. With Mackay, Talmash, Prince George of Darmstadt, and the Duke of Wurtemberg at their head, the soldiers dashed into the water. The Irish offered but feeble resistance, and the town was taken.

Atholl, ALAN DURWARD, EARL OF (d. 1268).

Atholl, JOHN STEWART, 23RD EARL OF (d. 1579). [STEWART.]

Atholl, THE EARLDOM OF, was, with Goury, one of the seven original mormaerships of Scotland. The style of "earl" seems first to have been borne by Madach, a son of Donald Bane, in the time of Alexander I. From his descendants the title passed by marriage to the Strathbogie family, one of whom, David, 11th Earl of Atholl, in the reign of Edward II, married the heiress of the great families of Comyn and Valence, and became possessed of vast estates in England. His Scots peerage was, however, forfeited in 1314 for his connexion with the Baliol party. These Scots estates were granted to Sir Neil Campbell, brother-in-law to Robert Bruce, whose son, Sir John Campbell, was created Earl of Atholl. He was killed at Halidon Hill in 1333, and left no issue, and the earldom was conferred on Sir William Douglas, from whom it passed to Robert Stuart, high steward of Scotland, and thus became vested in the royal family. In 1457(?) Sir John Stewart, of Balveny, was created Earl of Atholl. The peerage became extinct in 1626, but in 1629 was revived and granted to John Murray, Earl of Tullibardine, who was descended by his mother from the Stewart earls. In 1671 the earldom was raised to a marquise, and in 1703 John, the 2nd marquis, was created Duke of Atholl and Marquis of Tullibardine in the peerage of Scotland. His third son and successor claimed and established his right to the barony of Strange in the peerage of England. [STEWART.]

Attacotti, THE, seem to have been one of the Brythonic tribes inhabiting the region between the Walls of Hadrian and Antonine. They are said to have joined with the Picts, Scots, and Saxons in attacking Britain in the latter half of the fourth century.

Attainder. "Attainder imports that extinction of civil rights and capacities which took place whenever a person who had committed treason or felony received judgment of death or outlawry," whether such judgment were pronounced by a royal justice after trial and conviction, or were decreed by a legislative act of parliament, called a Bill of Attainder. In ancient law this involved (1) Corruption of Blood, and (2) Forfeiture, complete or partial.

(1) The blood of the attainted criminal was held to be corrupted and stained, and the virtue by which he could inherit, and transmit and even hold, property destroyed. Attainders operated, in fact, exactly like a sudden discovery of illegitimacy in the possessor of property; the stream of inheritance was at once cut off, and could be re-established only by a special grant of the legislature. From this it followed that the lands of the criminal reverted back or escheated to the lord of the fee, in subordination, however, to forfeiture to the Crown; and that any title of his descendants which had to be traced through him to a remoter ancestor was obstructed and barred. This was felt to be such a hardship that, in the creation of new felonies since the reign of Henry VIII, parliament has always provided that they shall not involve "corruption of blood." The statute 54 Geo. III, c. 145, still further limits its operation to treason and murder. The Inheritance Act, 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 106, gave further relief by enacting that the attainer of an intermediate ancestor should not obstruct the tracing of the descent through him if his death took place before the property devolved.

(2) Forfeiture for treason transferred to the Crown the entire property of the traitor. Unlike escheat, it was no feudal innovation, but dates back to Saxon times, and, indeed, has been the rule in the early legislation of most nations. So foreign to early society is any compunction against punishing the son for the father's crime that some ancient codes, not content with reducing a traitor's children to beggary, involve them in the same capital sentence; and the Golden Bull declares that the sons of a subject who kills an elector have their lives spared only by the imperial bounty. The two kinds of property recognized by English law, lands and chattels, were both forfeited absolutely to the Crown for treason, but the forfeiture of the former followed on judgment, and its operation went back to the moment at which the treason was committed, making void all alienations which had been effected in the interval; the forfeiture of the latter followed on conviction, and, from obvious motives of convenience, had no such retrospective force. The wife's dower was untouched by the husband's attainder till expressly included in the forfeiture by the merciless statute 5 and 6 Ed. VI, c. 11. In the case of counterfeiting coin, the statutes which made the offence treason limited the forfeiture to the life of the offender, and expressly guarded the wife's dower (5 Eliz., c. 11; 8 and 9 Will. III, c. 26; 15 Geo. II, c. 28). The celebrated statute of Queen Anne (7 Anne, c. 21) extended the same principle to all treasons by enacting that after the decease of the Pretender "no attainder for treason should extend to the disinheriting of any heirs, nor to the prejudice of the right or title of any person" other than the offender himself; but this humane provision was first delayed by 17 Geo. II, c. 39, and finally repealed by 40 Geo. III, c. 93. Forfeiture for felony was only partial, and seems to have arisen from an old right of the Crown to commit unlimited waste on the lands of a felon. So detrimental did this prove to the interests of the lord of the fief, and of the country at large, that in the reign of Henry I it was commuted for the right to the profits for a year and a day, a rule confirmed by Magna Carta. The statute 17 Ed. II confused the two, enacting that the king should have his year and a day and waste, and this remained the law till the act 54

Geo. III, c. 145, which limited forfeiture to cases of treason and murder. But attainder, along with its effects of corruption of blood and forfeiture, was finally swept away by the Felony Act, 33 and 34 Vict. c. 23 (1870).

Attainder, BILL OF, was a legislative act of the two Houses, introduced and passed exactly like any other bill, and requiring the royal assent, which declared a person or persons attainted. Originally aimed against offenders who fled from justice, and analogous to the Bill of Pains and Penalties, it was soon perverted to secure a more certain and speedy destruction of political opponents than could be hoped from the impartiality or the routine of the law courts. No restriction was possible in such a mode of procedure. Evidence was usually heard, but not invariably; and even the presence of the accused was decided by the lawyers whom Thomas Cromwell consulted on the subject to be unnecessary, on the ground that there can be no authority superior to statute. The first recorded instance of its employment is in the violent banishment of the Despensers in 1321 by the Parliament of Westminster; an act which was held by Trussel, the justice who delivered judgment on the younger Hugh, to have involved attainder. With the deposition of Edward II the appearance of the more regular method of impeachment attests a less savage spirit in political parties, till the outbreak of the Rose wars in 1459. In that year hostilities broke out on an attempt of the queen to have the Earl of Salisbury, the head of the Yorkist Nevilles, arrested. He completely defeated the force sent against him, and both sides rushed to arms. But the Lancastrians were better prepared; the Yorkist leaders had to fly the kingdom, and a parliament met at Coventry which attainted them in a body. Two years later, after the decisive victory of Towton, the Yorkists retaliated by a similar proscription of all the prominent Lancastrians, parliament, by the restriction of the franchise to 40s. freeholders (1430), and by the terrorism exercised through the system of Livery and Maintenance (q.v.), having become a mere tool in the hands of the dominant faction. Yet a petition, so late as 1432, praying that trials touching freehold or inheritance should not be held in parliament or council, shows that the Commons had still independence enough to display their sense of the danger. The new monarchy, which rose on the ruins of self-destroyed nobility, was strong enough to content itself as a rule with the ordinary methods of indictment and impeachment. But in 1539 the kinsmen of Reginald Pole, including his aged mother, the Countess of Salisbury, daughter of Edward IV, were cut off by Bill of Attainder, and the same fate overtook, in the following year, the disgraced minister Cromwell, condemned by a singular retribution without being heard in his own defence. Revenge in the one case, the preservation of the royal popularity in the other, demanded the employment of a procedure which could dispense with legal proof of guilt. The attainder of Strafford, however, in 1641 marks the triumph, not of a political faction, but of a constitutional theory. By the letter of the Statute of Treasons (1352), which condemned attempts on the king's life and honour only, the earl was innocent; but the parliament maintained that the spirit of the statute saw in the king the majesty of the state, and so, by implication, condemned all attempts to overthrow the existing constitution. The last instance in English history is that of Sir John Fenwick attainted and executed in 1697 for participation in the Assassination Plot.

Attainder, THE GREAT ACT OF (IRELAND), was introduced into the Irish parliament on January 25, 1689, and the debate on it lasted some time. James II gave his consent to it with great reluctance. It naturally had a very bad effect on the English Jacobites. Between 2,000 and 3,000 names, including half the Irish peerage, and even many prominent Jacobites, were included in the bill. All those who were in rebellion against the king (James II) were to surrender and take their trial before August 10, otherwise they were to be deemed guilty of high treason. All those who had left Ireland before November 5, 1688, were to appear for the same purpose before September 1, 1689. Those who had left Ireland before November 5, 1688, and were then in England, Scotland, or the Isle of Man, were allowed till October 1. In case of a valid excuse for not presenting themselves, the estates were to be placed temporarily in the hands of the king, but to be restored on the accused person's return. The king's pardon granted before November 1 was to be valid, otherwise to be of no avail. Macaulay asserts that care was taken to keep the list of attainted persons secret, but the evidence adduced seems inconclusive. The same author calls it an "act without parallel in the history of any civilized country." In excuse for the Irish we must look to the history of Ireland since 1641, and to the conduct of the British parliament at the same time.

Atterbury, FRANCIS (1662-1732), Bishop of Rochester, was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, and distinguished himself with his pen as a defender of the reformed religion against the attacks of James II. After the Revolution he took the oath of allegiance to the new government.

He took orders, and, after being preacher at the Rolls Chapel, became one of the royal chaplains (1702), but resided at Oxford. There he helped Boyle in his edition of the spurious "Epistles of Phalaris," and revised his "Answer to Bentley." He now wrote several pamphlets in support of the powers of the Lower House of Convocation. In 1704 he became doctor of divinity and Dean of Carlisle. In 1710, however, he seized the opportunity of the Sacheverell prosecution, and framed the speech which that divine pronounced at the bar of the House of Lords. [SACHEVERELL.] He became Dean of Christ Church, and subsequently (1713) Bishop of Rochester, "because he was so bad a dean." He espoused the Jacobite cause, and on the death of Anne implored the ministry to proclaim James III. Disliked by George I because of his refusal to sign the bishops' declaration of fidelity, he began, in 1717, to correspond directly with the Pretender; and in 1721 he took advantage of the confusion into which England had been thrown by the failure of the South Sea Scheme and the birth of the Young Pretender, to concoct a Jacobite conspiracy. He and his four associates endeavoured to enlist 5,000 men from abroad, with whose help they might seize the Bank of England. But the plot was betrayed by the regent of France (to whom they applied for support) and came to naught. Atterbury was imprisoned, and a Bill of Pains and Penalties being introduced, he was forced to leave England, professing his innocence. For a time he resided at Paris, and was chief adviser of the Pretender. He became "the phantom minister of a phantom court," and engaged in the schemes for a Highland rebellion (1723). Atterbury was of the type of the High Church clergy, most of whom were Jacobite at heart, and he "would have made an admirable bishop," says Lord Stanhope, "had he been a less good partisan." He was a clever, versatile, but somewhat fussy politician, always full of daring schemes and speculative adventures.

Atterbury's Plot (1721). [ATTERBURY, FRANCIS.]

Attorney-General, THE, is the chief law officer of England, who is appointed to represent the Crown in all matters affecting its interests. The meaning of the term is thus explained in the early text-book, "Les Termes de la Ley": "An attorney is one appointed by another man to do something in his stead, and is either general or special. Attorney-General is he that is appointed to all our affairs or suits, as the attorney-general of the king, attorney-general of the duke." In modern times the Prince of Wales is the only person besides the Crown who appoints an "attorney-general," who, however, is usually spoken of as "the attorney-general for the Duchy of Lancaster or Cornwall" (as the case may be). The attorney-general must be a party to all actions affecting the Crown; and, as representative of the Crown, he prosecutes for crimes, and also brings actions for revenue causes. Until comparatively recently, the income of the office was derived for the most part from patent fees. Now, however, it is fixed at £7,000 per annum, exclusive of fees for legal advice and services. The first record of the designation "Attornatus Regis" occurs in 1277. The second named is William de Giselham (A.D. 1278), who two years afterwards is called "king's serjeant." In A.D. 1315-16 three Attornati Regis are mentioned in the same year as king's serjeants. It was probably during the reign of Mary that the person who had been originally chosen to represent the king generally became a royal officer with that particular function. In 1614 a question was raised as to whether the attorney-general (Sir Francis Bacon) could legally sit in the House of Commons, "because by his office he is an assistant of the House of Lords." Bacon was allowed to retain his seat, but in 1620, 1625, and 1640, on the bestowal of the office on members of the House, they vacated their seats. On the appointment of North in 1673, he retained his seat, and his successors have continued to sit without hindrance. [SOLICITOR-GENERAL.]

Attwood, THOMAS (1783-1856), was a banker, of Birmingham, and Gracechurch Street, London, and first attracted public attention by his vigorous opposition to the orders in council of 1812. He condemned the return to cash payments after the war, and wrote some pamphlets advocating paper money in 1815 and 1816. He was an ardent advocate of parliamentary reform, and the chief founder in 1829 of the Birmingham Political Union. He was one of the first members for Birmingham after the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832.

Auchmuty, SIR SAMUEL (1756-1822), was present at most of the principal engagements in the earlier years of the American War. In 1778 he returned to England, but almost immediately left for India, where he remained for nineteen years. Returning in 1797, he was gazetted to a brevet-colonelcy, and in 1801 joined Baird's Indian force in Egypt, becoming adjutant-general. After the surrender of Alexandria in 1802 he returned to England, and four years later was sent to command a division of the troops in the Rio de la Plata, which he found in a dangerous position. By his skill and energy, he restored confidence to the army, and on February 3, 1807, carried Monte Video by storm. Auchmuty, on his return, was appointed to the command in chief at Madras, and in 1811 gave valuable assistance in the reduction of Java. Two years later he returned to England, and was appointed to command the forces in Ireland, which post he held till his death at Dublin in August 1822.

Audley, BARONS. [TOUCHET.]

Audley, THOMAS, BARON AUDLEY (1488-1544), was a lawyer, appointed in 1529, at the king's request, Speaker of the House of Commons. In the same year he became attorney for the Duchy of Lancaster, and, in November 1531, he was made king's serjeant. To enable him to second Henry's designs with a due amount of personal influence, he was, on May 20, 1532, put in possession of the great seal, which he continued to hold till shortly before his death. Audley profited largely by the ecclesiastical confiscations of Henry's reign. The priory of Christchurch, London, which was granted to Audley soon after his advancement to the chancellorship, was converted by him into a private mansion. But his chief spoil was the rich monastery of Walden, which he persuaded the king to grant him on his elevation to the peerage in November 1538, as Baron Audley of Walden. He presided at the trial of Fisher and More (1535), carried through parliament the act of dissolution of Henry's marriage with Anne of Cleves (1540), and passed judgment on Queen Catherine Howard (1542).

Augmentations, COURT OF. This court was instituted on the dissolution of the monasteries in Henry VIII's reign (1536), and was established to secure to the Crown the rich revenues belonging to suppressed religious houses. Its business was strictly limited to the consideration of questions connected with the confiscated Church property, and as this property was granted away with lavish liberality, the court speedily became a nullity and ceased to exist.

Augustine, St. (d. 604), first Archbishop of Canterbury, was prior of the monastery of St. Andrew in Rome, and was selected by Gregory the Great as head of the band of Benedictine monks who were to preach Christianity to the English. After a difficult journey the missionaries landed in Thanet in April 597, and obtained the protection of Ethelbert of Kent. Ethelbert had married, some years earlier, Bertha, the daughter of King Charibert of Paris. She had brought with her to England as her chaplain and almoner Liudhard, Bishop of Senlis (?), whose ministrations must have familiarized the Kentishmen with the idea of Christianity, although they did not effect their evangelization. Ethelbert, therefore, readily gave permission to Augustine and his monks to preach and convert his people. They made their head-quarters at Canterbury, where the Church of St. Martin, in which Liudhard had officiated, was assigned to them pending the erection of a more commodious building. A few months later Ethelbert became a Christian, and his example was speedily followed by his people, of whom 10,000 are said to have been baptized on Christmas Day, 597. Before the end of the year Augustine crossed to Gaul and was there consecrated bishop; and in 601 he received the pallium from the pope as metropolitan. In his lifetime Augustine was able to see almost the whole of Kent and Essex Christianized, and in 604 he established two new bishoprics at London and Rochester. Augustine's ministry was largely occupied by a contest with the British bishops. Their differences were nominally on questions of ritual and the date of the celebration of Easter, but the real point at issue was whether or not the Celtic bishops should acknowledge the supremacy of the archbishop of the English. Conferences with the Welsh bishops were held at Augustine's Oak (perhaps Aust on the Severn) about 603, but to no purpose; and the breach between the two Churches was only widened. Augustine was a man of somewhat narrow, pedantic, and unconciliatory character—tendencies which the monastic training of his early and middle life probably did much to confirm; but his firmness, his integrity of life, and his singleness of purpose are undoubted. His achievements might have been greater had he possessed a wider culture, a deeper insight, and a more powerful influence over men's minds. As it was he handed on the task of organizing and consolidating the infant Church in England to his great successor Theodore of Tarsus (q.v.).

Auldearn, THE BATTLE OF (May 9, 1645), was fought between the Covenanters and the Royalists under Montrose, during the latter's irregular campaign in the north-eastern Highlands. In May 1645 he found himself near Auldearn in Nairn, in presence of the Covenanters, led by Sir John Urry (or Hurry). A mistake made by one of the latter's officers led Montrose to make an attack. The Highlanders' rush carried all before it, and Urry's force was broken and scattered.

Aulus Plautius was the commander of the Roman forces which Claudius dispatched against Britain in the year 43. Among the distinguished officers who served under him were two future emperors, Vespasian and his son Titus. With their aid he defeated Caratacus, and reduced the south-eastern part of the island. In the year 47 he was recalled.

Auray, THE BATTLE OF (1364), was fought between the English, who were espousing the claims of Montfort to the dukedom of Brittany, and the French, who supported his rival, Charles of Blois. The English, who were commanded by Sir John Chandos, were completely victorious. Du Guesclin, the French commander, was taken prisoner, and Charles of Blois was slain.

Aurungzeb (1618–1707), Mogul Emperor of Hindustan, and a champion of the Moslem faith. He rose to undisputed power in 1658, as the result of a struggle between his three brothers on the illness of their father, the Emperor Shah Jahan. Aurungzeb allowed them to exhaust their strength, and then seized the throne for himself. His long reign sowed the seeds of final decay in the Mogul empire, being based too strictly on the principles of his religion. Abroad he was not very active, making few attempts to expand his empire after the failure of his expedition to Assam in 1663 and his defeat at the hands of the Marhattas (1672). His most notable conquests were Golconda and Bijapur. On his death the Mogul empire broke up.

Austin, JOHN (1790–1859), was the first systematic English writer upon the formal science of positive law. In 1826 he was appointed Professor of Jurisprudence in the newly founded University of London (now University College), where his lectures were attended by numerous men of future eminence. In 1832 Austin resigned his chair. In 1834 the Society of the Inner Temple engaged him to deliver another course of lectures upon the principles and history of law. As a jurist, Austin owes his rank to the fact that he was the first to define the sphere of legal science, by distinguishing law from history and ethics—thus destroying a confusion which has produced many practical legislative evils. His writings are unfinished, and their form is often uncouth and tedious; but the doctrines which he first enunciated are now the common property of every thinker.

Austin's works are "The Province of Jurisprudence Determined," 1832, and "Lectures on Jurisprudence," 5th edition, 1876. Australia, COMMONWEALTH OF, THE, consists of a federation of six original states (New South Wales, Victoria, South and Western Australia, Queensland, and Tasmania) formed in 1900, to which have been added the created territories of Northern Territory (created out of South Australia in 1911) and the Federal Capital Territory (surrendered by New South Wales in 1915), together with British New Guinea (or Papua), transferred in 1906, and Norfolk Island, transferred in 1914. The Commonwealth is also sole mandatory for the Territory of New Guinea (1920) and a mandatory associated with Great Britain and the Dominion of New Zealand for Nauru (1920), both German possessions.

Australia takes its name from "Terra Australis," the great south land of the old maps. That such a land existed was a belief dating from a Chaldean tradition of the fourth century and reinforced by a mediæval belief in the symmetry of the land masses, a great south land to balance the northern continents known to them. The name was indiscriminately applied also to Tierra del Fuego. It is not possible precisely to date its discovery, but by 1542 its existence was known to the western maritime powers. Portuguese, Spanish, and Dutch in turn partially surveyed the coast line, to the knowledge of which Pelsaert contributed in 1629, Tasman in 1642, Dampier in 1688, and which was completed by the voyages of Cook (1770-8) undertaken in rivalry to the French. "Australia" was applied to New South Wales in 1814 on the recommendation of Flinders. This is the first phase of Australian history and discovery. After this came the second, coastal settlements. In 1788 Port Jackson was founded by the "first fleet," under Captain Phillip, as a convict settlement which spread to Van Diemen's Land in 1803. In 1825 a military station was established at King George's Sound and two years later an English company settled on the Swan River. In 1835 settlers from Tasmania formed a settlement at Port Phillip, which was followed by a joint stock company to settle South Australia.

Meanwhile the third phase of inland exploration was progressing. In 1813 the Blue Mountains were crossed and three years later Oxley reached the River Lachlan. By 1836 Sturt had explored the Darling (1828), Murrumbidgee (1831), and Murray Rivers together with Mitchell, who had reached the great river junction in 1833. In 1844 Leichardt had reached Carpentaria, and Sturt (1845) the centre of the continent, while Eyre had traversed the length of the Bight in 1840. Then followed the transcontinental journeys of Burke and Wills (1860-1), who died from starvation after reaching tidal waters, and of Stuart, who in 1862 also traversed the continent from south to north and Landsborough from north to south. In 1873-5 the north-west was explored by Gosse, Warburton Forrest, and Giles.

The fourth phase of Australian history is the period of self-determination marked by the grant of responsible government to the separate colonies after the discovery of gold, and ultimately the creation of the Commonwealth of Australia in 1900.

NEW SOUTH WALES (Cap. Sydney. Pop. 2,300,081). Within fifteen years of the proclamation of British sovereignty (1788) the original character of the settlement had been profoundly modified by the introduction of freemen and merino sheep by Governor Phillip and John Macarthur. With the discovery of the pasture-lands beyond the Blue Mountains progress was rapid. In 1840 transportation ceased and was abolished in 1850. Gold was discovered in 1851, copper in 1869, tin in 1870, and silver in 1880. These discoveries meant a rush of immigrants, sudden prosperity, and an extension of government both in area and in personnel. The chief problem of government, however, was not minerals, but the land. In 1831 a minimum price was fixed for the auction of public land of five (raised in 1839 to twelve and in 1842 to twenty) shillings an acre. In 1846 the Squatters Act guaranteed tenure with an option of purchase by government tenants, but in 1861 a great step was made when Robertson introduced his scheme of purchase by residence conditional upon improvements and instalment repayments, a scheme which Victoria copied in 1862 and South Australia in 1869. From 1908 the state has aided emigration, while after the Great War large repatriation schemes were set on foot by the Commonwealth.

The constitutional history of New South Wales is typical of all the Australian colonies, for its constitution was their model, while at the same time it lies in the normal line of British imperial growth. From 1788 to 1823 it was a Crown colony under a military autocracy. The governor had complete legislative, administrative, and judicial powers until in 1814 a Supreme Court was created for some offences. In 1823 the New South Wales Judicial Act, consequent upon Bigge's report on colonial administration, set up a legislative council of 5-7, nominated by the governor, to advise the governor, who still initiated legislation, while in 1825 an executive council of 4 official members was added and the introduction of a civil jury for some causes. In 1828 the legislative council was increased (10-15) and could object to a governor's ordinance, while trial by jury had to be granted on petition. In 1839 this was made general. In 1842 semi-responsible government was initiated by the introduction of a partially elected legislative council consisting of 36 members, of whom 12 were nominated (6 of these being officials), which could initiate legislation and elect its own Speaker. The executive officers were still independent of the legislature. In 1850 the legislative council became bicameral, and responsible government was finally granted in 1855. An elected legislative assembly of 54 (rising to 141 in 1891 and reduced to 90 in 1901) to which the ministers were responsible, with a nominated legislative council consisting of 21 members, four-fifths of which were to be non-official, were set up. The ballot-box was introduced in 1858, and in 1874 the period of parliament was reduced from five to three years. Manhood single suffrage was granted in 1893 and votes to women in 1902, followed by the electoral novelties of a second ballot in 1912 and preferential voting in 1918. New South Wales excluded Chinese immigrants in 1838 and suffered from strikes in 1890-1, a bank crisis in 1893 which she shared with all the three eastern states, and drought in 1902. In 1912 the Million Club was formed to populate Sydney, and the year after the war county councils were set up in the state. New South Wales has always been the centre of the labour party in Australia and was the chief opposition to Federation.

VICTORIA (Cap. Melbourne. Pop. 1,684,017) was part of New South Wales until 1851. Explored by Bass and Flinders in 1798, a convict settlement at Port Phillip was made in 1803, but abandoned for Tasmania and the port neglected until it was rediscovered from New South Wales by Hume and Hovell in 1829. Two years later Western Port was occupied as a military post against French influence, but soon abandoned. In 1834 the squatting period begins when Henty started to colonize the district from Tasmania. Melbourne was founded in 1836, land having been bought from the natives by Batman and a military guard sent from New South Wales by Governor Bourke. In 1839 Latrobe was sent as superintendent from England, and 1840 saw the introduction of "exiles," but the settlers in 1849 objected and sent on these ticket-of-leave men to Sydney. In 1851 Victoria was created a separate colony, gold was discovered, and the population rose in seven years from 77 to 409 thousand. Municipal districts were created in 1854 and compulsory free education introduced in 1872. Victoria led the way in factory legislation (1873), but has been generally conservative and agricultural in outlook. Governed as part of New South Wales first by a military administration, then (1843) sending six representatives to the partially elected legislative council of New South Wales, it was granted a separate constitution in 1851 having a legislative council of 20 members (10 being nominated by the governor). In 1856 full responsible government was granted with a council of 30 (rising to 48 in 1902, but now reduced to 34) elected for six years, and an assembly of 60 (now 65) for five years. Manhood suffrage was granted in 1857, female suffrage in 1909, and preferential voting in 1911.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA (Cap. Adelaide. Pop. 551,633) was explored by Sturt and Barker in 1829 and 1831. Settlement was commenced by the South Australian Land Company, which was followed in 1833 by the South Australian Association to carry out land settlement on Wakefield's principles, with colonization commissioners controlling the land. The 1834 act was followed by the foundation of the South Australian Company and the influx of Lutheran exiles from Germany. In 1840 bankruptcy ensued, the commissioners were reorganized and an emigration board established. In 1842 it was put on the same basis as the other colonies. In the 'forties copper was discovered; Roke began religious grants and made over mining royalties to the Crown, while Young built roads and set up municipal governments. Victoria suffered from an exodus on the discovery of gold elsewhere. The land problem was dealt with by Torrens's Real Property Act of 1857 and Sutherland's Act of 1863, which reserved a third of the land fund to encourage immigration. In 1869 the Northern Territory came under the jurisdiction of the colony, and in 1870-2 the overland telegraph to Darwin was constructed.

Its early government was unusual. In 1842 it was made a Crown colony administered by a governor assisted by a nominated council of 7 (4 of whom were to be non-officials). In 1851 semi-self-government was inaugurated by the grant of a council of 24 partially elected, only 8 of the number being nominated. Full responsible government was granted in 1856, with a council of 18 sitting for twelve years, a third of which were to retire every fourth year. This was changed to six years, a half to retire every three years and the number raised to 20 in 1913. An assembly of 36 (rising to 52 in 1883—being reduced to 47 in 1902, and to 46 in 1913) was the Lower House to which ministers were responsible. In 1894 adult suffrage was granted. South Australia has been generally progressive, taking the initiative in woman franchise and council reform.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA (Cap. Perth. Pop. 332,732) began as a military post on the Swan River as an outpost against French colonizing threats. Her early convicts were withdrawn in 1831, only to be sent by request in 1850. The colonial office refused the first offer of a syndicate to settle the Swan River, but in 1828 came to terms with Thomas Peel, one of the syndicate, and Perth was founded in 1829. This was the only colony still receiving convicts in Australia until the system was abolished in 1868. Only male convicts, however, had been sent. In 1871 municipal institutions and state education were established and responsible government demanded in 1878 by Parker but refused. In 1885 Kalgoorlie gold was discovered and large water schemes initiated in 1898. Governed at first by a governor and executive council of four, in 1831 these five officials constituted the legislative council. In 1839 four non-official members were added. The 1850 act permitted a two-thirds elected legislative council, but nothing was done until 1870 because this would have involved a cessation of imperial grants. From 1867 to 1868 the legislative council of 6 official and 6 non-official members was nominated by the governor after election. From 1870 to 1889 the legislative council was composed of 12 elected and 6 nominated members. Responsible government was not granted until 1890. The council was nominated and the assembly of 33 (now increased to 50) was elected. In 1893 the council of 21 (now 30) was made elective. In 1899 women received the vote and in 1920 were made eligible to sit in parliament.

QUEENSLAND (Cap. Brisbane. Pop. 755,972), a land of scattered squatters, was made an electoral district of New South Wales in 1843, but created a separate colony in 1859 according to the permissive acts of 1842 and 1853, with a nominated council and an elected assembly on the New South Wales model, the 1853 act of New South Wales applying to the new colony. In 1867 a separate Constitution Act consolidated this. Members were paid in 1889, parliaments made triennial in 1890, and in 1921 the legislative council was abolished after failures to do so in 1915, 1916-17, and 1918. In 1910 single-member electorates, adult franchise, and a modified system of preferential voting were introduced.

Kanaka labour was procured from some of the South Sea Islands by somewhat dubious methods to work the sugar plantations, and this labour problem is the chief difficulty of the state. In 1883 Queensland urged the colonial office to annex New Guinea largely from fear of German influence there.

TASMANIA (Cap. Hobart Town. Pop. 216,757) was called Van Diemen's Land until 1853. Sighted by Tasman in 1642, it was not visited for a hundred and thirty years. After the visits of du Fresne (1772), Furneaux (1773), Cook (1777), and Bligh, it was surveyed by the French in 1792 (and 1802), but not recognized as an island until 1798, when Bass and Flinders discovered Bass Strait. In 1803 Governor King of New South Wales sent convicts to settle there under Bowen, fearing the French would occupy the island. These were reinforced by Collins in 1804, and by the transference of the Norfolk Island settlers in 1808. A period of lawlessness followed, when aboriginal bush-rangers and escaped convicts were a great danger. In 1833 Van Diemen's Land Company was founded, but in 1840 the influx of convicts suddenly rose to four thousand a year consequent upon the cessation of transportation to New South Wales. By 1853 67,655 convicts had been sent to Tasmania, but in that year the work of the Anti-Transportation League and the League and Solemn Engagement of the Australian Colonies succeeded in abolishing the system. An Immigration Act was passed in 1867, and the discovery of tin in 1871 and 1876, of gold in 1877, and of copper in 1883 led to the "boom and borrow" period, ending in the failure of the Van Diemen's bank in 1891. The aborigines were virtually extinct by 1842, though the last died in 1876.

From 1803 to 1825 Tasmania was governed from New South Wales by a lieutenant-governor. In 1825 it was separated and granted legislative and executive councils and a Supreme Court on the New South Wales model. In 1850 its legislative council became partially elective, and in 1856 full responsible government was granted with an elected legislative council of 18, three of which retire annually, and an assembly of 30, elected by adult suffrage. In 1897 Tasmania was the pioneer of proportional representation with the Hare-Clark system of voting. An interesting constitutional point was settled in 1924, when the colonial office approved as constitutional the governor's assent to an Appropriation Bill passed by the assembly ignoring the amendments by the legislative council. Tasmania is famous for its apple orchards and schemes of electrification.

NORTHERN TERRITORY (Pop. 3,597) was incorporated into the colony of New South Wales with the extension of its boundaries in 1827, but was annexed to the province of South Australia in 1868. With the adjacent islands it was transferred to the Commonwealth as an administered territory in 1911 according to the 1907 agreement. A resident administrator with supreme authority in internal affairs is appointed (from 1912) by the Commonwealth, and the territory elects a non-voting member to the House of Representatives. Legislative power rests with the governor-general, but the resident has wide powers of regulation.

FEDERAL CAPITAL TERRITORY, an area of 912 square miles, transferred by New South Wales to the Commonwealth in 1911. Canberra was proclaimed the seat of government of the Commonwealth in 1913, and the Parliament House ceremonially opened by the Duke of York in 1927. In 1915 land at Jervis Bay was acquired from New South Wales as a port for the capital.

NORFOLK ISLAND, discovered by Cook in 1774 to be uninhabited, was a branch of the penal settlement at Sydney from 1788 to 1808. Unoccupied from 1808 to 1825, it was then used as a station for colonially convicted criminals until 1855. In the next year the Pitcairn islanders were transferred to Norfolk Island, which was then placed under the governor of New South Wales, to which colony it was offered in 1885 and handed over in 1900. From 1855 a chief magistrate elected annually by the inhabitants exercised authority under the governor of New South Wales until 1896, since when he has been appointed by the governor. In 1914 it was taken over by the Commonwealth, and is now administered by the department of home and territories through an administrator and a chief magistrate.

Federation.—As early as 1846 and 1847, Governors Grey and Fitzroy contemplated a central authority in Australia for matters of common interest, while in 1849 a committee of the privy council recommended a uniform tariff, and Fitzroy was appointed as "Governor-General of all H.M.'s Australian Possessions." This nominal office, however, lapsed in 1861. In 1852 a committee of the legislative council of New South Wales, appointed to draw up a constitution for New South Wales, in its report mentioned the need of a general assembly for the Australian colonies for tariffs, intercommunications, appeals, regulation of gold mining, and legislation on some matters. Dr. Lang advocated federation (1852), and the Sydney Morning Herald urged the need of union in 1854, but the failure of Wentworth's Enabling Bill (1857) prevented the formation of a Federal Assembly. Duffy's select committee of the Victorian legislative council urged on the movement, but Cowper and Martin were opposed, and both South Australia and Queensland stood out. Some uniformity in legislation and administration was secured in practice by inter-colonial conferences between 1863 and 1880.

A Federal Council created in 1883 met eight times before 1899, but was merely deliberative and did not include New Zealand or New South Wales.

In 1889 Sir Henry Parker, who previously had opposed the council as not a sound step towards federation, took the initiative at a meeting of colonial premiers for the reading of Major-General Edward's Imperial Defence Report, and the Conference of Melbourne met with representatives from all seven colonies, followed by the first national convention at Sydney in 1891, which adopted Sir Samuel Griffith's draft bill. The collapse of the land boom hastened the movement, and an unofficial convention at Corowa was followed in the following year by a meeting of all the Australian premiers (now excluding New Zealand) at Hobart (1895), where Reid's proposals were accepted and enabling acts passed by all save Queensland to elect representatives to a Constitutional Convention. This met in 1897 at Adelaide, where a bill was drafted and adjourned to Sydney, where it was debated, and to Melbourne, where it was adopted in 1898. The bill was put to the referendum and adopted by Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania. New South Wales, upon whose decision Western Australia waited, had not a sufficient majority. Reid called a Premiers' Conference at Melbourne in 1899, in which Queensland now joined, the bill was altered, and when put to the referendum, carried in all the colonies. A delegation visited England at Chamberlain's request, and the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act (63 & 64 Vict., c. 12) was passed in 1900 by the Imperial Parliament. Modifications were made in 1906 and 1909.

Constitution.—The government is that of a Federal Commonwealth within the British Empire. Executive power emanates from the sovereign, is vested in the governor-general in council and is exercised by the prime minister and the Federal Executive Council and ministers.

The council consists of the ministers of state appointed to administer the various departments of state during his pleasure by the governor-general. These, however, are identical with the ministers chosen by the prime minister, the leader of the party holding the confidence of the Lower House. The legislature is bicameral; the Senate (36) consists of six members elected by the electors in each of the original states; the House of Representatives is about twice the size of the Senate and the state quotas are proportionate to population. The members have changed according to the census from 1900 to 1925, New South Wales, twenty-six to twenty-eight; Victoria, twenty-three to twenty; Queensland, nine to ten; while South Australia (seven), Tasmania (five), and Western Australia (five) remain constant. Northern Territory now elects one member. Members of both Houses receive £1,000 a year, and have similar election qualifications. The characteristic features of the constitution are a separate judiciary, cabinet government, and an executive with spheres of action defined by a written constitution, residuary powers remaining with the states, the legislation of which is only abrogated to the extent of its inconsistency with Commonwealth legislation. Where the Houses disagree and the Lower House passes a bill which has been rejected by the Senate, twice after a dissolution, the bill may be carried by a majority in a joint sitting of the two Houses. The constitution can be amended (except for the limits of the states and their equal representation in the Senate) by a referendum of the electors on an amendment passed by absolute majorities in both Houses or by a majority in one House a second time after an interval of three months. Only twice have amendments been made, in 1906 on details of senatorial elections, while in 1910 the Commonwealth was enabled to take on state debts. Unsuccessful referenda have been held as to Commonwealth finance (1910), increase of Commonwealth powers over trade and commerce, corporations, labour, combinations and monopolies relating to production (1911), state acquisition of monopolies (1910), and again in 1913 when railway nationalization was coupled with it.

Australian Colonies Act, THE, was passed by Lord John Russell's government in 1850. It created Victoria a distinct province from New South Wales, and conferred on the four colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, Van Diemen's Land, and South Australia the power of choosing their own constitution, "by means of popular assemblies composed of all the inhabitants who were £10 householders or £100 freeholders."

Austria, RELATIONS WITH. Before the sixteenth century, Austria was merely an imperial duchy, too remote and insignificant to have important dealings with England. Under the Bamberg line, the captivity of Richard I in consequence of his quarrel with Leopold V is the only important exception. Rudolf of Habsburg, who in 1278 granted Austria to his son Albert, was a good friend of Edward I, but friendship for actual Bavarian and Luxemburg emperors made England necessarily cool to Austrian aspirants to that dignity. With Frederick III (1439-93) and Maximilian I (1493-1519), the empire became practically hereditary in the Austrian house. The traditional friendship between England and the empire [EMPIRE, RELATIONS WITH] now necessarily involved closer relations with Austria. Maximilian I acquired, with the Burgundian Netherlands, the advantages of old commercial and political connexion between England and Flanders. Charles V united Spain, England's third mediæval ally, with the imperial crown. But it was rather with the Austrian house than Austria, with Spain rather than the distant "Erbländer," that England now becomes closely involved. On Charles's abdication, the Austro-Spanish House split up into two lines, but the solidarity between them was such that the intimate relations of alternate friendship and hostility between England and Spain practically determined her relations with Austria until the death of Charles II, the last Austrian King of Spain, in 1700. [SPAIN, RELATIONS WITH.] Up to that date it is only necessary to note any peculiarity of relation between England and Austria. For instance, when the Catholic reaction ended for a time the Anglo-Spanish alliance, the superior moderation of the imperial branch produced friendly relations between Elizabeth and the liberal and tolerant Maximilian II (1564-78). Again, in the Thirty Years' War, close relations with Ferdinand II (1619-37) resulted from James I's persistent efforts to obtain the restoration of the Pfalzgraf Frederick, his son-in-law, to his hereditary dominions. For some years he hoped to get this by Spanish mediation. But when he and his son Charles found they were being played with, they turned to that alliance with France which lasted with partial breaks till 1688, and much longer than the political balance demanded. Fear of Louis XIV led even Charles II to the TRIPLE ALLIANCE, which saved Austria Franche Comté; and again, in 1677, he began to incline to the imperial side. With William III the whole influence of England was thrown against France, and in the wars of the League of Augsburg (1688-97) and of the SPANISH SUCCESSION (1702-13) England fought in close alliance with Austria. The substitution of a Bourbon for a Habsburg monarch in Spain led to a closer union of interests between England and Austria than before. Yet there was a constant strain in their relations in the first half of the eighteenth century that led to absolute hostility in the second half. In the TREATY OF UTRECHT (1713) the Tories abandoned their Austrian ally. The accession of George I, the head of the house whose long attachment to the empire had been rewarded with a ninth electorate, made relations easier. But the commercial restrictions imposed on Flanders in the interests of the maritime powers, and the BARRIER TREATY, negotiated through British mediation, which handed over that country to Austria, with its fortresses garrisoned by Dutch Protestants, were warmly resented by Charles VI, who had not forgotten the failure of his Spanish hopes. Very unwillingly he made a defensive alliance in 1716, and when Alberoni's intrigues against the Utrecht settlement produced the Triple Alliance of 1717, it was only immediate fear of losing Italy that prevailed on him to make it a Quadruple Alliance, by joining with France and the maritime powers to uphold the treaty. In 1722 his Ostend India Company was established in direct contravention of the treaty, and in 1725 Ripperda negotiated the first Treaty of Vienna, which reunited Austria with Spain against Great Britain, even more than France. Charles secured a further triumph when Prussia deserted Britain [HANOVER, TREATY OF, 1726] for his alliance, and open war between Great Britain and Spain ensued. But in 1727 peace was patched up [PARIS, TREATY OF], and in 1731 the second Treaty of Vienna restored peace with Great Britain, and Charles renounced his commercial schemes for a guarantee of the Pragmatic Sanction. His subsequent misfortunes in the Polish and Turkish wars did not prevent Great Britain from loyally supporting Maria Theresa in the War of the AUSTRIAN SUCCESSION (1741-8). But British help was given in an overbearing and insolent spirit which destroyed all feelings of gratitude. Robinson, the British ambassador at Vienna, made himself most obnoxious, and Great Britain compelled the empress, much against her will, to surrender part of the Milanese to Sardinia (Treaty of Worms, 1743), and Silesia to Frederick II of Prussia, and the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) confirmed these cessions, and created a patrimony for Don Philip at the expense of Austria. This treaty, coming after thirty years of friction, produced a definite rupture. Count Wenzel Kaunitz became Maria's adviser, and negotiated that alliance between France and Austria which continued with partial breaks till the Revolution. Hence, in the SEVEN YEARS' WAR (1756-63) Austria did her best to ruin Prussia, Britain's constant ally. But George III, intent on the restoration of personal government, paid but slight attention to foreign politics. Meanwhile Austria approximated to the Eastern powers, and in 1772 shared in the first partition of Poland. Joseph II became completely fascinated by Catherine II's schemes of Eastern empire, and, his sister's marriage keeping up his friendship with France, he availed himself of Britain's difficulties with America to repudiate the Barrier Treaty (1781), and an attempt to reopen the Scheldt. At last the younger Pitt's vigour restored to Britain her true position in Europe by forming an alliance against the Eastern powers, which in 1790 compelled Leopold II (Joseph was just dead) to accept the Convention of Reichenbach and withdraw from the Turkish War. The French Revolution completed the rapprochement of Britain and Austria. A close alliance was cemented by heavy subsidies, and in 1793 Britain joined the war against France. The alliance continued till 1815, broken only when Napoleon forced a peace on Austria, and was renewed again at the earliest opportunity. The TREATY OF VIENNA was successfully negotiated (1815); and if Britain did not accede to the HOLY ALLIANCE, she did not purge herself of association with its authors until the great ministry of Canning. Since 1827 the two countries have pursued very different directions. While Austria, under the guidance of Metternich, was the representative of reaction and absolutism in Europe, the two powers could hardly be on other terms than those of distant courtesy. In 1848-9, when Italy and Hungary tried to realize their independence, British sympathy was largely enlisted on the side of the wronged nationalities; but the sympathy took no active shape, and Austria was allowed to subdue the Hungarians by the aid of Russian armies. The close alliance with Russia was, however, severed by the Crimean War, in which Austria took no part. The overthrow of Austria by Prussia in 1866—her consequent exclusion from German affairs, and the liberal institutions which she found herself compelled to set up—seemed to have removed nearly all possible grounds of difference. After 1867 the political intercourse between British statesmen and those of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy was confined chiefly to questions connected with the condition of the Balkan peninsula. [BERLIN TREATY.] [T. F. T.]

[1908 provided an anxious moment, when Austria-Hungary annexed Bosnia and Herzegovina, and King Edward VII met the Tsar Nicholas III at Reval (June) to discuss measures for the pacification of Macedonia.

The ambitions of the Habsburgs finally precipitated the Great War of 1914, the Serajevo murder offering an opportunity for Austria to destroy Serbia, who blocked her road to Salonika and Constantinople. The war resulted in the dissolution of the Dual Monarchy, Austria becoming a republic on November 12, 1918.]

Austrian Succession, THE WAR OF THE (1741-8), was caused by the death of Charles VI, Emperor of Germany, without male issue. There was thus thrown open the question of the succession to the empire, and to the Austrian dominions. The latter had previously been secured to Maria Theresa by the Pragmatic Sanction. The chief claimant to both was the Elector of Bavaria; the next important candidate was Philip V of Spain. As both these princes were allies of France, it was necessary for Great Britain to oppose their designs. Walpole, therefore, had tried to found a grand alliance between Hanover, Prussia, and the maritime powers with Austria; Frederick, however, would recognize the Pragmatic Sanction only if his claims to Silesia were acknowledged. This was refused by Austria, and immediately the French and Prussian armies crossed to the frontier (1741). Hanover was obliged to declare neutrality for a year. In 1742 Great Britain and Holland joined Austria, and an army of 30,000 was sent to the Low Countries. In the Mediterranean, Commodore Matthews, with the fleet, forced the King of Naples to neutrality, and allowed Sardinia to side with Austria. Frederick acquired Silesia by the treaties of Breslau and Berlin, and withdrew from the contest. The chief event of 1743 was the battle of Dettingen (q.v.), which, though nearly resulting in a disastrous defeat for the British, forced the French to retire into Alsace. Negotiations for peace were begun, George II being willing to recognize Charles of Bavaria as emperor if he would renounce his claims on Austria. They were, however, broken off, and the Treaty of Worms (q.v.), including Great Britain, Holland, Austria, Saxony, and Sardinia (September 1743), was met by the League of Frankfort, the important members of which were France and Prussia. Thus both Great Britain and France were now the respective heads of two great leagues, and the question at issue was really that of the naval supremacy of one or the other power, rather than the Austrian succession, the ostensible cause of the war. In 1744, after an attempted invasion of England in favour of the Pretender had been thwarted by the elements, a formal declaration of war was made. The general war, in which the British troops were not concerned, need not be discussed here. Frederick of Prussia was not well supported by the French; and in 1745, on the death of Charles of Bavaria, Francis, the son of Maria Theresa, was elected emperor. It was then possible to have made some general negotiation. The opportunity passed. Large subsidies were voted to German troops, and 18,000 Hanoverians were taken into British pay. In December 1745 Frederick made a separate peace with Austria, known as that of Dresden. Meanwhile the allies, under the Duke of Cumberland and the Prince of Waldeck, were disastrously beaten by the French at Fontenoy (May 1745), and had to retire to Brussels and Antwerp. They had been much weakened by the necessity of withdrawing troops to defend England against the invasion of the Young Pretender. [STUART, CHARLES EDWARD.] In 1746 Marshal Saxe became master of the Austrian Netherlands. Deserted, however, by the Prussians and Bavarians, the French began to make offers for peace. In 1747 the Duke of Cumberland and the Prince of Orange were defeated with great loss at Lawfeldt. Bergen-op-Zoom fell, and Maestricht was besieged. These disasters were counterbalanced by the Austrian successes in Italy, and by the capture of Cape Breton Island in America. At length the struggle was brought to a close by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (October 1748). The results of the war, as a whole, were not unfavourable to Britain. She had done much to secure her maritime supremacy, while her rival, France, had displayed a growing weakness and incapacity.

Aylesbury Election Case, THE

(1704) (or the case of Ashby v. White), produced a violent collision between the House of Commons and the Lords. The vote of a Burgess, Matthew Ashby, had been rejected by the returning officer, William White, mayor of Aylesbury. Ashby brought an action in the Court of Queen's Bench. There a majority of the judges, contrary to the opinion of Chief Justice Holt, decided against him on the ground that no harm had been done to him, and that decisions on the right to vote belonged to the Commons alone. Ashby's supporters thereupon brought the case by writ of error before the House of Lords. Here the judgment given at the Queen's Bench was reversed, and, by this important decision, franchises were placed under the common law. In spite of the wise advice of the Whig lawyers, William Cowper and Sir Joseph Jekyll, the Commons proceeded to pass resolutions to the effect that (1) neither the qualifications of any elector nor the right of any person elected was cognizable elsewhere than before the House of Commons; (2) that Ashby, having in contempt of the jurisdiction of the House prosecuted an action at common law against William White, was guilty of breach of privilege. The Lords passed contrary resolutions, and the quarrel became so serious that early in April Queen Anne put an end to the session. Ashby, however, sued out execution for the damages awarded him at the County Assizes against the returning officers who had refused to receive his vote. In addition, four other burgesses were put forward to sue the officers. The Commons promptly committed the plaintiffs and their attorney to Newgate. The prisoners, after two months, moved the Court of King's Bench for a habeas corpus; but these judges, contrary to the opinion of Holt, who was for the discharge of the prisoners, decided that the court had no jurisdiction in the matter. It was determined to bring this by writ of error before the Lords. The Commons foolishly voted an address to the queen praying her not to grant a writ of error. Her reply, that the matter required careful consideration, was looked on as equivalent to a refusal. The Lords thereupon passed some important resolutions: (1) That neither House of Parliament could arrogate to itself any new privilege; (2) that the Commons had assumed an unwarranted legislative power by attributing the force of law to their declaration; (3) that they had thereby subjected the rights of Englishmen to the arbitrary votes of the House of Commons; (4) that every Englishman who is imprisoned by any authority whatever has an undoubted right to his writ of habeas corpus; (5) that for the Commons to punish any person for assisting a prisoner to procure such a writ is a breach of the statutes provided for the liberty of the subject; (6) that a writ of error was not one of grace, but of right, and ought not to be denied to the subject when duly applied for. A fairly amicable conference between the two Houses produced no result, as neither side would give way. The queen, therefore, prorogued parliament (March 14), thus leaving a great constitutional question wholly undecided. Hallam thinks that "the House of Commons had an undoubted right of determining all disputed returns to the writ of election, and consequently of judging upon the right of every vote. But as the House could not pretend that it had given this right, or that it was not, like any other franchise, vested in the possessor by a legal title, no protest or analogy could be set up for denying that it might come, in an indirect manner at least, before a court of justice, and be judged by common principles of law." Aylesford, in Kent, is the traditional site of the battle between the Britons and the Saxons in 450 or 455 at which, according to Gildas, the Saxon leader Horsa was slain. Near by is Kit's Coity House, a cromlech said to have been erected to Catigern (without foundation), one of the British commanders, who was also slain in the battle.

reformers of Edward VI's reign. In 1577 he was made Bishop of London by Queen Elizabeth. In this capacity he distinguished himself by his zeal against the Puritans; and earned great unpopularity by his arbitrary and tyrannical behaviour. He published an Answer to Knox's celebrated "Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women"; but having offended the queen by preaching against dress, she requited him by vowing that, "If he held more discourse on such matters, she would fit him for heaven; but he should walk thither without a staff, and leave his mantle behind him."

Ayscue, SIR GEORGE (d. 1673 ?), entered the naval service at an early age, and was knighted by Charles I. In 1648, when the fleet revolted to Prince Rupert, Ayscue secured the Lion for the Parliament. He was appointed to the command of the fleet which had to watch the coasts of Ireland, and in 1651 to reduce the Scilly Islands. In 1652 he took Barbados for the parliament. He was engaged, in company with Blake, in the desperate naval battles against the Dutch in 1652. In 1664, on the renewal of war with the Dutch, he was made rear-admiral of the blue, and bore a principal share in the great victory obtained over Tromp and Ruyter on June 3. In the great four-days' battle of the following year Ayscue behaved with distinguished bravery; but his ship ran upon a sand-bank, and he was forced to surrender. The Dutch were so elated at the possession of this formidable antagonist, that they exhibited him in triumph in several of their towns. He was afterwards confined for some time in the castle of Løvestein. He was subsequently released, and allowed to return to England; but he took no further part in public affairs.

Azores, EXPEDITIONS TO THE, took place (1) in 1572, when Sir John Hawkins, with twenty ships, sailed to lie in wait for the Mexican gold fleet. (2) In July 1587, when Sir Francis Drake took the Spanish treasure-ship San Felipe, doing so much to damage the Spanish prestige, and to inspire the disheartened ministers of Elizabeth, that the expedition is said to have been "worth at the moment to Protestant England more than a general engagement fought and won." (3) In 1597, when a fleet was sent out under the Earl of Essex, Sir Walter Raleigh, and Lord Thomas Howard to capture the Spanish vessels returning from the Indies. Raleigh, having arrived first, took the island of Fayal without waiting for Essex, and a serious quarrel arose between the two admirals. Essex subsequently took Flores and Graciosa, but by his bad management allowed the Spanish treasure-ships to escape, taking three only. On the return of the expedition to England, Essex was severely blamed for its failure.

Babington's Conspiracy (1586)

originated with Ballard, a Jesuit, and "a young man of family and fortune" named Anthony Babington, of Dethick. Three elements may be traced in this conspiracy: the devoted adherents of the papacy; English Catholics whom zeal and harsh treatment had driven to desperation; and lastly, the paid agents of Walsingham. Babington—who, whilst a page at Sheffield, had been fascinated by the charms of the Queen of Scots—was easily persuaded by Ballard, after the latter's tour through England in 1585, to enter into a scheme by which Elizabeth was to be assassinated, and the country then raised for Mary. The conspirators, who numbered several gentlemen of position, chose six of their number to commit the crime—namely, Savage, Salisbury, Abington, Tilney, Barnewell, and Tichborne—and felt confident of success, ignorant of the fact that, through the elaborate system of espionage established by Burghley and Walsingham, agents of the government had actually been admitted to a share in the secret. Unfortunately for the Queen of Scots, Babington revealed the whole plot to her in a letter, which, like all his others, passed through Walsingham's hands; and her reply, encouraging the conspirators, and urging them to immediate action, ultimately sealed her fate. Proof sufficient having been obtained, Ballard was arrested August 4, 1586, and Babington, with four others, was captured ten days after in a barn at Harrow, whilst the papers of Mary Stuart were seized during her temporary absence from her room on a hunting party. On September 13 the conspirators were tried by a Special Commission at Westminster, and fourteen were executed at Tyburn on the 20th and 21st of the same month. The theory put forward by Lingard that Walsingham was at the root of the plot has been exploded by recent research among foreign archives. Walsingham's spy, Gilbert Gifford, "may have acted as agent provocateur to Babington and Ballard," but Walsingham could not have tampered with the letters of Philip II and Mendoza, which prove the existence of the Babington plot.

Bachelor, or KNIGHT BACHELOR (bachelarius, baccalaureus), was a simple knight, one who had received knighthood but had obtained no further honour, such as that of being made a banneret or a knight of the Bath. The word was also sometimes used to denote a squire, or armour-bearer, not of the degree of knight. "Bacheleria" is also occasionally used to designate apparently the whole gentry, or the whole body of military tenants below the degree of baron. Thus the "communitas bachelerix totius Angliæ" ("Annals. Burton," p. 471), in 1259, complains to Prince Edward of the conduct of the barons.

The derivation of the word is doubtful. It has been connected with Welsh, bach, young (cf. O. Fr. bacelle, bachelette), and more plausibly with bacca, i.e., vacca, a cow, and with baculus, a staff.

Bachelors, TAXES ON. By an Act of 6 and 7 Will. III, a tax was imposed on unmarried male persons above the age of twenty-five, varying in amount from £12 10s. to 1s., according to the taxpayer's status. It was repealed in 1706. In 1785 bachelors' servants were subjected to a higher tax than those of other persons. In Pitt's graduated income tax, in 1799, the rate was higher for bachelors than for married men.

Back Lane Parliament was the name given to an assembly of Catholic delegates from all Ireland, which met in Dublin in December 1792. They drew up a petition professing loyalty and demanding the franchise. The bishops signed it for the clergy, and the delegates for the laity. Five gentlemen, among whom were Byrne and Keogh, went over to present it. Dundas introduced them, and they were assured that their wishes would be considered.

Bacon, FRANCIS, VISCOUNT ST. ALBANS (1561–1626), often called (though of course incorrectly) LORD BACON, was the son of Sir Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper under Elizabeth. At twelve he was sent to Cambridge; at sixteen he became a member of Gray's Inn, and went to France in the retinue of the English ambassador, Sir Amyas Paulet. Here he stayed a couple of years, until he was recalled to England by the death of his father. Left with but scanty means, he now applied himself assiduously to the study of law, and began that long struggle for preferment in which was spent the greater part of his life. In 1584 he entered parliament, and in 1586 became a bench. But for some years after this he made no progress. Lord Burghley, to whom he naturally looked for assistance—for the treasurer had married the sister of Bacon's mother—distrusted him, and paid no attention to his frequent appeals; while the younger Cecil was probably jealous of his cousin's ability, and constantly threw obstacles in his way. In 1593, however, Bacon's friendship with Essex seemed about to open to him the path to distinction. The place of attorney-general became vacant, and Essex demanded it for him, but in vain; for the influence of the Cecils was victorious, and their nominee Coke was appointed. From this time dates that bitter rivalry between Bacon and the great master of the common law, which was ultimately to bring about the fall of both. Essex failed even to gain for his friend the solicitor's place, and attempted to console him by the gift of an estate worth some £1,800. Yet in spite of the many services Essex had rendered to him, Bacon took a prominent part on the side of the Crown in the prosecution of the earl for high treason, and was employed to write a pamphlet to justify the action of the government.

At James's accession, Bacon, with a crowd of others, was knighted. He was a prominent figure in the parliament of 1604, and, while acting as spokesman of the Commons, pleased the king by flattery, and by the skill with which he arranged compromises, especially in the matter of the Buckinghamshire election. On the question of the union of the two kingdoms Bacon heartily sympathized with the king; he was appointed to draw up the proposals to be laid before the commission, and as a member of it argued ably in support of James's project. In 1606 he married Alice Barnham, an alderman's daughter. In June 1607 he at last gained a foothold upon the ladder of promotion, and became solicitor-general. As such his work was chiefly of a routine character; in the Commons, however, he took a leading part in the discussions upon the Great Contract. After Salisbury's death, in 1612, Bacon was able to come into closer contact with the king, and henceforth his rapid rise was certain. In October 1613 he was made attorney-general; but though this office gave him a prominent place among the royal ministers, his work was but to carry out and defend royal decisions, and he had no influence upon the general policy of the government. He took part in the trials of Peacham and Somerset, defended the benevolence of 1614-15, and assisted in the humiliation of Chief Justice Coke in 1616. Having succeeded in gaining the favour of Buckingham, Bacon became lord keeper in March 1617, in January 1618 chancellor, in the July of the same year Baron Verulam, and in January 1621 Viscount St. Albans. He was still a mere agent of the government, and when he chanced unintentionally to offend Buckingham in the matter of the marriage of Coke's daughter, he had to make a degrading submission.

When parliament met in January 1621 there was no sign of any public hostility to the chancellor. The Commons were eager to join the king in a contest with Spain, but James refused to declare for a war policy; whereupon the Commons in disgust turned to the discussion of domestic grievances. Foremost amongst these were the monopolies. An attack began upon the referees, i.e., those law officers (including Bacon) and others who had certified to the legality of the monopolies; and Coke, now one of the leaders of the House, turned the assault especially upon the chancellor. Meantime a committee had been sitting to inquire into abuses in the courts of justice. Apparently to the surprise of the world, Bacon was in March accused of having received bribes; the Lords, after hearing witnesses, were convinced of his guilt; and, what is most strange of all, Bacon made no attempt to defend himself, but threw himself on the mercy of the Lords and the king. Yet it is the opinion of S. R. Gardiner, who has given a detailed account of the most important accusations brought against him, that "the charge that Bacon knowingly and corruptly sold or delayed justice falls entirely to the ground. The only possible explanation of his conduct is that, with his usual carelessness of forms, he contented himself with knowing that the immediate reception of the money, which he believed himself to have fairly earned, would not influence his decision; in other words, that without a corrupt motive he accepted money corruptly tendered" ("History of England," iv, 81). Bacon saw that the attack was due to political animosity, and that no defence would save him; by complete submission he might escape with a more lenient sentence. Moreover, though he was confident, and justly, of his own integrity, he could not fail to see how evil was the practice which he had allowed to continue: "I was the justest judge that was in England these fifty years. But it was the justest censure in parliament that was these two hundred years." He was sentenced to a heavy fine, to imprisonment during royal pleasure, to exclusion from parliament, office, and court. The fine was remitted and Bacon was released from the Tower after two or three days' imprisonment; but, though his advice was occasionally sought by the government, he never again obtained office, and spent the remaining years of his life entirely in literary work.

More important, perhaps, than the events of his life are the political theories which he consistently advocated. His ideal was a paternal monarchy. The king, aiming at the good of his people, able to employ the wisest counsellors, and possessed of wide information, must be better able to guide the nation aright than the unorganized body of well-meaning country gentlemen called the House of Commons, though he ought to use their help and explain his purposes to them. The work of government demanded an intellectual power such as trained statesmen alone possessed; the king, unmoved by the interests of any class, could provide for the welfare of all classes better than lawyers or squires. Yet facts proved too strong for Bacon, as they afterwards proved too strong for Stratford, who may be regarded as a Bacon in power. Bacon was employed as a useful tool; he was seldom seriously consulted on important matters. None of his great projects was carried out, and while he was holding up in many a carefully written state paper the picture of a patriot king, the country was being governed by Buckingham. Bacon's life was a dual one. His dominant interest was the increase of human knowledge by the new way which he could teach ("Advancement of Learning," 1605; "Novum Organum," 1620). There will always be a question as to the relation between Bacon's active and speculative life. Probably he wished for power chiefly because it would enable him to carry out his great plans for the social good.

The main sources of information about Bacon are his "Works," edited with most valuable introductions, etc., by Spedding, Heath and Ellis (7 vols., 1854-9). For Bacon in relation to the history of the time, Gardiner, "History of England," especially vol. iv, must be consulted. A very useful short biography was written by R. W. Church, 1888. Kuno Fischer, "Franz Bacon von Verulam und Seine Nachfolger," is an exhaustive statement of Bacon's philosophical position.

Bacon, Sir Nicholas (1509-79), was born at Chislehurst and educated for the law, obtaining in 1537 the office of solicitor to the Court of Augmentations. During the reign of Mary, Sir Nicholas, like many others, conformed to the Catholic religion, although he had been, under Edward VI, an active supporter of the Reformation. Having married a daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, he became Cecil's brother-in-law, and by the latter's recommendation obtained the post of lord keeper of the great seal on the accession of Elizabeth. He speedily won the confidence of the queen, and became famous for his decisions in equity. In 1561 he did his best to bring about an alliance with the Huguenot leaders in France, and subsequently strongly supported the marriage of the queen, whose favour he lost for a time in 1564, owing to his having participated in the publication of John Hales's book on the succession. The lord keeper was for this offence struck off the roll of privy councillors, at the instance of his enemy, the Earl of Leicester, and "strictly enjoined to meddle with no business whatever except that of the Court of Chancery." Shortly afterwards, however, he recovered his position at court. In 1568 he was one of the commissioners to inquire into the guilt of the Queen of Scots in the matter of the Darnley murder, and he superintended the trial of the Duke of Norfolk in 1572, although he took no active part in it. Lord Keeper Bacon had a great influence over his brother-in-law Cecil, and is said to have framed the acts aimed at the Queen of Scots and her supporters. He died February 20, 1579, having held his office for twenty years. His son says of him:—"He was a plain man, direct and constant, without all finesse and doubleness," whilst a contemporary described him as "a man of great diligence and ability in his place, whose goodness preserved his greatness from suspicion, envy, and hate."

Bacon, Roger (1214?-94), studied at Oxford and Paris, and became a Franciscan friar. His proficiency in natural science exposed him to censure on the part of his superiors. Accused of dealing in magic, he was prevented from lecturing at Oxford, and ordered to go to Paris, where he remained several years under surveillance. Clement IV, in 1266, interested himself in Bacon, induced him to publish his works, and procured his release and return to Oxford. In 1278 he incurred the censure of the Church, and is said to have remained in confinement this time for fourteen years. As a philosopher and man of science, Roger Bacon is a personage of the first importance in the history of mediæval thought.

Bacon's chief work is the "Opus Majus," an encyclopædic survey of existing knowledge, which has been compared with the great work of his later namesake. It was printed by Jebb, London, 1733. Some of Bacon's minor philosophical treatises were published in the Rolls Series, 1859. A number of his writings are still in manuscript.

Badajoz was the scene of the fiercest struggles in the Peninsular War. Originally in the hands of the Spaniards, it was surrendered, by the treachery of its commander, in March 1811 to the French; and on May 8 following the first British siege was begun. Owing to false information as to the movements of the French army, the siege was raised after a week; but, when the battles of Fuentes d'Onoro and Albuera had checked the armies of Masséna and Soult, Wellington began his preparations for the second siege. Circumstances, however, prevented him from taking as much time as he really required for the siege; in June it was again raised. But in the next year the two previous failures were avenged. The place was very strongly fortified. On the north it was washed by the Guadiana, with two outlying forts thrown across the river, one of which defended the only bridge. At the north-east corner of the town the Guadiana is joined by the Rivillas. On the south-east beyond the Rivillas an isolated hill was occupied by a strong fort, called the Picurina. Within the walls the town was defended by four chief fortresses. Wellington's works were begun on March 17, and on the night of March 25 the Picurina was assaulted and taken after a desperate conflict. On April 6 the assault was made under Picton and Major Wilson. The troops at the breaches displayed the most undaunted courage and resolution, but the terrible defences devised by Philippon, and the stern resistance of the defenders, baffled all their efforts. In two hours 2,000 men had fallen without result; and Wellington sent orders to the party to retire and re-form. The town was ultimately captured after an entry had been gained by Walker's party. This was the most bloody of all the struggles of the Peninsular War, and the British lost 5,000 men in killed and wounded.

Badby, John (d. 1410), was a tailor or blacksmith of Worcestershire, of Lollard opinions, and was executed under the statute De Hæretico Comburendo, for denying the Real Presence. The Prince of Wales, who was present at his execution, attempted to save him by inducing him to recant; but Badby remained firm, notwithstanding the entreaties and promises of the prince. He was the second of the Lollard martyrs.

Badges, ROYAL, are distinguished alike from crests and coats of arms. They were intended to be worn on helmets, banners, or caparisons, as well as on the breasts of soldiers, retainers, and attendants. William II's badge is said to have been an eagle gazing at the sun; that of Stephen was an ostrich plume. Henry II used the badge of his house, the planta genista, or broom plant, besides the carbuncle and a sword with an olive branch. Richard I had a variety of badges: a star issuing from between the horns of a crescent; a mailed arm holding a broken lance; and a sun on two anchors. John seems to have adopted the first of these as his special badge, and Henry III used the same device. The badge ascribed to Edward I is "a rose or, stalked proper," while Edward II, in token of his descent from the kings of Castile, used a castle. Edward III's badges were very numerous; amongst them were rays descending from a cloud, the stump of a tree, a falcon, an ostrich feather, and a sword erect. Richard II likewise had a variety of badges, such as the sun in its splendour, the sun behind a cloud, and a white hart. By Henry IV numerous badges and devices were employed, such as an eagle displayed, a fox's tail, a panther crowned, and a crescent. Henry V bore an antelope, a swan, and a beacon. Henry VI also used the antelope, as well as the feather. The Lancastrian party, however, adopted the red rose as their emblem, in opposition to the white rose of the Yorkists. Edward IV had numerous badges, such as a black bull, a white wolf, and a fetterlock; but the most famous badge of the house of York was the sun in its splendour, to which Shakespeare alludes at the beginning of Richard III. This king's peculiar badge was a falcon with a woman's face, holding a white rose. In memory of the finding of the crown in a hawthorn bush at Bosworth Field, Henry VII adopted a crowned hawthorn bush as his badge, besides which he used the red dragon of Wales and a white greyhound, which last was also used by Henry VIII. Edward VI bore the sun in splendour. The general badge of the house of Tudor was a rose, which Queen Mary frequently used, besides the pomegranate and a sheaf of arrows. Elizabeth also used the rose, as well as the falcon, and James I the rose and the thistle. Since this time royal badges have not been used, but the rose has come to be considered the emblem of England, the thistle of Scotland, the shamrock of Ireland, and the harp of Wales.

Badon, MOUNT (MONS BADONICUS), is the name of the place where the British are said to have defeated the Saxons at the beginning of the sixth century. Of the various dates suggested, 516 seems the most probable. The position of the place is unknown, but the battle was probably fought near the mouth of the Severn. Some authorities have identified Mount Badon with Bath. Nennius associates the name of Arthur (q.v.) with the British victory.

Bæda (BEDE) (672 (? or 3)—735) was born perhaps at Jarrow in the territory of the abbey of Wearmouth, founded by Benedict Biscop (q.v.). By this learned man Bæda was educated, and eventually he entered the monastery of Jarrow, an offshoot of the Wearmouth foundation. Here Bæda spent the remainder of his life, dividing all the time not engrossed by religious studies between learning and teaching. He was a very prolific author, as is sufficiently proved by the long list of his writings which he appended in his fifty-ninth year to his "Ecclesiastical History," and even on his death-bed he was busy with literary labour. His great work is the "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," on which his fame rests. It is divided into five books. The first twenty-two chapters of the first book form only an introduction, wherein, after a short description of Britain and its ancient inhabitants, we have the history of the country, reaching from Julius Cæsar to the introduction of Christianity among the Angles by Gregory's missionaries. From this point only (chap. 25) begins the independent research of Bæda. The Church history of the English is then carried down in this book to the death of Gregory the Great (604). The second book begins with a long obituary of this pope, so important for the English Church, and ends with the death of Edwin, King of Northumbria (633). The third book reaches to 635, and the fourth extends to the death of Cuthbert (687), the famous saint already twice celebrated by Bæda himself. The last book (to the year 731) concludes with a survey of the several sees, and of the general state of Britain in that year. Bæda's "History" is our main source of information for the century and a half that followed the conversion of the English to Christianity, and is therefore a work of much interest and importance, apart from its attractions of style. Besides the "Historia Ecclesiastica," which was translated into Anglo-Saxon, it is said, by King Alfred, Bæda wrote a very large number of minor works, among which are a "Life of St. Cuthbert," a "Chronicon," or general summary of history up to the year 729; "The Lives of the Abbots of Wearmouth and of Jarrow," and "An Epistle to Egbert, Archbishop of York," which gives an interesting account of the state of the Church. All are of considerable historical importance, though they yield in interest to the Ecclesiastical History. The greater number of Bæda's compositions—said to have amounted to nearly 150—were probably theological treatises or commentaries on the Scriptures.

The works of Bæda are published in Migne's "Patrologia," vols. 90-5; and the historical works were edited by Stevenson (English Historical Society) in 1841 (2 vols.). The "Historia Eccles. Anglor." is published by the Clarendon Press (ed. Plummer). See also G. F. Browne, "The Venerable Bede," 1919; Howorth, "Golden Days of the English Church," 1917.

Bahamas, THE (or LUCAYCOS), is a coral archipelago to the north-east of Cuba, centring politically round New Providence, where is the only safe harbour. San Salvador was Columbus's landfall in 1492; Eleuthera (1646) and New Providence (1666) were colonized from the Bermudas by the English, after most of the gentle, superstitious natives had been deported by the Spaniards to work their mines. Granted in 1670 to six of the Carolina proprietors, New Providence was laid waste by the Spaniards ten years later and the colony annihilated by a combined French and Spanish attack in 1703. A centre for buccaneers, among whom was "Black Beard," it was cleared by Rogers in 1718. Captured by the revolted American colonists in 1776 and in 1781, having been abandoned by a Spanish force, the islands were recaptured and ceded to Britain in 1783, and subsequently colonized by a number of Loyalist emigrants who introduced the cultivation of cotton. In 1834 emancipation did not ruin the islands, which enjoyed in 1861 a blockade-running trade. A small governing council had been granted in 1718 and a constitution agreed to in 1806. The government is vested in a governor assisted by an executive council of nine, some of whose unofficial members are drawn from the nominated legislative council of nine. The legislature is completed by the House of Assembly (twenty-nine) elected on a white-man suffrage over eleven of the islands. Turks and Caicos Islands (q.v.), represented in the Assembly for 1799, were separated in 1848.

Bahrein Islands, a group of islands in the Persian Gulf, the largest of which gives the name to the group which now includes Muharrak, Sitra, Nabi Saleh, Jezeira. A native sheikh of the family of Al Khalifa rules over about 100,000 Persians and Arabs, under British protection, a political agent residing at Bahrein under the direction of the political resident in the Persian Gulf. A large pearl fishery supplements the indigenous dates and a peculiar breed of white donkeys. Many square miles of conical tombs of unknown origin add interest to the group.

Bai, in Hindustani, signifies "lady," and was affixed to the names of all Mahratta ladies of distinction—e.g., Tara Bai, the wife of the first Holkar; Tulsi Bai, the celebrated concubine of Jaswant Rao Holkar, etc.

Bail (Fr. bailler, to hand over, deliver) is used in English common law to denote the freeing of accused persons from imprisonment, on security being accepted that they will appear to stand their trial. Mainprize has much the same meaning as bail, and the two terms are used almost promiscuously in the old law books. By 7 Geo. IV, c. 64, justices of the peace were allowed to release persons charged with felony if the evidence were not such as to raise a strong presumption of their guilt; but it is unusual to grant bail in cases of murder. In cases of treason only the secretary of state for home affairs or a judge of the King's Bench can admit to bail. Where small misdemeanours are concerned bail cannot be refused. The modern practice is regulated by the act 15 and 16 Vict., c. 76. Bail may in theory be given either in civil or criminal cases, but since the abolition by the Debtors Act of 1869 of arrest on mesne process bail in civil cases is virtually extinct.

Bailiff (a word cognate with Fr. bailli, from Old Fr. bailler, to carry or govern, and Low Lat. ballivus, or balivus, a governor) is a person who is entrusted with power of superintendence by a superior (cf. baillie in Scotland, bailey in the Channel Islands). The term was in common use among the Normans in France and Sicily, and after the Conquest it was applied to many officials in England: thus the sheriff was the king's chief official in the county which was his bailiwick. Gradually the word became attached to definite offices: (1) the bailiff errant, (2) the bailiff of a riding or lathe, (3) of a hundred, (4) of a town, (5) of a liberty, (6) of a manor, and (7) the under bailiffs of any of these. (1)-(3) were royal officials, who might or might not have charge of manors or land in the form of royal demesne, escheats, or forfeitures: (4)-(6) were seigneurial officials, of whom (4) and (5) might perform functions almost identical with those of (2) and (3), because their lords had been granted a liberty, franchise, or hundred in private hands. Thus though the bailiffs' spheres of activity varied, on the whole they had similar functions. (a) The bailiff supervised the agricultural work on the lord's estate, whether it was royal demesne, a hundredal manor, an ordinary manor, or a town. (b) He presided at the court or courts in his bailiwick, which might include riding, hundred, town, liberty, or manor court, and possibly court leet, court baron, or view of frankpledge, but the sheriff held the tourn which took place twice a year in the hundred court. (c) He was responsible for the collection of money and other debts, whether he paid them into manorial, baronial, or royal exchequers. His under officials who did the actual work were the beadles or catchpoles. In the case of (1)–(3), the bailiff executed the king's writs and summonses (for debts) which were passed to him by the sheriff, and he had powers of distraint and arrest: in that of (4) and (5) he only carried out these functions if the town or his lord had the special franchise of returning the king's writs and collecting his debts within the liberty. The bailiff of a manor or liberty, not having this franchise, collected his lord's debts, but not the king's. If the lord who had return of writs, or his bailiff, neglected their duties, then the sheriff received a writ non omittas from the exchequer which authorized him to enter the liberty and carry out the king's orders. (d) Certain duties connected with the peace and judicial system also devolved on the bailiff: they varied at different dates and in accordance with the nature of the office held. The bailiff errant had to go about the county in general to execute writs, to summon the county, sessions, assizes, and undertake a number of unassigned tasks. With the decay of feudalism, bailiffs became less important, but survive in modern times. Other survivals outside the corporate towns are the bailiff of the lord of the manor, or landholder, and the farm bailiff on the one hand; the bailiff who distrains for debt on the other.

Under the Normans the bailiff was the presiding magistrate of a town, who assumed the functions of the English reeve (q.v.), called in mercantile towns port-reeve, whose Latin title prepositus was applied to him. The burgesses of Colchester could elect bailiffs in the reign of Richard I, and under Henry III, when the right of choosing their mayor was taken away from the Londoners, they were allowed to elect bailiffs instead. This official's duties were to preserve the king's peace, and to preside over the chief court of the town. Thus in Leicester the bailiff was the constituting officer of the portmannote until the middle of the thirteenth century, and in Beverley the archbishop's bailiffs held the court in his name until the reign of Henry VIII. By the end of the thirteenth century, however, the mayor had supplanted the bailiff nearly everywhere; the summonses of borough members to a national council are addressed to the mayors of the towns more frequently than to the bailiffs, and in cases where both are mentioned the mayor is placed first. Nevertheless, the idea of the bailiff being a great town official still lingered on, and the inquiries of the Corporation Commissioners in 1835 showed that there were 120 officers of this nature in the corporate towns. [REEVE.]

position than those of the towns. Before the Conquest the presiding officer of the Courts of the Liberties, which were jurisdictions exempt from that of the hundred, and of lands held in sac and soc, which corresponded to a certain extent to the Norman manor-system, was the reeve, whose subordinate was the bydel, or beadle. The bailiffs of the liberty or honour and of the manor represented their lords in the court-baron, or ancient assembly, of the township where by-laws were made, in the court customary, where the business of villanage was transacted, and in the court leet, which had criminal jurisdiction; in the great baronial honours, whose system corresponded fairly closely to that of the shire, the bailiff attended the sheriff's tourn or court for the view of frankpledge. During the reigns of the Edwards, and subsequently, the power of these bailiffs was narrowly watched; they were to be sworn to make distress, and punished for malicious distress by fine and treble damage; to truly impanel jurors, and to make returns by indenture between them and the sheriffs. They could not arrest without order of the sheriff. The exclusive jurisdictions of the liberties still exist in some parts of England, and in 1844 the power of the bailiffs was regulated by placing their appointment in the hands of the judge of the courts, i.e., the county-clerk or under-sheriff before whom they are held, and subjecting them to severe penalties for misdemeanour. With the decay of feudalism the bailiff of the manor became an unimportant functionary who looked after his lord's interests in the matter of collecting rents, surveying improvements, etc.

The riding or hundred bailiff presided, after the Conquest, in the smaller court of the hundred, the chief business of which was to settle disputes about small debts. He represented the king's interest, and was probably the same as the gerefa, or reeve of the hundred, of the laws of Edward the Elder and Ethelred. He was supposed to execute all process directed to the sheriff, to collect the king's fines and fee-farm rents, and to attend the judges of assize and jail-delivery. From Bracton we learn that another of his duties was to select four knights of the hundred, who were in turn to choose the jury of inquisition. If the jurisdiction of the hundred fell into the hands of great landowners, the bailiff was appointed by the lord, and presided in the manorial courts as well as the hundred court (see under (d) above). The hundred bailiffs are sometimes called the sheriff's bailiffs and were bound, in an obligation to him, for the due execution of their offices, whence they were called bound bailiffs (vulgarly corrupted into bum bailiffs). Special bailiffs may also be nominated at the request of the suitor in a case, and approved by the sheriff, for a particular occasion. Their persons were protected, and severe penalties laid on them for misdemeanour by the Inferior Courts Act (1844). [M. H. M.]

Bailiwick signifies either a county in which the sheriff as bailiff of the king exercises jurisdiction, or the liberty of franchise of some lord, "who has an exclusive authority within its limits to act as the sheriff does in the county." [BAILIFF.]

Baillie, ROBERT (1599-1662), minister of Kilwinning, was one of the leaders of the Covenanters, and a voluminous writer. He was one of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, and in March 1649 was one of the commissioners sent to Charles II at The Hague.

Baird, SIR DAVID (1757-1829), served in India against Hyder Ali in 1780, and fell captive to that potentate till 1784. He was present at the siege of Pondicherry, 1793, and of Seringapatam, 1799. In 1800 he took command in Egypt, acting in conjunction with Abercromby, and in 1806 he reduced the Cape of Good Hope. He was wounded at Copenhagen in 1807, was sent to reinforce Sir John Moore, and fought in the retreat on Corunna.

Baji Rao, the son of Ragoba, became heir to the office of Peshwa in 1796, and in 1801, through fear of Holkar, concluded the Treaty of Bassein (q.v.) with Great Britain. His subsequent repudiation of the treaty and his efforts to regain power—notably in 1806, 1815, 1817—involved him in perpetual hostility to the British governor-general. He was finally defeated and pensioned in 1818. He died in 1853, leaving an adopted son, Nana Sahib.

Balaclava, THE BATTLE OF (October 25, 1854), during the Crimean War, was brought on by the Russian general, Prince Menshikov, who moved a body of men on Balaclava, hoping to get possession of the harbour, and to cut the allies off from their supplies. The Russians first attacked the redoubts in the valley of Kadikoi, defended by the Turks, who fled almost immediately. The Russian cavalry then advanced towards Balaclava, but were checked by Sir Colin Campbell's Highland Brigade, and by the Heavy Brigade of cavalry. The charge of the Heavy Brigade was a peculiarly brilliant piece of cavalry fighting. The Russians, though more than twice as numerous as their opponents, were driven back in confusion. The main body of the British and French now came into action, and the fighting about the captured redoubts began to thicken. Lord Raglan, thinking the enemy were retiring with the guns from one of the redoubts, sent orders to Lord Lucan, in command of the cavalry, to follow and harass their retreat. But by the time the Light Brigade was prepared to carry out the order the broken Russian cavalry had re-formed, and the main body of Liprandi's corps d'armée had advanced and formed at the bottom of the valley. Notwithstanding, Lord Lucan insisted that the charge should be carried out. Accordingly, the Light Brigade (consisting of the 5th and 11th Hussars and the 17th Lancers), in all 607 men, commanded by Lord Cardigan, rode down upon the whole Russian army. They broke their way right through the enemy's lines, and struggled back again through the valley, in which the Russian guns played on them from front, flank, and rear as they rode, with the loss of all but 198. Except for some desultory cannonading, this ended the battle. The Russians had not effected their object, but they kept possession of the ground they had won in the valley, so that the victory may be said to have been indecisive.

Balance of Power may be defined as the existence of such a connexion and such relations of power among a majority of neighbouring states, that no one of them can endanger the independence or the rights of any other state without effectual resistance, and without danger to itself. The term seems to have come into existence at the beginning of the sixteenth century. The Duc de Rohan's work, "Trutina Statuum Europæ" was published in 1645. The first attempt towards establishing a balance of power in Europe was probably that of Henry IV and Sully, which dates from 1603. Their idea was to create a confederation in Europe under the title of the "République très chrétienne." It was to contain fifteen states: five elective monarchies—the pope, the emperor (the ancient freedom of election being restored, with a provision that no two successive emperors were to be chosen from the same house), the kings of Poland, Hungary, and Bohemia; six hereditary monarchies—those of France, Spain, England, Denmark, Sweden, and Lombardy, the last a new kingdom created for the Duke of Savoy; four republics—Holland, Venice, a republic containing Genoa, Florence, and Central Italy, and Switzerland, which was to be considerably enlarged. Each of these states was to have its limits so well defined that it could not exceed them without being attacked by all the rest. There was to be liberty of conscience—Roman Catholics, Lutherans, and Calvinists were to be on an equality; there was to be a general federal council, to keep peace at home, and to make war upon the infidel. (See Sully, "Economies Royales" in Petitot's "Collection of Memoirs.") The plan of Henry IV came to nothing, and the Peace of Westphalia (1648) is generally regarded as the foundation of the modern political system of Europe. It established a modus vivendi between Catholics and Protestants; recognized the republics of Switzerland and the United Netherlands; placed the German Empire on a firmer footing; and raised a bulwark against the ambition of the house of Austria. The second great settlement was that of the Treaty of Utrecht (q.v.), 1713, which put an end to the war of rivalry between France and Austria for the throne of Spain. Since the Peace of Westphalia the equilibrium of Europe had been more seriously threatened by the house of Bourbon than by the house of Habsburg; but the Treaty of Utrecht gave Spain to a younger branch of the Bourbon line. Britain was the principal power in the negotiation, whereas she had taken no part in the Treaty of Westphalia. The third great settlement of Europe was in the Peace of Vienna in 1815. This was designed to restore to Europe the tranquillity which had been broken by the wars of the French Revolution and of Napoleon. Its arrangements were based on calculations of the balance of power, but many of them have been falsified by events. The theory of the balance of power may at one time have been defensible, but it has often given rise to spoliations and violations of justice. It is impossible to restrain every state within the limits which once sufficed for it. The growth of wealth, of population, of colonization, the inevitable facts of annexation and conquest, are witnessed in all ages of the world. Peace is destroyed if each of these increments is held to justify a similar addition to neighbouring states. The law of progress determines the shifting of the balance; but there is no reason why each of these changes should be the signal for a European war. The modern law of nations depends rather on securing the equality of all states, great and small, before the law, and the protection of the weak against the violence of the strong. The growth of one state in power and prosperity is not necessarily a danger to the rest. It may even be sometimes regarded as an additional guarantee for peace. [LEAGUE OF NATIONS.]

Baldock, ROBERT DE (d. 1327), was chancellor of England c. 1324-6. He was one of Edward II's chief supporters, and shared with the Despencers the hatred of the baronage. In 1326, on the landing of Queen Isabella, he fled with the king and the Despencers into Wales, where he was seized and sent to the Bishop of Hereford's house in London. Thence he was dragged by the mob and thrust into Newgate, where he shortly afterwards died.

Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury (1185-90), born at Exeter, was educated at Ford Abbey, where he became a monk. He was made Bishop of Worcester in 1180, and in 1184 was elected Archbishop of Canterbury.

He preached the second crusade in England and Wales and himself took the Cross.

Baldwin, RT. HON. STANLEY J. (b. 1867), entered parliament in 1908. His rise to fame was very rapid. He became parliamentary private secretary in 1916, a junior lord of the treasury in 1917, a privy councillor in 1920, and president of the board of trade in 1921. At the Carlton Club meeting on October 19, 1922, he joined Bonar Law in seceding from the Lloyd George coalition of 1916, in order to save the Conservative party from being "lost in ruins." He became chancellor of the exchequer under Bonar Law until that statesman died, when Mr. Baldwin himself became prime minister. His first ministry fell in November 1923 on a Protection issue, but he returned to power nine months later on the defeat of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's government.

Bale, JOHN (1495-1563), one of the most zealous of the reformers under Henry VIII, was made Bishop of Ossory by Edward VI, 1553. He was compelled to leave England during the reign of Mary, but returned on the accession of Elizabeth, and was made prebendary of Canterbury. Bale wrote several religious plays, a history of English writers, and numerous controversial works on religious questions.

Balfour, ARTHUR JAMES, 1ST EARL OF (b. 1848), a nephew of Lord Salisbury, educated at Eton and at Trinity College, Cambridge, first sat in the House of Commons in 1874 as member for Hertford. For a time he was one of the members of the "Fourth Party." In Lord Salisbury's first administration (1885) he was president of the local government board; in 1886 he joined the cabinet as secretary for Scotland; in 1887 he became chief secretary for Ireland; in 1891 he succeeded W. H. Smith as first lord of the treasury and leader of the House, resuming these positions when his party returned to power in 1895, and again on the reconstruction of the ministry in 1900. In July 1902, on the retirement of Lord Salisbury, he became prime minister, and held office until his cabinet resigned at the end of 1905. In January 1906 he was defeated at Manchester East, but was elected the following month for the City of London, and was leader of the opposition until November 1911, when he resigned. He joined the first coalition ministry of May 1915 as first lord of the admiralty, and the second coalition of December 1916 as foreign secretary. He headed a British mission to the United States in 1917, and was a signatory of the Treaty of Versailles in 1919. After the war he remained in the Lloyd George cabinet as lord president of the council, and represented the government at the Washington Conference of 1921-2. He became an earl in April 1922. On his return from Palestine in 1925 he became lord president of the council in the second Baldwin cabinet.

Balfour, JOHN (of Burleigh), in conjunction with Hackston, his brother-in-law, and John Henderson, murdered Archbishop Sharp (q.v.), 1679. He made his escape after the murder, and was at the battle of Drumclog (q.v.).

Baliol, EDWARD (d. 1363 ?), son of King John Baliol, succeeded to his father's French estates, and divided his time between France and England. On the death of Bruce in 1329, secretly encouraged by the English government, and joined by the "disinherited barons," he put forward his claims to the throne of Scotland through hereditary succession (although his father had resigned all connexion with the kingdom). In 1332 he landed with an army in Fife, and won the battle of Dupplin Moor (q.v.); shortly afterwards he successfully held Perth against a besieging army, and was crowned at Scone, September 1332. His first act was to render homage to Edward III, who at once sent an army to assist him, but the national party gradually gathered strength, and Baliol found himself compelled to retire to the English court after a defeat at Annan. In 1335 he was released by Edward's aid after the battle of Halidon Hill, on condition of the surrender of Lothian to the English king. His position was, however, fatally weak, and in 1338 he again returned to England. In 1346 he ravaged Nithsdale and Cunningham with an English army, but gained little advantage; in 1356 he resigned absolutely his claims to the crown and kingdom to Edward III in return for a pension of £2,000.

Baliol, JOHN DE, one of the regents of Scotland during the minority of Alexander III, was deprived of his office by the English party, 1255. He married Devorguilla, granddaughter of David, Earl of Huntingdon, who brought him half of the lordship of Galloway. He was the founder of Balliol College, Oxford, which was further richly endowed by his widow.

Baliol, JOHN, Lord of Galloway (1249-1315), was the son of the preceding. From his mother he derived a claim to the Scottish throne. On the death of the Maid of Norway in 1290, and the consequent failure of heirs to Alexander III, Baliol, John de Hastings, Robert Bruce, and a host of minor competitors, laid claim to the crown of Scotland. Together with other Scots nobles, Baliol was summoned by Edward I to a conference at Norham, 1291, where the succession to the Scottish throne was to be settled. The meeting was adjourned to June 1292, when the arbiters announced that Baliol's claims were preferable to those of Bruce. Baliol was accordingly declared King of Scotland by Edward, and did homage to him, November 20, 1292; he was crowned at Scone ten days afterwards, and renewed his homage to Edward, December 26, at New-castle. Edward soon began to exact the rights of an overlord, encouraging appeals to his own courts from those of Baliol; on the appeal of Macduff, Earl of Fife, the Scottish king was summoned to appear in London, and though he disobeyed the summons he put in an appearance at the English parliament of 1294. Little by little Scottish feeling against the action of the English king was aroused; in October 1295 Baliol, urged by public feeling in the country, concluded an alliance with Philip of France, and in March of the following year invaded England, laying waste the northern counties, and also sent a document renouncing his allegiance to the English king. Edward at once marched northwards at the head of a large army, and took Berwick, Dunbar, and Edinburgh. On July 10, 1296, Baliol, seeing that further resistance was useless, made his submission at Montrose, renouncing to his liege lord the kingdom of Scotland. Edward ordered his imprisonment in England for a short time, after which he was permitted to retire to France, where he died in 1315.

Baliol, THE FAMILY OF, came from Bailleul-en-Vimeu in Picardy; and acquired considerable estates in the north of England after the Conquest, including the barony of Bywell and Barnard Castle. Its members were found taking an active part on the side of England in all the Border wars.

Ball, JOHN (d. 1381), one of the leaders of the Peasants' Revolt (q.v.), is sometimes said to have been one of Wyclif's "Poor Priests." At all events he preached doctrines very similar to those of Wyclif. He had been notorious as a wild fanatic for many years, and was imprisoned by the Archbishop of Canterbury in Maidstone jail, when he was released by the insurgents, to whom he preached a famous sermon on Blackheath full of socialistic doctrine. He took for his text the popular distich—

"When Adam dalf and Eve span,
Who was then a gentleman?"

On the suppression of the revolt he was seized and executed.

Ballads are of great historical importance, for they were the literature of the people, and give indications, which can be obtained nowhere else, of the popular feeling in stirring times. They were numerous in the old English days, and were sung in the thegn's hall and in the churl's cottage. Some specimens, chief of which is the "Song of the Battle of Brunanburh," were so popular that they were embodied in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle.

After the Conquest, the songs of the people no longer circulated amongst the Norman barons. Not till barons and people were united in the attempt to assert their common liberties did a ballad literature arise which breathes the spirit of all classes. In the reign of John we again find political songs, and in the time of the Barons' War they were numerous. There are French ballads which were sung in the barons' halls, Latin ballads which were current among the educated class, and rude but spirited English ballads which were sung by the people. Chief in importance amongst these is a Latin "Song of the Battle of Lewes" (Wright, "Political Songs," p. 72), which is a remarkable assertion of constitutional principles, and might have been written by a Whig in 1688. The reign of Edward I awakened a national spirit, which found its expression in national and martial songs, accompanied by others which grumble at oppression. In the reign of Edward II the latter kind prevail, while under Edward III the balance is restored by the patriotism kindled by the French war. The number of English songs becomes greater; the French and Latin sink into the background. The end of the reign of Edward III saw the English songs disappear, and the others became less spirited. The national impulse was spent, and the problems of the succeeding period awakened no popular expression. Ballads gradually ceased to have a direct bearing on politics, and were concerned with chivalry and romance. They satisfied the popular desire for adventure, but did not deal with current events. The minstrel became a recognized personage, and was generally said to come from "the north cuntry," the land where border-raids still kept alive the adventurous spirit. The ballads of Chevy Chase, Edom o' Gordon, and Adam Bell, all show their northern origin. It is of them that Sir Philip Sidney wrote, "I never heard the old songs that I found not my heart moved more than with a trumpet." During the Reformation period ballads dealt with polemical topics, often in a coarse and irreverent manner. However, the influence of ballads naturally declined before the growth of other forms of literature. The stage and the pamphlet afforded other means of expressing popular opinion. The struggle between the Stuarts and the Parliament did not give rise to much ballad literature. But the unpopularity of James II was sung and whistled all over England in Wharton's "Lillibulero" (q.v.). A vein of very beautiful ballad-poetry was struck in Scotland by the Jacobite risings of the eighteenth century. In Ireland also ballads survive to the present day as a political power. The songs written for the Nation newspaper, collected under the name of "The Spirit of the Nation," deserve their popularity by their poetical merits. At the present day there are numerous collections of old ballads, but it is difficult to determine their date, and, in many cases, their genuineness.

Ballard, JOHN, or FORTESCUE (d. 1586), a Jesuit priest of Rheims, and the original instigator of the Babington plot (q.v.), landed in England (1585), having previously obtained the sanction of the pope to the queen's murder. He made a tour of the north and west of England, and subsequently reported to Mendoza, who had been ambassador at Elizabeth's court, that the death of the queen was necessary to the success of an insurrection. In 1586 Ballard returned to England, and was in close communication with Babington. On August 4, 1586, he was arrested, and executed at Tyburn in the following month.

Ballinamuck, SURRENDER OF THE FRENCH AT (September 8, 1798). The French force under General Humbert, which had landed at Killala and routed the troops sent against them at Castlebar, found their way to Longford barred by a large force under Lord Cornwallis, while General Lake with fresh troops was close behind, so that Humbert had no alternative but to surrender. Eight hundred French and 1,500 Irish surrendered. Many of the latter were at once hanged.

Ballot, VOTE BY. The ballot is properly a mode of voting in which little balls are used, but it is employed to signify any kind of secret voting. The vote by ballot for members of parliament appears to have been first proposed in the reign of William III. In 1710 a bill authorizing vote by ballot passed the Commons, but was rejected by the Lords. During the agitation for parliamentary reform, which resulted in the Reform Bill of 1832, it was not lost sight of as a remedy for bribery; and some disappointment was felt, on the introduction of the Reform Bill by Lord John Russell, that provisions for secret voting were not contained in it. It was replied that the reason why a ballot clause was not introduced into the bill was because it was desirable that the two questions should be kept distinct. When it was found that the ministry did not intend to follow the Reform Act by a Ballot Act, the matter was taken up by independent members of the Liberal party. George Grote made his first motion in favour of the ballot on April 25, 1835. He repeated it every year till 1839, on which occasion the ayes were 216, the noes 333. Grote's place in moving the adoption of the ballot was taken by Henry Berkeley, who in 1851 carried his motion in spite of the opposition of Lord John Russell and the government by a majority of fifty-one. It was, however, rejected on several subsequent occasions.

Vote by ballot was one of the points of the People's Charter, and perhaps the one to which the greatest importance was attached. It was advocated on the ground of its being the only efficient safeguard against bribery and intimidation; it was opposed on the ground of the safeguard being itself founded on falsehoods, and the probability of a man promising to vote in one way and voting in another. The revelations made before a select committee of the House of Commons convinced many statesmen, Gladstone among others, that the step could not be long delayed. This committee reported, in 1869, that the ballot presented many advantages—that it would put an end to some of the evils in our electoral system, and that it would tend to mitigate rather than to aggravate those which it would not entirely remove. In 1871 the matter was referred to in the queen's speech, and a bill was introduced by W. E. Forster (q.v.), providing for vote by ballot in all parliamentary and municipal elections, except parliamentary elections for universities. It passed the Commons, but was rejected by the Lords on the ground that it was brought before them too late in the session. In 1872 it again passed the Commons, but an amendment was introduced in the Lords making secret voting optional. This the House of Commons would not accept, and after a struggle the Lords yielded the point. With the establishment of secret voting, public nominations of the candidates, which had frequently been occasions of serious disorder and rioting, were abolished.

[Vote by ballot has since been extended to School Board elections, elections of Guardians of the Poor, and County Council, District Council, and Parish Council elections, and to amendments of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906. The act of 1872 was made permanent in 1918 by the Representation of the People Act.]

Ballymore Hill, THE BATTLE OF (June 4, 1798), was fought during the Irish Rebellion between Colonel Walpole and Father John Murphy (q.v.). The former, marching carelessly towards Enniscorthy with some 500 royal troops, was surprised in a defile by a body of insurgents under Father Murphy. Colonel Walpole fell with a considerable portion of his force, and his guns were captured.

Balmerino, ARTHUR ELPHINSTONE, 6th Baron. (1688-1746). [ELPHINSTONE.]

Balnaves, HENRY, of Halhill (d. 1579), was one of the earliest of the Scottish reformers. He was appointed a lord of session in 1538, and sat in parliament in the same year, and supported the act for the translation of the Old and New Testaments. He was one of the commissioners in May 1543 appointed to treat of the marriage between Edward VI and Mary Stuart. In 1547 he was taken prisoner by the French force sent to assist the queen regent, and conveyed to France in company with Knox. Recalled in 1556, he was in 1563 reappointed a lord of session. He was on the commission appointed to revise the Book of Discipline, and one of those who accompanied Moray on his mission to England in connexion with the murder of Darnley.

Baltic, BATTLE OF THE. [COPENHAGEN.]

Baltic Expedition, THE (1854-5), occurred during the war with Russia. On March 11, 1854, a strong squadron, consisting of eight screw line-of-battle ships, and eight frigates and paddle-wheel steamers, sailed for the Baltic under the command of Sir Charles Napier. Previous to the departure of the fleet a banquet was given to the admiral at the Reform Club, where speeches calculated to increase the war feeling in the country were made by Palmerston and Sir James Graham, and provoked much animadversion in parliament. In April Sir Charles Napier, strongly reinforced and accompanied by a powerful French fleet, established a blockade of the Gulf of Finland, and captured many Russian prizes. In August Bomarsund was bombarded and taken; but except that a large Russian army had been kept inactive in the Baltic forts, and the Russian fleet had been driven from the sea, nothing further of much importance was done this year. Consequently the government evinced dissatisfaction that more had not been effected, and on the return of Sir Charles in December he was treated with great coldness, and finally deprived of his command. Rear-Admiral Dundas succeeded him in 1855, and in the summer of that year there were eighty-five English war vessels, besides a large French fleet, in the Baltic Sea. The fleet consisted entirely of steamers, and was accompanied by a flotilla of floating batteries, mortar vessels, and gunboats. Some delay occurred in consequence of a collision between one of the squadron and an American emigrant ship. On June 1, however, the allied fleets met in the Baltic and for three days bombarded Sveaborg, with an immense destruction of life and property, but without any appreciable result on the course of the war. The fleets then retired in consequence of unfavourable weather, and returned home, having effected nothing in proportion to the expense which they had involved, and the expectations to which they had given rise.

Baluchistan is the territory of the Khan of Kalat, situated on the Sind frontier, and lying to the south of Afghanistan, and between that country and the sea. [KALAT.]

Bamburgh, anciently "Bebbanburgh," is mentioned by Bæda, and is said in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle to have been built by Ida, King of Northumbria, about the year 547, and named in honour of his wife Bebbe. There is a very strongly-situated castle, some portions of which possibly belong to a period before the Norman Conquest. The castle was besieged by Penda of Mercia in 642, unsuccessfully defended by de Mowbray against William Rufus, and played an important part in the civil wars of the fifteenth century. In 1720 it passed into the possession of Nathaniel, Lord Crew, Bishop of Durham, who turned it into an institution for various charitable purposes, and fitted up apartments for shipwrecked seamen, a library, schools for poor children, an infirmary, etc.

Banbury, judging from the number of Roman remains which have been discovered there, was probably a place of importance before the English conquest. It appears in Domesday Book as Banesberie. In the reign of Henry I a great castle was erected by Alexander, Bishop of Lincoln. In 1469 a battle was fought near the town by the troops of Edward IV, under the Earl of Pembroke, and a strong body of northern insurgents, in which Pembroke (weakened by the desertion of Lord Stafford) was defeated, and subsequently beheaded. [EDGCOFF.] In the Civil War the inhabitants of Banbury were specially zealous for the Commonwealth. After the battle of Edgehill the town was taken by the king, and stood a desperate siege in 1644, for fourteen weeks, when the garrison were reduced to the last extremity before they were relieved by the Earl of Northampton. It was again besieged by Whalley in 1646, but held out till the king had surrendered to the Scots army. The castle was subsequently destroyed by order of the Parliament.

Bancroft, RICHARD (1544-1610), was Archbishop of Canterbury from 1604 to 1610. He was born in Lancashire in 1544, and was educated at Cambridge University. He became treasurer of St. Paul's (1585), Canon of Canterbury (1594), and Bishop of London (1597). He had already made himself very popular by his denunciations of the Puritans, and Archbishop Whitgift entrusted the sole management of Church affairs to him. Three years later he was employed on an embassy to Denmark. He took an active part in the Hampton Court Conference (q.v.) in 1604. Later in the year he succeeded Whitgift as Archbishop of Canterbury, and at once proceeded to compel the clergy to subscribe the articles imposed in the new book of canons which he had compiled, the result being that some three hundred of the Puritan clergy were ejected from their livings. At the same time he was engaged in superintending the present translation of the Bible. In the following year he presented to the king a series of articles of complaint against the judges, who, acting on the advice of Coke, had issued prohibitions in the ecclesiastical courts in order to stop the cases before them; but the judges declared that they would submit to an act of parliament, and to that only. He renewed his appeal in 1608, but James, who was inclined to support him, after a violent altercation with Coke, thought it best to reserve his conclusion. The same result happened in the following year, when, urged on by the prayers of the ecclesiastical lawyers, he brought forward his complaint a third time. Bancroft is said to have used his influence to soften the rigour with which parliament was inclined to treat the papists after the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot; but he could not prevent the passing of a Bill of Pains and Penalties. In 1608 he was made chancellor of the University of Oxford, and just before his death took great interest in James's scheme for an episcopal church in Scotland. Archbishop Bancroft was a remarkably sincere though perhaps a narrow-minded man, never deliberately cruel; but a firm believer in the divine origin of the episcopacy. [L. C. S.]

Banda Islands, in the Indian Archipelago, were taken from the Dutch in 1796, but restored in 1801. They were retaken in 1811, and again restored in 1816.

Bangorian Controversy. [HOADLY.]

Banished Lords (1583) was the name given to the nobles of the Ruthven party who seized Stirling Castle, but were compelled by Arran and a large royal army to flee across the border. They formed a small community, which they attempted to regulate on strict religious principles at Newcastle. The Scottish government outlawed them, and demanded their surrender; this was, however, refused. In 1585 the banished lords, with the Hamiltons and Maxwells and a strong force, marched to Stirling, captured the king, and procured the reversal of their outlawry and the restitution of their estates.

Bank Charter Acts. BANK OF ENGLAND, BANK OF IRELAND, etc. [BANKING.]

Bank Holidays Act, THE, was brought in by Sir John Lubbock (afterwards Lord Avebury), and carried in 1871. It declared that Easter Monday, Whit Monday, the first Monday in August, and the day following Christmas Day should be public holidays.

Banking (1) seems to have originated in modern Europe among the Italian money-lenders, especially those of Florence, of whom the Bardi and Peruzzi, who were ruined by the inability of Edward III to pay his debts, most concern English history. Banking was first practised in England during the reign of Charles II by the goldsmiths of Lombard Street [to whom the city merchants had entrusted their bullion after the seizure by Charles I in 1640 of £130,000 deposited in the Tower of London. Charles II borrowed from the goldsmiths in anticipation of supplies and to finance his Dutch wars;] and it soon became an important trade, when the advantages of cheques over ready-money payments became known, in spite of its dangers as displayed by the frequent bankruptcy of the goldsmiths. Private banks sprang up, such as those of Messrs. Child at Temple Bar, and of Messrs. Hoare in Fleet Street, and the question of a national bank began to be eagerly discussed. [Such a bank was necessary for both commercial and political reasons. The commercial prosperity of the Restoration period needed supplementing by the foundation of an institution which would regulate paper currency and lower the rate of interest; while William III needed loans to carry on his continental wars despite the insufficiency of heavy taxation.]

(2) THE BANK OF ENGLAND was projected by a Scotsman, William Paterson (q.v.), who submitted his plan to the government in 1691. It was well received, but was allowed to lie dormant until 1694, when Montague, the ablest financier in William III's ministry, suddenly determined to establish the bank in order to relieve the government of its many difficulties caused by war and misapplied taxation. [The proposal was opposed by the Tories, the landed gentry, and the goldsmiths, who declared the bank would attract to itself all the money in the kingdom and leave none for purposes of trade. But Paterson was successful.] He borrowed £1,200,000 at eight per cent., and formed the subscribers into a company, who treated the loan to government as part of their capital, the interest being secured upon the taxes. [The bank was established by the Tonnage Act of 1694.] By their charter, which was granted for eleven years, from July 27, the government of the bank was entrusted to a governor and twenty-four directors, who were to be elected annually by such members of the company as possessed £500 capital stock. Sir John Hornblow was the first governor. The company was restrained from trading in anything but bullion, bills of exchange, and forfeited pledges, and from lending money to the Crown without the consent of parliament. In spite of the popularity of the Bank of England, the government loan of which was raised in ten days, it had at first to encounter much opposition, and several crises occurred, especially during the year 1696. The goldsmiths, who hated the Bank of England, attempted to destroy it by buying up its paper, and suddenly demanding immediate payment. The directors, however, referred them to the courts of law, and, during the time thus gained, managed to restore their credit by extensive calls on their subscribers. [A second danger appeared in 1696, when the Recoinage Act threatened to involve the bank in grave financial distress.] But the directors were strengthened by the fall of their rival the Land Bank, [founded by statute in April 1696,] whose brief popularity had seriously affected their operations during the crisis. This was the idea of two men named John Briscoe and Hugh Chamberlain, who thought that a bank could be formed to lend money on landed security, their doctrine being that every one who had real property ought to have besides paper money to the full value of their property. The scheme was adopted in a modified form by Harley; he promised to advance two millions and a half to government at 7 per cent., the interest being secured upon a new tax on salt. If a quarter of the money was paid in by August 1 the subscribers were to be incorporated under the title of the National Land Bank. William, urged by want of money, grasped at the idea, and headed the list with £500, but [by June] the scheme proved an utter failure. The subscriptions never rose to more than £7,500. Thereupon the government turned in despair to the Bank of England; the subscribers, in full court, resolved to lend it £200,000, and thus began the alliance between the bank and the Whig ministries. In 1709 the bank capital (£2,201,171) was doubled by an important act which also forbade the issue of notes by associations of more than six persons: a law which checked the formation of joint-stock banks. In 1720 came the third great crisis of the bank's existence. The South Sea Company (q.v.) then proposed to take over the government debt, consisting of about thirty millions, to its capital, receiving in return interest at 4 per cent.; but such was the anxiety entertained by all public companies to have the government for a creditor that the Bank of England contended against the company for the privilege, but was, fortunately for itself, outbidden. In a few months the bubble burst and the bank stood secure, though it was compelled by government to pay up two millions out of the £3,500,000 which in a weak moment it had promised to lend its tottering enemy. [In 1722 a Reserve Fund was formed.] With the exception of a run on the bank during the Jacobite rebellion of 1745 [when the funds fell to 49 and Black Friday (December 6) produced a panic], which was only averted by payment in sixpences, and a violent attack upon it by the mob during the Gordon Riots of 1780, there is little of especial moment in the history of the Bank of England until 1793, when a violent commercial panic occurred chiefly owing to the reckless use of paper by country banks, some fifty of which failed totally. The Suspension of Cash Payments in 1797 was caused chiefly by the drain of bullion due to the war, subsidies to foreign allies, the exclusive purchase of provisions abroad owing to bad harvests, and the hoarding of coin owing to fear of invasion. A run on the bank set in from all sides, and on February 27, when little over a million remained in its cellars, a proclamation was issued forbidding it to issue cash in payment. This was followed by the Bank Restriction Act (May 3), prohibiting it to pay more than 20s. in cash, or to advance more than £600,000 to government; at the same time the bill of 1777, which prohibited notes for less than £5, was suspended. This measure, by which Bank of England notes became inconvertible, though intended to be temporary, lasted until 1821, during which period the value of paper varied very considerably. [Pitt thereafter pursued a cautious financial policy, preferring heavier taxation to a drain on the bank; but the Restriction Act was prolonged on account of the exchange being unfavourable, and the bank gradually began to issue notes recklessly. After the war the question of resumption grew important as prosperity returned.] The Resumption of Cash Payments was proposed by Sir Robert Peel in 1819; the act (1819, c. 49) was to have come into effect in 1823, but its provisions were adopted by the bank two years earlier (May 1, 1821). In 1825 another crisis occurred. During the last six weeks of the year seventy houses failed, and the bank itself was only saved, it is said, by the discovery of a cluster of 700,000 £1 notes. The measures of the government were prompt. By an act of 1826 notes for less than £5 were suppressed, and the law of 1708 repealed, banks with any number of partners being permissible beyond sixty-five miles from London, while the bank in return was allowed to establish branches to be carried on by its agents. The Bank Charter Act of 1833, framed on the occasion of the renewal of the charter at the instance of Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, and others, attempted to stop runs on the bank by enacting that notes of the Bank of England were to be made legal tender, whereby the country banks would be enabled to meet a panic with notes instead of gold. A deduction of £120,000 a year was to be made in the sum allowed by government to the bank for the management of the national debt, while in return a quarter of £14,520,000, the sum due, was paid back. The principle that the paper issued and specie kept in hand should bear to each other the ratio of three to one was established, and the bank was compelled to publish a general statement of its condition quarterly. In spite of this remedial measure, bullion was continually lacking in London [as a result of large exportations of gold to buy corn to meet the bad harvests], and in 1839 the Bank of England was in imminent danger of stopping payment; whereupon Sir Robert Peel brought forward the Bank Charter Act of 1844. Its object being to regulate the issue of notes, it enacted that the bank should not be allowed to issue more than £14,000,000 in notes, unless a corresponding amount of specie were retained. Further, no new banks established after the measure became law were to issue their own notes, and the old banks were not to increase their issue. [Thus the currency principle—that a reserve should be maintained in order to meet national emergencies, triumphed over the banking principle, which had denounced the imposition of a definite limit on issues.] Sir R. Peel's great act was the last important piece of legislation affecting the Bank of England. [Crises occurred subsequently (a) in 1847, as a result of bad harvests and of much speculation in railways, involving the suspension of the Bank Charter Act of 1844 and a government inquiry in 1848; (b) in 1857, as a result of a crisis in America due to unbounded speculation in gold and railways; (c) in 1867, chiefly as a result of the new mania for forming limited liability companies, and involving the failures of Overend, Gurney & Co. and the suspension of the act of 1844; (d) in 1890 (the Baring crisis—q.v.), due to similar causes and involving the collapse of Messrs. Baring. The last of these was averted without the suspension of the Bank Charter Act. Nor was the act suspended in August 1914, when the outbreak of the Great War produced a new crisis. The requisite number of paper notes were issued by the Treasury.]

(3) JOINT-STOCK BANKS were rendered possible by the act of 1826. [Joint-stock companies had previously been prohibited from engaging in banking by the act of 1709.] They increased largely in numbers after 1836. By Sir R. Peel's Bank Charter Act of 1844 they were allowed to accept bills of any amount or date, and could sue or be sued. Banks other than the Bank of England are regulated by the Companies Act of 1908, in substitution for that of 1862. This act provides that no association of more than ten persons can carry on a bank unless registered under the Companies Act; that an unlimited company may convert itself into a limited one; that a bank of issue shall, with certain relaxations, though registered as a limited company, have unlimited liability with respect to its notes; and that accounts must be audited and published once a year. There is also the Banking Companies Act of 1867, which provided for minute registration with regard to the sale or purchase of shares in a joint-stock banking company.

(4) THE BANK OF SCOTLAND was established by act of the Scottish parliament in July 1695. Its capital was £100,000 sterling, of which about £10,000 was paid up, and it had the exclusive privilege of banking in Scotland for twenty-one years. Its capital was intact from state loans, and it was also temporarily exempt from public burdens. Nevertheless, the great African Company started a banking branch in rivalry, but they soon abandoned it for the more exciting pursuit of trade. The bank began to issue notes and establish branches in 1696, and in 1704 it issued £1 notes. After the union of England with Scotland it undertook the recoinage, and conducted it with great success. Its capital was increased to £2,000,000 in 1774, and to £2,500,000 in 1804, with power, if necessary, to raise it to £3,000,000. It established an office in London in 1867, the restrictions of English joint-stock banks not affecting Scottish. After the monopoly of the Bank of Scotland expired, many unchartered banks came into being, of which the Royal Bank of Scotland (1728) and the British Linen Company (1746) were the oldest and most successful. The smaller banks were, however, absorbed in the earlier part of the century into about a dozen large banks with constantly increasing branches still in existence. [The Central Bank was absorbed into the Bank of Scotland in 1868, and the Caledonian Banking Company in 1907.] In 1844 the Bank Charter Act allowed the Scottish banks then issuing notes to continue to do so, provided that for every note issued above the average issue of the previous year a corresponding amount of specie should be kept in stock. [The Bank of Scotland Act of 1920 (succeeding those of 1695 and 1873) empowered the bank to open branches abroad. A similar act of the same year was passed for the Royal Bank.]

(5) THE BANK OF IRELAND [for the establishment of which there had been abortive proposals in 1695 and 1720] was established in May 1783 by charter in pursuance of a request from the Irish parliament, with the same constitution and privileges as the Bank of England, and a capital of £600,000, increased to £1,000,000 in 1809, and lent to the government at 4 per cent. It was prohibited from lending money on mortgage, and this restriction was not repealed until 1860. The restrictions on joint-stock banks as to paper issues caused such distress in Ireland, that in 1821 government allowed the Bank of Ireland to increase its capital to £3,000,000, while joint-stock banks were to be established beyond fifty miles from Dublin. [The Provincial Bank of Ireland was established in 1825 in London, with its first branch at Cork. This creation was the "pioneer of Irish banking." By 1885 several other joint-stock banks had been founded. The Bank Act of 1845 removed all restrictions on banks in Dublin and for fifty miles round.]

fraudulent debtors is the Act 13 Eliz., c. 7, by which the goods of a trader who failed to meet his obligations were to be sold for the benefit of his creditors. By acts passed in the fourth and tenth years of Queen Anne, bankrupts who had paid a dividend might, with the consent of their creditors, obtain their discharge from the Court of Chancery. Bankruptcy jurisdiction belonged to the Court of Chancery, but by the Act 1 and 2 Will. IV, c. 56, proposed and carried by Lord Brougham, a special Court of Bankruptcy was established. It provided that six commissioners and four judges should be appointed to try all cases of bankruptcy. The commissioners could adjudicate only in cases where there was no dispute; if the matter was disputed it was to be referred to a judge. By an act of 1849 fraudulent bankrupts were rendered more certainly liable to punishment, and composition by arrangement made possible. In 1861 the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts were extended to others besides traders. The most important of the numerous Bankruptcy Acts of the nineteenth century is that of 1869, which remodelled the court, and made important changes in the law. The commissioners were abolished, and there were to be a chief judge (usually a vice-chancellor) and a number of registrars. The County Courts were constituted local bankruptcy courts with an appeal to the chief judge. The property was to be placed in the hands of trustees appointed by the creditors instead of official assignees, and there were provisions by which the bankrupt could not obtain his discharge, except with the consent of a majority of the creditors, unless he had paid ten shillings in the pound. The act also provided for "liquidation by arrangement," with the consent of the creditors; and repealed or consolidated all former enactments on the subject of bankruptcy. In 1883 a new Bankruptcy Act was carried by Joseph Chamberlain. It enacted severe punishments against fraudulent bankrupts, and abolished the system of trustees, substituting for them a staff of official receivers appointed by the board of trade. In Scotland bankruptcy was placed on a legal footing by the act of 1696. There is no separate Bankruptcy Court, but by 7 Will. IV, c. 56, the sheriffs have jurisdiction as well as the Court of Session. In Ireland, by an act of the year 1872, the law of bankruptcy was assimilated to that of England. [DEBT.] [The law of bankruptcy, after further modifications made in 1883, 1890, and 1913, is now mostly contained in the Bankruptcy Act of 1914.]

Banneret, or KNIGHT-BANNERET, was a degree of knighthood superior to that of knight bachelor. A banneret was originally a knight who was able to bring a company of vassals into the field under his own banner. Bannerets were privileged to carry the square banner instead of the pointed pennon borne by other knights. The distinction was subsequently awarded for special bravery on the battle-field, and the ceremony of cutting off the corner of the pennon so as to make it a banner was performed by the king in person standing beneath his own royal banner. Bannerets ranked before all other knights except those of the Garter. The dignity was altogether personal, and was never hereditary. It has sometimes been regarded, but erroneously, as a rank of peerage inferior to a barony. It conferred no right to sit in parliament. The order gradually died out, and in modern times has become extinct; but a knight-banneret was created by George III as late as 1797.

The name is, of course, derived from banner; but it was sometimes supposed to be a derivative or diminutive of baron, and the Latin form baronetus occasionally occurs.

Bannockburn, THE BATTLE OF (June 24, 1314), one of the greatest defeats the English ever suffered, was fought near Stirling, on the attempt of Edward II to relieve the castle of Stirling, which was being besieged by Robert Bruce. The Scots were far outnumbered by the English troops, who, including a large body of Welsh and Irish auxiliaries, may have numbered nearly 100,000 men. Bruce, however, gained the victory in great part by having previously dug holes in the ground so as to impede the magnificent cavalry of the enemy, and by massing his foot into solid squares and circles—a system of receiving cavalry hitherto unpractised, except at the battles of Falkirk and Courtrai, where it had been signally successful. The belief on the part of the English that the camp followers of the Scots army formed part of a reserve completed their discomfiture; the rout was thorough, and an immense booty fell into the victors' hands. The Scots generals, in addition to Bruce, who slew in single combat Henry de Bohun, one of the bravest of the English knights, were Randolph, the king's nephew, Edward Bruce, Walter Stewart, and James Douglas; the English were led by Edward II in person, and the Earls of Pembroke and Gloucester. Edward narrowly escaped being taken prisoner, and had to ride at full speed to Linlithgow, hotly pursued by Douglas; his privy seal fell into the hands of the victors. The result of the battle was a futile meeting of Scots and English commissioners with a view to bringing about a better understanding between the two countries.

Bantam, in Java, was the site of an English settlement from 1603 to 1683, in which year the English were expelled by the Dutch. The place was again in the possession of the British from 1811 to 1814.

Bantry Bay is a deep inlet on the west of the county of Cork. Here, on May 1, 1689, Château-Renault anchored with a French fleet and put on shore a quantity of stores. Admiral Herbert followed him; but an engagement, claimed as a victory by both parties, was all that took place. In December 1796 a large French fleet of seven sail of the line, three frigates, and seventeen transports, sent to aid an Irish rising, anchored here for a week. They did not immediately land their men, owing to the absence of General Hoche, their commander, who had got separated from the squadron; and subsequently a storm arose and drove them back to France. In 1801 the fleet under Admiral Mitchell mutinied here. Twenty-two of the ringleaders in the mutiny were condemned to death at Portsmouth in January 1802, but only eleven were executed.

Baptists are those Christians who hold that believers alone should be baptized. Their modern history begins with 1609, when Englishmen in Holland united into a Church whose only other peculiarity was to insist, in opposition to Calvin, that God intended all men for life, none for death. These "General" Baptists had twice to shed groups who tended to Unitarianism, but they were reinforced in 1770 by a New Connexion. Finding in 1891 that their views were no longer exceptional, they dissolved their separate organization, and leavened the Baptist Union. The much larger body of "Particular" or Calvinistic Baptists took shape about 1633, developed a network of associations in England within twenty years, formed the first Protestant Missionary Society in 1792, and the Baptist Union in 1813. Between 1830 and 1860 the high doctrines of Calvin, and a refusal to commune with members of other bodies, isolated the "Strict and Particular" Baptists. The great majority have discarded all adjectives, have drawn closely together, and have subscribed large funds for work at home and abroad.

Baptists arose last century independently in Sweden, Denmark, Germany, and Russia, and have spread into every country of Europe. Emigration has distributed them throughout America and the British empire. Missions have planted native churches, chiefly in China, India, Africa, and South America. All are linked since 1905 in the Baptist World Alliance, which reckons about ten million members, besides adherents, thus forming the largest Protestant communion in the world. Meetings of this body have been held in London, Berlin, Stockholm, Philadelphia, Toronto. The conviction that membership in the Church is open only to those who make personal profession of their allegiance to Christ, renders it impossible for Baptists to merge with other bodies; but they often join in local and national movements, and have replied to the Lambeth Appeal that they are ready to explore the possibilities of federation. They often issue Confessions of Faith, and are extremely averse to erecting these into tests for the future, while those of the past receive scant attention. For their cardinal tenet is that each soul is competent in religion under God.

Baratariana was the title of some letters written in the Dublin journals by Henry Flood (q.v.) and his followers in 1770. Barataria was Ireland, and Townshend was Sancho; the members of his council were the officers of Sancho's household. These letters created much sensation on account of their wit and boldness.

Barbados, one of the Windward Islands, was visited by the Portuguese in 1518, claimed by Leigh in 1605 and first colonized by Warner and Courten in 1625. The title to the island was very complicated. Warner's commission (1625), with Carlisle as patron, was followed by the royal grant of Carliola to the patron, who passed on his rights to Marlborough. Courten's patron was Ley, who had received a patent from King James. Montgomery claimed the island in 1628 also by a royal grant, which was disallowed in 1629 in favour of Carlisle, who became sole proprietor. In 1647 Marlborough transferred his rights to Willoughby of Parham, who fortified the island for the king, resisted the Embargo Act of 1650 and the Navigation Act of 1651, but submitted to the Parliamentary admiral, Ayscue, by the articles of surrender, 1652, which recognized as constitutional the representative institutions granted in 1641 by Governor Bell. Proprietary government was abolished in 1663, and the revenue from a 4½ per cent. export duty divided among the rival claimants, Willoughby and Marlborough, while Carlisle's heir was to receive a fixed revenue when the latter's claim had been satisfied. Under the Crown Barbados in 1671 became the centre of the Windward Island governmental group. Slave insurrections were crushed in 1675, 1692, and 1816. American privateers in the war of 1812 destroyed trade. The slaves were emancipated in 1834 to become apprentices until that system was abolished in 1838. In 1876 local independence was vindicated by riots against the incorporation of Barbados in the proposed federation of the Windward Islands and in 1885 Barbados was made a separate colony, now administered by a governor, who is also governor-in-chief of the Windward Islands, assisted by an executive council and committee and by a legislature of a nominated council of nine (only two being officials) and an elected House of Assembly of twenty-four. Barbour, JOHN (d. 1395), was the author of the great national Scottish epic "The Bruce." Of his life little is known. He was born probably about the year 1316; studied at Oxford, and became archdeacon of Aberdeen, clerk of the king's household, and one of the auditors of the exchequer in Scotland. "The Bruce" extends from the death of Alexander III to the death of King Robert. It is a noble epic, full of spirit and vigour and true chivalrous feeling; and is, moreover, highly interesting historically, as being almost the only Scottish authority for this period. Barbour also wrote a book of "Legends of the Saints" and "The Brute," dealing with the story of Brutus.

The earliest edition of "The Bruce" was printed at Edinburgh in 1570. The poem has been carefully edited by Innes for the Spalding Club (1856), and by Skeat for the Early English Text Society (1875).

Barbuda, a dependency of Antigua (q.v.), unsuccessfully settled by Carlisle from St. Kitts in 1628, was colonized from Antigua in 1660-1, formed part of the Caribbees until it was joined to the Leeward Islands (q.v.) in 1671 and became the property of the Codrington family soon after. It is now leased to a private firm.

Barcelona, the chief town of Catalonia, played an important part in the War of the Spanish Succession. In 1704 an unsuccessful attempt was made upon it by Sir George Rooke, who landed the Prince of Darmstadt with some marines, relying upon co-operation within the city. In 1705 the allies, under the Prince of Darmstadt and the Earl of Peterborough, appeared before the town. The fortifications were ancient, but they had been repaired and strengthened. The besieging force was weak and the Spanish auxiliaries showed little disposition or capacity for regular siege operations. After a fortnight the troops prepared to embark; but Peterborough surprised the garrison and captured the fortress. The castle of Barcelona soon surrendered and in October the town capitulated. The Archduke Charles was besieged in Barcelona in 1706, by a fleet under the Count of Toulouse, and an army under Marshal Tessé. Sir John Leake came to the relief of the town, but hesitated to attack the French fleet till Peterborough arrived on board his ship with instructions to supersede him. The French army retired, and the fleet followed its example. After the Peace of Utrecht the place was captured by the Duke of Berwick in 1714. In the Peninsular War Barcelona was occupied by the French in February 1808. In March 1809 an attempt on it was made by Lord Collingwood, in conjunction with the Catalan levies and Somatenes; but the French continued to hold it till the end of the war.

Barclay, WILLIAM (1546 or 1547-1608), a Scotsman by birth, after serving many years in France came to England in 1603, and was well received by James I. He had quarrelled with the Jesuits, and, though still remaining a Roman Catholic, was strongly opposed to the temporal power of the pope. He had also written a work in favour of extreme views of royal authority, which recommended him to James I. His Catholicism, however, prevented his preferment, and in 1604 he returned to France, where he became professor of civil law and dean of the faculty of law at Angers. His controversy with Bellarmine respecting the papal power earned him considerable fame, and his views as to the limits of the pope's authority were adopted by a large number of English Catholics.

Bardolf, THOMAS, 5TH BARON (1368-1408), was one of the nobles who joined Henry of Lancaster in 1399, but he subsequently espoused the cause of the Percys, and joined in the plot to put the Earl of March on the throne. He fled to Scotland in 1405, and in 1408 took up arms in Yorkshire against the king, and was mortally wounded at Bramham Moor. To him is ascribed the famous tripartite treaty dividing England and Wales between Owen Glendower, Sir Edmund Mortimer, and the Earl of Northumberland.

Barebones' Parliament (July 4 to December 12, 1653) was the nickname given to the assembly summoned by Cromwell and the council of officers after the expulsion of the Rump. It derived its name from a certain Praise-God Barbon, or Barebones, a leather-seller of Fleet Street, who took a somewhat prominent part as member of this assembly. It consisted of 139 persons summoned as representatives—122 for England (including seven for London), six for Wales, five for Scotland, and six for Ireland—who were chosen by Cromwell and his officers from lists of persons "faithful, fearing God, and hating covetousness," furnished to them by the various churches. Amongst them were Blake, Montague, Monck, Ashley Cooper, and other men of position and influence. They began by electing Cromwell and four other officers to be members of their body. They set to work to reform the administration of the law, relaxed imprisonment for debt, passed a Civil Marriage Act, commenced the codification of the law, and began the process of abolishing the Court of Chancery. They decided to abolish the power of patrons to present to benefices, and the institution of tithes. These resolutions, especially the latter, would have rendered the existence of a State Church impossible, and Cromwell and the country at large were not prepared to go so far. A sudden stroke solved the difficulty. On December 12 Sydenham, one of the members, having mustered his friends before many of the other party had arrived, suddenly proposed, with the concurrence of the Speaker, that the parliament (which he described as useless and injurious to the Commonwealth) should resign its power into the hands of Cromwell. This motion was at once carried, and those who dissented were expelled by a company of soldiers under Colonel Coffe and Major White. The "sober men" of that meeting, as Cromwell called them, resigned their power into his hands. He accused the other party of an intention "to set up the judicial law of Moses," and to abolish all magistracy and ministry as anti-christian. Some historians, objecting to the somewhat ludicrous title of Barebones' Parliament, have called this assembly "The Little Parliament," while others prefer to style it "The Assembly of Nominees."

Barillon, French ambassador in England (1677-88), was employed by Louis XIV to keep Charles II and James II in dependence upon France, or, at any rate, inactive in European politics. With this object he fomented the quarrel between the court and the country party, writing to his master in 1687, "It may be held as an indubitable maxim that agreement between the King of England and his Parliament is not for the interest of your Majesty." When early in 1688 the national opposition seemed likely to endanger James's position, it was Barillon who advised the bringing over of Irish troops. Yet he allowed himself to be duped by Sunderland's assurances; and it was for this reason that, after he had been obliged to leave England by William, he was not appointed to attend James in Ireland.

Extracts from Barillon's reports are translated in Dalrymple, "Memoirs of Great Britain," and are given in Fox, "History of James II," appendix.

Baring, EVELYN, 1ST EARL CROMER (1841-1917), began life as an officer in the Royal Artillery. In 1872 he accompanied Lord Northbrook to India as his private secretary. In 1876 he left India with the rank of major, being made British commissioner of the Egyptian public debt office. When the Khedive Ismail abdicated, he was promoted to be British controller-general. From 1880 to 1883 he was financial member of the Council of India. He then became British agent and consul-general in Egypt, and took in hand the various questions which called loudly for attention—finance, irrigation, the administration of justice, education, and other important matters. A substantial result of his reforms and economies was that Egypt was enabled (1896-8) to achieve the reconquest of her lost possessions in the Sudan. He was raised to the peerage as Baron Cromer in 1892, created Viscount Cromer in 1898, and Earl Cromer in 1901. On his retirement from Egypt in 1907 he received a grant of £50,000. His death occurred in 1917 during his work on the commission set up in 1916 to inquire into the Dardanelles expedition. The following year his book "Modern Egypt" appeared.

Baring, Thomas George, 1st Earl of Northbrook (1826-1904), was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He was successively private secretary to Henry Labouchere at the board of trade, to Sir George Grey at the home office, to Sir Charles Wood at the India board and at the admiralty in 1857, when he was returned to parliament for Penrhyn and Falmouth, which constituency he continued to represent till he became a peer at the death of his father in 1866. He was a lord of the admiralty from May 1857 to February 1858; under-secretary of state for India from June 1859 to January 1861; under-secretary for war from the latter date till June 1866. On the accession of Gladstone to power in 1868 he was again appointed under-secretary for war; and was governor-general of India from February 1872 until 1876. In Gladstone's second ministry (1880) he was first lord of the admiralty, and in July 1884 was appointed high commissioner in Egypt. His official career ended on the fall of Gladstone in 1885.

Baring Crisis (November 1890). The rapid growth of Argentina had encouraged excessive investment of British capital in the country, mainly through Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., the leading financial firm in England. A revolution in Argentina (July 1890) gave a shock to public confidence, and a little later there was a panic in the United States. The result was a general fall in the price of securities and a rise in the bank rate to 6 per cent. (September 19). In November Messrs. Baring, who were further injured by the American crisis, found themselves compelled to obtain assistance from the Bank of England. The bank agreed, in conjunction with the leading banks and financial houses, to subscribe a guarantee fund, enabling Messrs. Baring to meet their engagements, for a period of three years, during which their assets were to be liquidated. The fund soon reached £16,000,000, and eventually the liquidation was satisfactorily effected. A loan of £3,000,000 in gold was also obtained from the Bank of France. The matter was kept secret till November 16, when the arrangement was complete; by this and the promptitude of the Bank of England and its governor (Mr. Lidderdale), and the ready response of the guarantors, a financial disaster was averted which would have been among the most tremendous on record.

Barking Abbey was one of the oldest and richest nunneries in England. It was said to have been founded by St. Erkenwald, Bishop of London, and after being sacked by the Danes in 870 was restored by Edgar. The revenues of the convent were very large, and the abbess had precedence over other abbesses. She was frequently summoned to render service in the armies of Henry III and Edward I, but in point of fact she held in frankalmoin and the tradition that she held by barony is erroneous. The nuns were of the Benedictine order, and after 1200 exercised the right of electing their own abbess. The convent was surrendered to Henry VIII in 1539.

Barkstead, John (d. 1662), a goldsmith in the Strand, served in the City train bands, and subsequently obtained a colonelcy in the Parliamentary army. He took part in the king's trial, and was one of those who signed the death-warrant. Subsequently he became governor of the Tower and steward of the household to the Protector. At the Restoration he fled to the continent, but was betrayed, brought back, and executed at Tyburn.

Barlow, Sir George Hilary (1762-1847), a civil servant of the Bengal establishment, by meritorious service obtained a seat in the council under Lord Wellesley. On the death of Lord Cornwallis the government of India was temporarily (1805-7) in Sir George Barlow's hands. The result of his determined non-intervention policy was the restoration to Sindhia and Holkar of many of the advantages which England had gained by the Mahratta Wars. He was a great opponent of missionary enterprise in India. In spite of the favour of the directors, Sir George was not appointed governor-general, but was nominated governor of Madras in 1807. His want of tact made him very unpopular in this position. His obstinacy and violence did much to produce the Madras mutiny, but he displayed firmness while it lasted. The result of the mutiny was his recall in 1812.

Barnard, Sir John (1685-1764), was an eminent London merchant who became lord mayor in 1737. He was alderman for Dowgate Ward from 1722 to 1758. He was a vigorous opponent of Sir Robert Walpole, and in 1733 attacked that minister's sinking fund and excise scheme. In 1737 he introduced a bill (which was rejected) to lower the interest of the National Debt by borrowing money at 3 per cent. to redeem the annuities for which a higher rate was being paid. In 1742 he declined to attend the secret committee appointed to inquire into Walpole's administration. He attempted, but without success, to moderate the outcry raised against Admiral Byng.

Barnard Castle, in Durham, the ancient seat of the Dalzils in England, was occupied by the Royalists under Sir George Bowes during the Northern rebellion of 1569. It was subsequently taken by the rebels under the Earl of Westmorland in the course of the same episode.

Barnet, THE BATTLE OF (1471), was fought between Edward IV and the Earl of Warwick and the Lancastrians. On March 14 Edward landed at Ravenspur and marched towards London, no attempt being made to check him. Having been welcomed by the citizens of London, Edward, learning that Warwick was posted at Barnet, marched out to meet him, and drew up his army on Hadley Green. The fight commenced at five o'clock in the morning of April 14, which that year was Easter Day. The Lancastrian right wing under Lord Oxford was at first victorious, and drove in Edward's left; but a heavy fog occasioned them, on their return from the pursuit, to mistake a part of their own army for the Yorkist force; confusion ensued, of which Edward took advantage to retrieve the fortune of the day. After very severe fighting, in which no quarter was given on either side, the Yorkists were completely victorious, and Warwick and his brother Montagu were slain. It is impossible to give any authentic statement of the numbers or the losses on either side.

Baroda Commission, THE (1875). The Gaekwar, Malhar Rao, was in this year accused of attempting to poison the resident, Colonel Phayre. He was tried by a mixed commission of three British and three natives. The commission failed to come to any satisfactory conclusion, as the British members considered the case proved, while the natives thought the charge had not been substantiated. Lord Northbrook, the governor-general, however, held the former opinion. The Gaekwar was therefore deposed by proclamation of the viceroy, and his brother's widow allowed to adopt an heir.

Baron. The history of the word "baron" is one of those cases in which a question hotly contested may be virtually settled by strict discrimination of the meaning of a name. The word, which originally meant "man" or "freeman," has now come to mean the simplest grade of the peerage. Between these points it passes through important variations of meaning. The word first occurs in England after the Norman Conquest. When William the Conqueror's "barons" are spoken of, it is quite clear that this means all who held lands directly of him. In this large body of chief tenants—some 1,400 in number, including ecclesiastics—there was naturally from the first a tendency to a practical division between the great lord, who had knights holding under him, and the simple knight who held but his own estate; and the title baro came to be reserved to the former. Much controversy has centred around the question whether there was a legal as well as a practical distinction between the baron and the knight—between tenure by barony and simple tenure by knight service. [Madox held that there was such a distinction, and he has been followed by some modern scholars. Notably, Dr. Rachel Reid has endeavoured to establish that the basis of the differentiation between the baro and the miles was the possession by the former of a "franchise"—i.e., of special rights of jurisdiction corresponding to "la haute justice" as exercised by the barons of Normandy.] However this may be, it is certain that under Henry I the practical distinction had already become accentuated, and it soon came to be the custom that the "baron of the king" should treat for payment of his relief and aids directly with the king, instead of paying through the sheriff; that on the rates becoming fixed his relief should be £100 (later 100 marks), while ordinary chief tenants paid at the rate of 100s. the fee; that he should lead his own tenants to the host, while the others served under the sheriff's banner; that he should be amerced by his equals in the king's court, not by the sheriff; and that he should be summoned proprio nomine by a special writ, and not, like the lesser tenants-in-chief, by a general writ to the sheriff for each shire. From the biography of Becket and the "Dialogus de Scaccario" (q.v.), we see that the last distinction was recognized and customary early in Henry II's reign. The barons had, in one sense, a qualification by tenure. They would all be holders of a barony; not (that is) of a definite number of knights' fees as has been sometimes erroneously stated (for some baronies consisted of no more than one or two such), but holders of some group of manors which had at the Conquest been endowed with such a special character, or had since come to be so regarded. In this sense the word is used in the Constitution of Clarendon, and as early as Henry I's charter. Later we get a further distinction drawn within the ranks of this "baronage" itself. The greater came to be distinguished from the lesser barones. The former, with the earls, could not well be left unsummoned to council or camp. But outside this inner necessary body the king had a wide circle of holders of baronies out of whom to select those whom he should by his writ call to special attendance in host or in council. And here a further exclusion went on. For throughout the reign of Henry III and Edward I special summonses to the host were sent to more than 100 barons; while to Edward I's parliaments the number so called was hardly half as great. Even so, many of those who were called were not holders of baronies, but of much smaller estates; many, too, were called only occasionally. Historians have seen here in operation Edward's steady design of "eliminating the doctrine of tenure from the region of government." The reluctance of all but the greatest lords to attend co-operated in this direction; and "Edward I is the creator of the House of Lords almost as truly as of the House of Commons," in the sense that to him, in the first instance, was due the smallness of its numbers, the selection (to a great extent) of its members, and the establishment of the principle that it is constituted by writ of summons, not by tenure. Nor would it be against the desires of the great barons themselves to see the substitution of summons for tenure as the qualification. For mere tenure-in-chief, if accepted, might have flooded the House with the lesser chief tenants, and have brought into it any mere purchaser of a baronial estate. During the same period the "lesser barons" gradually ceased to attend as barons, and merged into the mass of the county freeholders, whom they inspired with their high spirit and traditions of constitutional resistance, and to whom they acted as leaders in shiremoot and in national parliament. Under the policy of Edward I and the operation of his statute Quia Emptores, and with the introduction of the new idea—representation for all below baronial rank, whether chief tenants or not—tenure-in-chief lost its constitutional value, and the separation of chief tenants into barons and knights, or nobles and gentry, was finally accomplished. To complete this, it was only required that the right to receive the special summons should be regarded as hereditary. A further limitation in the sense of the word "baron" was effected when the Crown created barons by letters patent, first in 1387; but the instances are very rare till the close of Henry VII's reign. In these patents the right is limited, as a rule, to heirs male, while the older baronies, by writ of summons, could descend through females (so Sir John Oldecastle became Lord Cobham in right of his wife). The mere personal summons, not inheritable, continued under Lancastrian kings, but definitely ceased under the Tudors. The attempt to create a life peerage was disallowed as obsolete in the Wensleydale case, 1856 (q.v.). Since the Earl of Bristol's case in 1626 the receipt of such a writ is an inherited right which cannot be denied. Thus, out of the great mass of "barons" of the Conquest, the leading families were gradually selected (as it were) by the Crown. These families have long since disappeared; the Crown has supplied their place with a body many times as numerous; but this body has now a right with which the Crown can no longer interfere. When the kings of the fourteenth century introduced new grades (duke, marquis, viscount) besides the old baronial body of earls and barons proper, the word "baron" sank to its narrowest meaning—that which it now bears, a peer who sits by no higher title. The bishops, till the Reformation, sat both in their Old English character and in their new character as barons. But Henry VIII's new sees had no baronies attached. The number of abbots who sat had fallen from 100 or more in the thirteenth century to a fixed number of roughly 27 under Edward III. At the Reformation, when the abbots were excluded, the balance of numbers, for the first time, was left with the lay lords.

The political history of the baronage may be briefly summed up in three periods:—(1) The feudal baronage, whose policy was the weakening of the central power, and whose alliances and habits were those of Normans, was nearly eliminated by forfeiture before Magna Carta. The last great baron of this type may be found in Ranulf, Earl of Chester, who died in 1232. The dispersed character of their estates, the vigorous resistance of the Old English spirit, the strong arm of the Norman king, made this feudal class less formidable than it proved on the continent. (2) On its ruins had been rising the new families of the ministers rewarded by Henry I and Henry II, out of which was formed the national baronage, which took the lead in winning the charter, which defeated Henry III's plan of personal government, and which finally secured from Edward I the results of a struggle of a century. Their typical representative is Richard, earl marshal in Henry III's reign. (3) As the great fiefs began to fall in to the Crown, and as the constitutional leadership passed on to the knights, the baronage turns from national aims to dynastic partisanship, family aggrandizement, and the ostentation of chivalry. The people are still only too ready to believe in and to accept them as champions. But they become more and more a narrow class, bound up with one or other of the two royal houses; and they are left alone at last to fight out the Wars of the Roses by the aid of their own retainers, and to be almost exterminated in the struggle. Yet when they were gone, and the Church was powerless in its anti-national Romanism, the nation was helpless at the feet of the new despotism. For England still required its nobles, and in their worst phases they had played a necessary part on the political stage. Even the selfish factiousness of the fourteenth- and fifteenth-century nobility had been obliged to adopt national grievances for its faction cries; the traditions of noble leadership had been found still to have invaluable strength for the purposes of the Hundred Years' War; and for the rest, the nobles, busy with place-hunting and court intrigues, left space for the silent growth of literature, of commerce, and of municipal life.

The great barons may be roughly reckoned at 400 in Domesday, nearly half of whom held estates in two or more counties. The number of lesser barons was rather smaller. By the thirteenth century both classes have decreased in numbers, but the former have increased the average size of their estates. By the end of the next century the baronial body has sunk to something less than 100 families, still holding, however, a vast proportion of the land of England. Soon after, the two representative estates of clergy and the Commons had risen up to share with them the functions of legislation. The baronial body retained separate and independent privileges. They constituted a great part of the standing council, which took upon itself the administration when the king was a minor. They held with the king the supreme judicial power, both original and appellate. They could be judged only by their brother peers. Till nearly the Yorkist period they were called to give counsel and consent for legislation, while the Commons only had the right of petition. For general administration they were called to "treat and give counsel"; the Commons only "to execute and consent." [PEERAGE.]

Baronets were first created by James I in 1611, when, being in want of money for the support of the army in Ulster, he offered the title of baronet to all who would pay into the exchequer £1,095, in three annual payments, being the sum required for the pay of a hundred foot-soldiers for three years. In Ireland baronets were instituted in 1619, and in Scotland by Charles I in 1625, and called of Nova Scotia, because it was originally intended to establish them for the encouragement of the settling of Nova Scotia. The principle of this dignity was to give rank, precedence, and title without privilege. A baronet was to remain a commoner, but his title (unlike that of a knight) was to be hereditary. Since the time of Charles II it has been usual to remit the payment due to the Crown on creation of a baronetcy. It was intended that the number of baronets should be limited to 200, but this number was exceeded even before the death of James I.

Barons' War, THE. The first distinct appeal to arms of this war was made in 1263 by Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester. Five years before, the incurable misrule of Henry III had provoked the more public-spirited of his barons to place him under the control of a commission of reform, and then of a council; from this control he had now been for three years struggling to free himself, but with little success. The situation grew daily more distracted; England had two rival governments, the king and the baronial council, each claiming obedience, and forbidding what the other commanded. From time to time efforts had been made to arrange the points in dispute, but in vain. Of these points the principal were: the observance by the king of the Provisions of Oxford (q.v.), the right of holding the royal castles, the power of appointing and removing the state officials and counsellors, and the exclusion of all foreigners from places of trust and profit. Not one of these demands of the barons could Henry be brought loyally to concede. Accordingly, in June 1263, the smothered disgust of the barons burst into open war. But the campaign had barely begun when Henry's astute brother Richard, King of the Romans, interposed and patched up a kind of reconciliation. Some months of troubled peace followed, which both parties spent in diligent search after the means of getting a lasting peace. In December they agreed to submit their quarrel to Louis IX of France (St. Louis); and the chief men of both sides swore solemnly to abide by his decision, whatever it might be. At Amiens, in January 1264, St. Louis heard the case that the king in person and the barons laid before him, and gave judgment. This was in favour of the king on every one of the points specified above, though the "liberties, statutes, and laudable customs of the realm of England that were before the time of the Provisions" were left intact. [AMIENS, MISE OF.] Notwithstanding their oaths, the earl and his party easily found an excuse that satisfied their consciences for refusing to be bound by this decision. War was now entered upon in earnest; and in March the hostile armies were lying within a few miles of each other—the king's at Oxford, the earl's at Brackley. Here a last attempt at a pacification proved fruitless. Then the combatants parted, the king marching to take Northampton and Nottingham, the barons to add the array of the Londoners to their own, and to lay siege to Rochester. This operation brought on the battle that decided the campaign. For the king, alarmed for Rochester, hurried to its relief, and finding the siege raised on his arrival, went on to the reduction of the Cinque Ports. De Montfort cautiously followed, and on reaching Flething learned that the royal army was but ten miles off, in and around the town and Cluniac priory of Lewes. Thither, on May 14, he led his followers, full of religious enthusiasm and patriotic ardour, along the slopes of the bushless downs, and, almost with sunrise, burst in upon the half-prepared royalists. The fiery onset of Prince Edward routed and made havoc of the earl's left wing, where the Londoners fought, but only rendered the baronial victory more sure. Carried off the field by his fury, Edward left his father and uncle to be crushed by the right and centre of the attacking force. Next day the two kings, Edward himself, and his cousin Henry, were prisoners in the earl's hands. De Montfort was now master of king and kingdom. He strove hard to effect a settlement; called a parliament of the imperfect type then in use; drew up a new scheme of government; and was diligent in framing measures of reform. At the end of the year he took the step that has made him immortal: he summoned in Henry's name a national assembly that was the first to contain all the elements of a full parliament, duly chosen citizens and burgesses, as well as knights of the shire, barons, abbots, and bishops. This body began its sittings at London in January 1265; and did its best to strengthen the position of its creator. But this position was already undermined. The baronial party had split into sections, one of which, under Gilbert, Earl of Gloucester, openly thwarted Earl Simon's designs, and at last broke away from the old leader altogether. The end came swiftly on. While de Montfort was suppressing disturbances in South Wales, Edward escaped from his guards, gathered round him his father's friends and de Montfort's foes, and by rapid marches secured the line of the Severn. Early in August, however, the slow-moving earl had forced a passage across this barrier, and, with the king still in his possession, had reached Evesham, hoping to meet his son Simon, who was leading the levies of the south and east to join him. With this object, on August 4, 1265, he was starting from Evesham when he was caught by his active opponent, who had shortly before suddenly fallen upon and destroyed the younger Simon's force at Kenilworth. By wise and well-executed dispositions he now enclosed the old warrior on every side; and after a stubborn contest, the great earl and his bravest followers perished, fighting desperately. Yet the war lingered for two years longer. The harshness of the victors, who pronounced the lands of the rebels forfeit, drove the vanquished to despair. The siege of Kenilworth was prolonged till late in 1266; and at Axholme, in Lincolnshire, another obstinate band of outlaws held out stiffly against the assaults of Edward. At length Axholme was taken; and by this time experience had taught its captor moderation. In the Dictum of Kenilworth he offered milder terms to the defenders of the castle; and it surrendered at last (December 1266). In the meantime others of the "Disinherited" had seized Ely, and one more siege became necessary. This lasted till the summer of 1267, when Edward forced his way into the place, and thus ended the Barons' War. [MONTFORT, SIMON DE.]

Barrakpur, an important military station in Lower Bengal, fifteen miles from Calcutta, was the place where, during the First Burmese War (q.v.), the 47th Native Regiment, who were ordered for service, presented a memorial (October 1824), setting forth the extreme difficulty of procuring cattle, and begging to be relieved of the burden of providing means of conveyance. The sepoy were informed that they would receive no assistance. On November 1 the 47th broke out into open mutiny. The commander-in-chief ordered up several European regiments and a detachment of horse artillery, by whom the rebels were attacked on their continued refusal to obey. The ringleaders were subsequently tried by court-martial and executed. It was at Barrakpur that the first mutinous demonstrations took place during the Sepoy rebellion of 1857, when the native troops quartered at this place refused to bite the ends of their cartridges.

Barré, ISAAC (1726-1802), in 1746 entered the army, and served in Flanders and Canada. In 1759 he was present at the storming of the heights of Abraham. In 1761 Lord Shelburne gave him vacated seat for Chipping Wycombe to Barré. Five days after taking his seat, he made a most violent attack on Pitt. He strongly supported Bute's government in the debates on the Peace of Paris in 1762, and was rewarded for his services by being appointed adjutant-general to the British forces, and soon afterwards governor of Stirling Castle. But on the retirement of Lord Shelburne from the board of trade Barré voted in opposition to the Grenville ministry in reference to the prosecution of Wilkes for libel, and was summarily dismissed from his military appointments and reduced to half-pay in September 1763. He continued strenuously to oppose the ministry in their action with regard to Wilkes and general warrants. He spoke against the Stamp Act. He was a firm supporter of the policy of the Rockingham government, and on Pitt's taking office in 1766 he received a minor appointment. But in October 1768 he retired with Lord Shelburne, on account of differences with the Duke of Grafton, whom he forthwith attacked in parliament. During the long period of Lord North's administration Barré was out of office, and was especially active in advocating the cause of the revolted colonies in America, and the right of Wilkes to his seat. In the second Rockingham administration in 1782 Barré was appointed treasurer of the navy; but while Burke was proposing his economical reforms, and before the contemplated enactments could have come to his knowledge, Barré accepted an enormous pension of £3,200 a year, which, however, he was subsequently induced to resign in return for the clerkship of the Pells.

It has been attempted to identify Barré with the author of the "Letters of Junius" (q.v.); but the assertion rests on no sufficient evidence.

Barrier Treaty, THE (1715). The project of giving the States-General a "barrier" against France by means of a line of fortresses along the frontier had been raised in the Grand Alliance negotiations of 1701, and again in 1703, but was defeated by the hostility of Austria. In 1709, however, a treaty was concluded between Great Britain and Holland, by which the former bound herself to obtain for the Dutch the right of supplying garrisons for the Flemish fortresses, including Ypres, Menin, Lille, Tournai, Condé, Valenciennes, Charleroi, Namur, Damme, and Dendermonde. The treaty was signed by Townshend on the part of Great Britain, as Marlborough refused to be a party to it. The arrangements were revised and considerably altered, much to the disadvantage of the Dutch, by a second agreement which was come to in 1713, in which the number of barrier fortresses was greatly curtailed. The treaty was, however, not definitely signed till November 15, 1715. The chief provisions were that the Low Countries were guaranteed to the house of Austria, and were not to be alienated on any conditions whatsoever. The Dutch were to garrison Namur, Tournai, Menin, Furnes, Warneton, Ypres, and Knoeke; and Dendermonde was to be garrisoned jointly by Dutch and Austrian troops. The Dutch were very dissatisfied at this curtailment in the number of towns ceded to them, and still more so at the commercial stipulations by which Great Britain was put on the same footing with Holland, as regards the commerce of the Belgian towns. But the treaty was altogether a disturbing element in European politics, and an especial source of friction in the relations of Great Britain and Austria. It was one of the causes of the alienation of those countries previous to the beginning of the Seven Years' War. The Barrier Treaty was annulled by the Treaty of Fontainebleau, 1785. [UTRECHT, PEACE OF.]

Barrosa, THE BATTLE OF (March 5, 1811), was fought between the British and Spaniards, and the French, during the Peninsular War. General Graham, who had been blockaded through the winter in Cadiz, resolved to rid himself of Victor's besieging force. To effect this purpose he embarked 12,000 men, who landed at Tarifa, in the rear of the French. But Graham gave up the chief command to La Peña, the Spanish general, who systematically neglected his advice. The low ridge of Barrosa was the key both to offensive and defensive movements, and Graham was very anxious to hold it; but La Peña ordered him to march through a thick wood to Bermeja, and left the heights of Barrosa ill-defended. Victor no sooner saw Graham's corps enter the wood than he attacked and took Barrosa, cutting off a Spanish division. Graham at once faced about, and resolved to attack, although the key of the field of battle was already in the enemy's possession. He accordingly dispatched one body of troops to attack Laval, who was on the flank, while Brown and Dilke attacked the heights. Victor was soon in full retreat, and the British, having been twenty-four hours under arms without food, were too exhausted to pursue. In the meantime La Peña looked idly on, so that the remains of the French army were allowed to escape.

Barrowists, THE, who derived their name from one of their leaders, Henry Barrow, a lawyer, were a sect of Separatists in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, closely allied in their doctrines with the Brownists (q.v.). Henry Barrow was examined before the Court of High Commission in 1587, for his "schismatical and seditious opinions," and imprisoned, but continued to issue inflammatory pamphlets urging the abolition of episcopacy; he was found guilty of "writing and publishing sundry seditious books and pamphlets tending to the slander of the queen and government," and was executed at Tyburn, April 6, 1593. The Barrowists shared the aversion of the Brownists to legal ministry; and were deemed still more proper subjects for persecution. They refused to hold any communication with the Church on the grounds: first, that the worship of the English Church was idolatrous; second, that unsanctified persons were admitted into the Church; third, that the preachers of the Church of England had no lawful calling; and fourth, that the government was ungodly. For these views many of them were imprisoned, and in 1593, on the passing of the act making a monthly attendance at church compulsory, a great number of the sect went with the Brownists to Holland, and subsequently found a new home in America.

Barton, ANDREW (d. 1511), was a contemporary of Sir Andrew Wood, and one of Scotland's first great naval commanders. In 1497 he was in command of the escort which accompanied Perkin Warbeck when he left Scotland. In 1511, after doing considerable damage to the English shipping, he was killed in an engagement with two ships that had been expressly fitted out against him, and had fallen in with him in the Downs. His death was one of the grievances which led to the invasion of England by James IV, and the battle of Flodden Field.

Barton, ELIZABETH (d. 1534), better known as the Nun, or Holy Maid, of Kent, was the servant of Thomas Cobb, of Aldington in Kent. The awe excited by the moral tone of some of her ravings when under the influence of epilepsy suggested to her master and others the possibility of making her a means of fanning the growing discontent against the king. She was accordingly taught to counterfeit a state of trance, and then to give utterance to prophecies respecting matters declared to be revealed to her by the Holy Ghost. As her words were all in support of the clerical party and against the king's recent legislation, she was regarded with great favour by the clergy generally; she corresponded with Queen Katharine and Charles V, and became in a short time a dangerous power in England. When, however, she boldly declared, among other things, that if Henry divorced Katharine, and married again during her lifetime, he should not be a king a month longer, but die a villain's death, it was thought high time to take particular notice of her madness, and by the king's orders she and her more prominent accomplices were arrested. Having confessed their imposture upon examination in the Star Chamber, Elizabeth Barton and her fellow-conspirators were ordered to read their confession on the next Sunday at Paul's Cross, immediately after the sermon. The whole matter of the imposture was then brought formally before the parliament, and Barton and six others were attainted of high treason, and executed April 20, 1534.

"Basilikon Doron" (The Royal Gift) is the title of a work written by King James I some time before 1598, and addressed to his eldest son, Prince Henry. In this work he maintains that the kingly office is ecclesiastical as well as civil, and therefore the king is necessarily head of the Church; and that equality among ministers is inconsistent with monarchy. The tract advocates the establishment of episcopacy, and the banishment of the principal Presbyterian ministers in the country.

Basing House, the seat of the Marquis of Winchester, was one of the Royalist strongholds in the Civil Wars. Standing as it did a short distance from Basingstoke, it commanded one of the principal roads to the west. It was several times attacked by the Parliamentary forces without success. Finally, after a long and brilliant defence, it was taken by Cromwell, October 1645, and burnt to the ground. "The jubilant Royalists had given it the name of Basting House," on account of the difficulty experienced by their opponents before it.

Bass Rock, THE FORTRESS OF, in the Firth of Forth, was held by some of its Jacobite prisoners, who overpowered their guard, for James II from 1691 to 1694, when the little garrison, numbering about twenty men, capitulated on honourable terms.

Bassein, THE TREATY OF (December 31, 1802), was concluded between the British and Baji Rao, the Peshwa. Its stipulations were that a British force should be stationed within the Peshwa's dominions; that districts in the Deccan were to be assigned for their support; that the Peshwa should entertain no Europeans in his service belonging to any nation at war with the British; that he should engage in no hostilities or negotiations without their concurrence, and should refer all his territorial claims to the arbitration of the governor-general. Basset, SIR PHILIP (d. 1271), was a member of the great judicial family which furnished so many judges and ministers to the Angevin kings. In 1233 he joined in the revolt of Richard Marshall, but quickly returned to his allegiance, and was one of Henry's staunchest supporters against the barons. In 1261 he was appointed justiciar of England, seemingly acting at first in conjunction with Hugh le Despenser, and held the office till 1263. He fought most bravely in the battle of Lewes, but was eventually taken prisoner. The king's victory at Evesham released him, but he was not restored to his office, though constantly employed in the royal service till his death.

Bastwick, JOHN (1593-1654), a physician, published in a work entitled "Flagellum Pontificis" (1634) attacks which he declared to be directed solely against the pope and the Roman Catholic clergy, but which were considered by the English bishops to reflect on themselves. For this he was condemned by the High Commission court to fine and imprisonment. While in prison he wrote two other works, "Apologeticus ad Prasules Anglicanos" (1636) and "The New Litany" (1637), in which he accused the bishops of an inclination to popery. For this he was sentenced, in 1637, to a fine of £5,000, the loss of his ears, the pillory, and perpetual imprisonment. In 1640 he was released by the Long Parliament, the proceedings against him were cancelled, and £5,000 was given him in reparation. Clarendon speaks of him as "a half-witted, crack-brained fellow, unknown to either university or the College of Physicians, but one that had spent his time abroad between the schools and the camp, and had gotten a doctorship and Latin."

Basutoland, the north-eastern province of Cape Colony, with which it was incorporated in 1871, was annexed by Great Britain in 1868. It was placed under the government of Cape Colony, and its local affairs were administered by an agent appointed by the governor at Cape Town and by five magistrates, each presiding over a special district. But the government of the colony found itself constantly in difficulty with the native tribes; negotiations were entered into with the home government, and the country is now under the control of the colonial office, which administers it as a native territory, with a resident commissioner under the high commissioner for South Africa, who legislates for the territory by proclamation. There is a system of tribal justice for native cases and magistrates' courts for cases between Europeans and natives. [SOUTH AFRICA, UNION OF.]

Batavia, THE CAPTURE OF (1811), is chiefly interesting as being the conquest of the last surviving French settlement in the East. In the year 1810 the island of Java had come into the possession of France by the incorporation of the kingdom of Holland with the French empire; and the Indian government was bent upon its reduction. In March 1811 10,500 men were sent out under Sir S. Auchmuty (q.v.), and early in August landed about twelve miles to the east of the town of Batavia. The united French and Dutch troops abandoned Batavia, and took up a position in a very strong camp called Fort Cornelius. On August 8 the outposts were driven in, and the advanced works were occupied by the British. At length it was decided to make a desperate attack on the main fort, as the lateness of the season necessitated speedy action. The attack was delivered from three sides at daybreak on the morning of the 26th and was completely successful, at a loss of 872 men killed and wounded. The few troops who escaped from the fort, after resisting for a few days, came in; and with them the whole island was surrendered to the British, to be, however, at the close of the war restored to the Dutch.

Bate's Case (1606). The Levant Company, which had been granted by Elizabeth a monopoly of the trade with Turkey and Venice, had allowed non-members to import currants on payment of 5s. 6d. per cwt. Upon the dissolution of the company in 1603, the government continued the imposition. In 1606 a merchant, John Bate, refused to pay, on the ground that the imposition was illegal, and the case was brought before the Court of Exchequer, which gave judgment for the Crown. It was laid down from the bench that the royal power was double—ordinary, unchangeable without authority of parliament, and absolute, varying according to the king's wisdom; under the absolute power came all matters of commerce, including customs. Relying upon this decision, Cecil published, in 1608, a "Book of Rates" imposing fresh duties on many articles. In 1610 the Commons declared that impositions without consent of parliament were unconstitutional, and petitioned for their removal; their point was not carried, and for the next thirty years the question constantly recurred in the struggle between parliament and the Crown.

Bath, THE ORDER OF THE, was established by George I in 1725 to consist of the sovereign, a grand master, and thirty-six knights companions. George has often been represented as reviving an ancient order, founded by Henry IV at his coronation in 1399. Actually no order of knights of the Bath existed before the eighteenth century. The full solemnities for conferring knighthood fell early into desuetude in England, and were at length restricted to such knights as were made at coronations or on similar occasions of state. To this class the particular name of knights of the Bath was applied; those who merely received the accolade in the ordinary course being distinguished as knights of the Sword. It is usually supposed that the first creation of knights of the Bath under that designation was in 1399; and before the order of the Bath was instituted as a capital body the last creation of them was at the coronation of Charles II. The order as constituted by George I was remodelled by the Prince Regent in 1815, and at present consists of three classes: Knights Grand Cross, or G.C.B.s; Knights Commanders, or K.C.B.s; and Companions, or C.B.s.

Bath, WILLIAM PULTENEY, EARL OF (1682-1764). [PULTENEY.]

Bathurst, ALLEN, 1ST EARL (1684-1775), entered Trinity College, Oxford, in 1699. He was returned for the borough of Cirencester in 1705, and was created a baron in 1712. In 1723, at the attainder of Atterbury, he bitterly taunted the bishops for their animosity against their brother. As a Tory politician, he supported the claim of Bolingbroke to be restored to his seat in the House of Lords. During Walpole's administration he was an active member of the opposition. From 1757 to 1760 he was treasurer to George, Prince of Wales, and in 1772 was created Earl Bathurst. A somewhat acrimonious politician, his speeches were marked by caustic wit and brilliancy of metaphor.

Bathurst, HENRY, 2ND EARL (1714-94), the son of Allen, 1st earl, entered parliament for Cirencester in 1735. He was a steady opponent of Sir Robert Walpole, and in 1747 was made attorney-general to the Prince of Wales by the Leicester House party. On the death of the prince, he took steps to conciliate the court, and was rewarded in 1754 by being appointed a judge of the Common Pleas. On the death of Charles Yorke in 1770, he was appointed one of the three commissioners to hold the great seal. "No one of the three," says Lord Campbell, "had any confidence in himself or in his colleagues. And after the learned trio had gone on for a twelve-month floundering and blundering, the public dissatisfaction was so loud that some change was considered necessary." The change made was the appointment of Lord Bathurst to the woolsack, 1771. Left to himself, he fared better than he had done with his two colleagues, and relied with such modesty on the help of better men that he made few mistakes. In 1778 he resigned the great seal into the hands of Lord Thurlow, and became president of the council, which office he held till Lord North's resignation. His last years he spent in retirement in the country. He has been justly called "one of the weakest, though one of the worthiest of our chancellors."

Bathurst, HENRY, 3RD EARL (1762-1834), was the son of the 2nd Earl Bathurst. In 1804 he was appointed master worker of the mint. In 1807 he became president of the board of trade. In 1809 he was secretary of state for foreign affairs, which post he held only from October 11 to December 6. On June 11, 1812, he was appointed colonial secretary, and discharged the duties of the office for nearly sixteen years. In 1828 he was appointed president of the council, a position he retained till the resignation of the Wellington administration in 1830.

Bats, THE PARLIAMENT OF (1426), was the name given to the parliament which assembled in this year when the quarrel between the Duke of Gloucester and Cardinal Beaufort was at its height. It received its name from the bats or bludgeons carried by the partisans of the rival statesmen.

Battle Abbey was founded by William the Conqueror on the site of the battle of Hastings, the high altar standing, it is said, on the very spot where Harold planted his banner. It was not consecrated till 1095. The abbey, which was dedicated to St. Martin, and filled with Benedictine monks from Marmoutier in Touraine, was richly endowed by the Conqueror, and enjoyed many privileges, including that of sanctuary. The abbot was mitred and was a lord of parliament. At the dissolution of the monasteries in Henry VIII's reign, the income of the abbey was estimated at £880 14s. 7½d. The buildings of the abbey, which are mostly in ruins, and have been partly converted into a dwelling-house, show that the structure must anciently have been of great extent and magnificence. The ROLL OF BATTLE ABBEY, which was lodged in the keeping of the abbot, contained a list of all those who fought on the Norman side in the battle of Hastings. The catalogue was, however, much tampered with by the monks in later times and is of comparatively little value as an authority. It has been called "that most famous of genealogical frauds." A remnant of the exceptional position of Battle Abbey is to be found in the fact that the incumbent of the parish is still included among the Deans of Peculiars, though he does not appear to have any special duties.

Baxar, THE BATTLE OF (October 23, 1764), was fought between the British, commanded by Major Munro, and the army of the Vizir of Oudh. The latter was completely routed, and obliged to abandon his camp, with all its stores and 130 pieces of cannon. This victory was scarcely less important than that of Plassey. It demolished the power of the Vizir Shuja-ud-Dowlah, the only chief of importance in the north, and made the British masters of the valley of the Ganges.

Baxter, RICHARD (1615-91), a celebrated Nonconformist divine, was in earlier life a clergyman of the Church of England, and in 1640 was presented to the living of Kidderminster. During the Civil War he was chaplain to Whalley's regiment, and in this capacity was present at the sieges of Bridgwater, Exeter, Bristol, and Worcester. He was a very moderate supporter of the Presbyterian church polity, and in temporal matters an adherent of limited monarchy; so that he was a strong opponent of Cromwell during the later years of the Protector's life. At the Restoration Baxter was appointed one of the royal chaplains, and took a leading part in the Savoy conference (q.v.). He was even offered the bishopric of Hereford, which he refused. In 1662, however, on the passing of the Act of Uniformity, Baxter quitted the Church and remained for some years in retirement. In 1672 he settled in London, and lectured at several dissenting places of worship. Subsequently, however, he was much harassed by legal proceedings under the Conventicle Act, and in 1685 was brought before Jeffreys, who, treating him with his usual brutality, sentenced him to eighteen months' imprisonment, and fined him 500 marks. Baxter was an extraordinarily prolific writer of polemics and works on divinity, and is said to have composed over 160 treatises. Some of them, e.g., "The Saints' Everlasting Rest" and "Reasons for the Christian Religion," are still widely popular.

Bayeux Tapestry, THE, has been ascribed to Matilda, wife of William the Conqueror, but was more probably executed for Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, as a decoration for his cathedral church. Some authorities have thought it to be the work of English embroiderers, but this is doubtful. It is more likely to have been designed by some artist familiar with the events, and executed by local workpeople in or around Bayeux. It is a long narrow strip of needlework representing, in a number of pictures worked in woollen thread, the battle of Hastings and the events which led to it. It is twenty inches wide and two hundred and thirty-one feet long; and is divided into seventy-two compartments, with Latin superscriptions indicating the objects represented. The tapestry is an authority of the utmost value for the period with which it deals. It is to be seen at the present day in the library museum at Bayeux.

The Bayeux Tapestry has been reproduced in colour by Stothard, 1818, and in photographs by J. Comte, 4to, 1879. It has also been engraved by the Antiquarian Society, with elucidations by G. C. Bruce, 1855. The character, origin, etc., of the Tapestry are discussed in Freeman, "Norman Conquest," iii, 563 seq.; Fowke, "Bayeux Tapestry," 1898. See also Birrell, "Guide to the Bayeux Tapestry," 1921, and H. Belloc, "The Book of the Bayeux Tapestry," 1914.

Beachy Head, THE BATTLE OF (June 30, 1690), fought between the English and Dutch on the one side and the French on the other, terminated in a victory for the latter. Lord Torrington, who commanded the combined English and Dutch fleet, had abandoned the Isle of Wight to the French, under Tourville, and retreated up the Channel, when peremptory orders from the privy council to engage the enemy were sent him. Accordingly, when the enemy were sighted, he bore down upon them, placing the Dutch ships in the van. He had fewer than 60 sail of the line, and the French had 80. But his ships were superior in equipment and crews to those of the enemy. The Dutch, under Evertsen, fought bravely for several hours, receiving very little assistance from the rest of the fleet, and they finally drew off in a shattered condition. Torrington thereupon sought refuge in the Thames. His conduct and motives on this occasion were loudly condemned, and the action was looked upon as a highly disgraceful one for England. The only use Tourville made of his victory was to burn Teignmouth. [HERBERT, ARTHUR, EARL OF TORRINGTON.]

Beacons, or signal-fires lighted on the coast and in conspicuous positions inland, to give notice of the approach of an enemy or of other danger, have been used from an early period in England. According to Stow, beacons were set up by Edward II when the landing of Mortimer and Queen Isabella was expected. They were regularly used at stated places along the line of the Borders, to give warning of raids of the Scots. Lambard mentions an ordinance of c. 11 Ed. III, relating to beacons. Inland beacons were erected by the sheriffs at the expense of the county; beacons on the coast were originally under the superintendence of the lord high admiral, and subsequently, by 8 Eliz., c. 13, transferred to the corporation of Trinity House.

Beaconsfield, BENJAMIN DISRAELI, EARL OF (1804-81). [DISRAELI.]

Beadle, or BEDELL (Old Eng. bydel, from Anglo-Saxon, beodan, to bid), properly means the apparitor of a court who summoned persons to appear in answer to charges brought against them. Bedells seem before the Conquest to have occupied a position on the jurisdictions of the liberties, and lands held in sac and soc, corresponding to that of under-bailiff. The estate of Leominster had, according to Domesday Book, eight prepositi, or reeves, and eight bedelli. Their privileges were, to have a little land of their own, and to be exempt from manual labour. The king's bedells were personages of considerable importance, and are mentioned in the lists of tenants-in-chief in Bedfordshire. After the Conquest the office sank in importance, and the bedells appear as criers in the manor courts, and in Shakespeare's time as petty village functionaries; in the forest courts they made proclamations and executed processes; while rural deans employed bedells to cite clergy to visitations, whence came the present parochial beaules. At Oxford University there is one esquire bedell and there are also three yeomen bedells, attached to the faculties of law, medicine, and arts respectively; they are elected in convocation, and can be forced, if necessary, to resign at the end of the year. Their duty consists chiefly in bearing the maces before the chancellor and vice-chancellor. At Cambridge, where there are three esquire bedells and one yeoman bedell, they are supposed to attend professors as well.

Beaton, DAVID, CARDINAL (1494-1546), the son of John Beaton of Balfour, was educated at the University of Paris, where he became intimate with the Duke of Albany, and in 1519 was appointed ambassador from Scotland to the French court. He was employed in various negotiations at Paris and Rome, in which he acquitted himself so well that he was made a cardinal by Paul III in 1538. On the death of his uncle, Archbishop James Beaton (q.v.), in 1539, he succeeded him as archbishop of St. Andrews, in which capacity he showed much zeal in the persecution of the Protestants. Three years later, on the death of James V, he endeavoured to get possession of the infant Queen of Scots, and to obtain the regency by means of a forged will, but failed, and was for a time imprisoned. On his release he became chancellor of Scotland in 1543, and distinguished himself by his zeal in bringing to the stake those Protestants on whom he could lay hands. His cruelty towards the members of the reformed party, together with his French and Italian sympathies, caused the cardinal to be bitterly hated by the reformers. A plot (to which Henry VIII and the English privy council were probably parties) was concocted for his assassination. On May 29, 1546, his castle of St. Andrews was seized by Norman Leslie, the Master of Rothes, with Kirkaldy of Grange, and others, and he was murdered.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Beaton, JAMES (d. 1539), was made high treasurer of Scotland, 1505; in 1509 he was appointed to the archbishopric of Glasgow, and in 1522 was translated to St. Andrews. He took part in the fray of "Cleanse the Causeway" (1520—q.v.) between the Douglas and Hamilton factions, and subsequently became an object of intense interest to English politicians, who sought to win him over to an English alliance. He is said to have been "very crafty and subtle," and he certainly managed to evade Wolsey's elaborate plans for getting possession of his person. At last, in a rash moment, the archbishop quitted the castle of St. Andrews, and was seized and imprisoned for a short time. He finally became an ally of England and a great friend of Wolsey. As chancellor of Scotland, he granted Queen Margaret a divorce from her husband, the Earl of Angus, though she found it necessary to obtain a papal dispensation as well.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Beaton, JAMES (1517–1603), a nephew of Cardinal Beaton, obtained the archbishopric of Glasgow, 1552. He was secretary to Mary, Queen of Scots, in whose behalf he pressed on an alliance with Spain, 1565. In later years he became Mary's ambassador in France, where he unsuccessfully attempted to obtain aid for her.

Beatty, DAVID, 1ST EARL (b. 1871), served in the Sudan from 1896 to 1898, and in China, 1900. For some time he was secretary to Mr. Winston Churchill at the admiralty, and in 1913 he was appointed to the command of a battle-cruiser squadron. In the Great War he served with distinction, raiding the Heligoland Bight (q.v.) in August 1914, and taking a prominent part in the battle of Jutland (q.v.). In December 1916 he took command of the Grand Fleet. In 1919 he became first sea lord (a post which he held until 1927) and was raised to the peerage. He was British delegate at the Washington Conference on limitation of armaments in 1921.

Beauchamp, THE FAMILY OF, was founded in England at the Norman Conquest by Hugh de Bello Campo. The earldom of Warwick was conveyed to the family by Isabella, sister and heiress of William de Mauduit. She married William de Beauchamp, lord of Emley (d. 1268), the seventh representative of the family from Hugh. Their son William was 1st Earl of Warwick of the Beauchamp line. The present Earl Beauchamp is descended from the second son of William de Beauchamp, lord of Emley, in the female line. The peerage was created in 1815.

Beauchamp, GUY DE, EARL OF WARWICK (d. 1315), distinguished himself in the Scottish wars of Edward I. In the next reign he was prominent in opposition to Gaveston, and was one of the ordainers appointed in 1310. In 1312 he seized Gaveston, who had given him mortal insult by nicknaming him "The Black Dog of Arden," as he was being conducted to London by Pembroke, and surrendered him to Lancaster, by whom he was beheaded without trial. Warwick died shortly afterwards—according to one account, by poison.

Beauchamp, RICHARD DE, EARL OF WARWICK (1382–1439), son of Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, fought on the Royalist side in the battle of Shrewsbury (1403), and distinguished himself in the Welsh wars against Owen Glendower. He enjoyed the close confidence of Henry V, by whom he was given high military command in France and entrusted with important diplomatic missions. He was appointed governor of Henry VI during his childhood, and held the office of regent of France from 1437 to 1439. He was famous in an age of chivalry as a brave and chivalrous warrior.

Beauchamp, THOMAS, EARL OF WARWICK (d. 1401), was appointed governor to Richard II during his minority. In 1387 he joined Gloucester, and was one of the lords who appealed de Vere, and the other royal ministers, of treason in the parliament of 1388. With the other lords appellant he retained power until Richard's coup d'état of 1389, when he retired to his estates. In 1397 he was accused with Arundel of conspiring with Gloucester against the king. But since he confessed his guilt and made full submission, he was sentenced only to forfeiture and life-long imprisonment and was confined in the Isle of Man. On the deposition of Richard II he was released.

Beaufort, THE FAMILY OF, was descended from John of Gaunt and Catherine, widow of Sir Hugh Swynford. He married her in 1396, but all their children were born before this marriage. These children were four in number: John, created Earl of Somerset and Marquis of Dorset; Henry, afterwards Bishop of Winchester and cardinal; Thomas, chancellor and Duke of Exeter; and Joan, married to Ralph Neville, Earl of Westmorland. The name of Beaufort which they bore was derived from a castle belonging to the Duke of Lancaster in Anjou. They were all legitimated by a statute passed in 1397, by royal letters patent and a papal decree. The letters patent were confirmed by Henry IV, who, however, introduced a restrictive clause "excepta dignitate regali," which now appears as an interlineation in the patent roll of 20 Richard II. From John Beaufort, Earl of Somerset, was descended Margaret, the mother of Henry VII, and thus arose the Tudor claim to the throne. [TUDOR.] Charles Somerset, the illegitimate son of Henry, 3rd Duke of Somerset, was created Earl of Worcester by Henry VIII. The 5th earl, a distinguished partisan of Charles I, was created Marquis of Worcester in 1642. His grandson, the 3rd marquis, was created Duke of Beaufort in 1682.

Beaufort, EDMUND, 2ND DUKE OF SOMERSET (d. 1455), was the younger son of John, Earl of Somerset, and grandson of John of Gaunt. He fought in the French wars, gaining his first command in 1431. In 1442 he obtained the earldom of Dorset, and was later raised to the rank of marquis. In 1447 he was made lieutenant of France, but acted very feebly in this capacity. Under his rule the whole of Normandy was lost. He returned to England in 1450, and was at once made high constable, and succeeded Suffolk as chief minister and opponent of the Duke of York. In 1452 the Duke of York brought forward a series of charges against Somerset, accusing him of the loss of Normandy, of embezzlement of public money, and other offences. Things seemed on the verge of civil war when a compromise was effected, and for a time the charges against Somerset were dropped. At the end of 1453 the Duke of Norfolk made a fresh attack upon him, and he was arrested and imprisoned. He remained in prison for more than a year, during which the Yorkists were in the ascendant, but in the beginning of 1455 he was released and restored to office. York protested against this, and raised an army, with which he marched towards London; he was met by the royalists at St. Albans, where he was completely victorious, and Somerset was among those who were slain.

Beaufort, EDMUND, DUKE OF SOMERSET (d. 1471), was the son of Edmund Beaufort, 2nd Duke of Somerset, and brother of Henry, the 3rd duke. On the restoration of Henry VI (1470-1) he was restored to the dukedom lost on his brother's attainder in 1464, and commanded the archers at the battle of Barnet. He subsequently fought at Tewkesbury, where he was taken prisoner and beheaded. With him expired the male line of the Beauforts.

R. B. Mowat, "Wars of the Roses," 1914.

Beaufort, HENRY, 3RD DUKE OF SOMERSET (d. 1464), fought in the French wars, and on the Lancastrian side in the Wars of the Roses. After the defeat of Towton (1461) he was attainted, but escaped to Scotland, and was subsequently pardoned by Edward IV. But having once more joined the Lancastrians, he was taken prisoner in the battle of Hexham and beheaded.

Beaufort, HENRY, CARDINAL (d. 1447), was the natural son of John of Gaunt by Catherine Swynford. In 1398 he was made

Bishop of Lincoln, and in 1405 translated to Winchester. In 1403 he was appointed chancellor, but resigned the great seal on his appointment to Winchester. During the latter part of Henry IV's reign Beaufort sided with the Prince of Wales, and was accused, apparently not altogether without reason, of urging him to compel his father to abdicate in his favour. On Henry V's accession he once more received the great seal, which he retained till 1417, when he proceeded to Constance to attend the council which was endeavouring to heal the great schism in the Church. Beaufort exerted his influence to induce the council to elect a pope before proceeding with the reformation of the Church. In gratitude for his assistance, the new pope, Martin V, offered him a cardinal's hat, which, however, the king refused to allow him to accept. On the accession of Henry VI, Beaufort was appointed one of the members of the council of regency, and, in 1424, was for the third time invested with the office of chancellor, which he held till 1426. Throughout the whole of Henry VI's minority Beaufort's great aim was to counteract the dangerous influence of Gloucester, whose selfish schemes both at home and abroad threatened the greatest danger to the state. The first great quarrel between the rivals took place in 1425, when riots occurred in London, and things were such a serious aspect that Bedford had to return from France and effect a reconciliation. In 1426 Beaufort committed the great mistake of his life in accepting the cardinal's hat; it laid him open to suspicion, and caused him to be regarded with distrust by many who had previously sided with him. In 1427 he led a futile crusade against the Hussites in Bohemia, and in 1429 he preached a crusade with the same object in England, got together troops, but took them to the assistance of the English in France instead of to Bohemia. From 1430 to 1434 Beaufort was for the most part abroad, and the next six years of his life were chiefly occupied in labouring for peace with France, Gloucester being the leader of the war party. One result of his efforts was the assembly of the Congress of Arras (q.v.), which, however, failed to effect anything. In 1440 he attempted to accomplish the same object by the release of the Duke of Orleans, who had been a prisoner since the battle of Agincourt, on the understanding that he should do his best to bring about a treaty. This was one of Beaufort's last public acts; he gradually retired from political life, and employed his last years in the affairs of his diocese. In 1444 he had the satisfaction of seeing a truce made between England and France, and thus his policy seemed at last successful. [In point of fact, the marriage of Henry VI to Margaret of Anjou, which was carried out under the terms of the truce, did much to precipitate the outbreak of the Wars of the Roses, and thereby to bring about the downfall of the Lancastrians.] He died peacefully very shortly after his great rival, Gloucester, and the legends which make him the murderer of the "Good Duke Humphrey," and paint the agonies of his death-bed, are unsubstantiated by the smallest particle of evidence. He had been for many years, certainly since the death of Bedford, the mainstay of the house of Lancaster.

Beaufort, MARGARET (1443-1509), was the daughter of John Beaufort, Duke of Somerset, and great-granddaughter of John of Gaunt by Catherine Swynford. She was left, on the death of her father, in the guardianship of William de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, who tried, when she was nine years old, to marry her to his son John. Suffolk, however, was soon afterwards attainted and murdered at sea, and Margaret was married instead, in 1454 or 1455, to Edmund Tudor, Earl of Richmond, eldest son of Sir Owen Tudor, a Welsh knight, by Katherine of France, widow of King Henry V. Her husband died in 1456, before her son Henry, afterwards Henry VII, was born; and she then, in 1459, married Lord Henry Stafford, a younger son of the Duke of Buckingham. In 1482 Margaret was once more a widow, and shortly afterwards she married for the third and last time, her husband being Thomas, Lord Stanley, afterwards Earl of Derby. By the Yorkist princes Margaret Beaufort appears to have been treated with an unusual degree of leniency, considering the prominent position she occupied among the Lancastrians in virtue of her son. Her wealth, which was great, was simply transferred, by Richard III, from her own direction to that of her husband, Lord Stanley, whose control over its disposal appears to have been merely nominal. She was the foundress of Christ's College and St. John's College, Cambridge, and gave many other benefactions to the two universities, and to many religious houses. The Lady Margaret translated into English several French works of devotion, including "The Mirroure of Golde for the Synfull Soule," which was printed for her by Wynkyn de Worde; and part of the "Imitatio Christi," attributed to John Gerson.

Beaufort, THOMAS, DUKE OF EXETER (d. 1427), was the third son of John of Gaunt and Catherine Swynford. He was appointed admiral of the northern and western seas in 1408-9, and in 1410 succeeded Arundel as chancellor. He held the great seal for two years, being the only lay chancellor of the reign; and on his resignation, was created Earl of Dorset. He was one of the commanders in the French wars of Henry V's and Henry VI's reigns, and in 1416 was made Duke of Exeter.

He was taken prisoner in the battle of Beaugé in 1421, but was released soon after, and was one of the council during the minority of Henry VI. He married Margaret, daughter of Sir T. Neville, but left no issue.

Beaugé, THE BATTLE OF (1421), was fought between the English, under the Duke of Clarence, brother of Henry V, and a combined force of French and Scots, under the dauphin and the Earl of Buchan. The English were completely routed, and Clarence was slain. The effect of this battle in strengthening the dauphin's party in France was very great, and Henry had to undertake another expedition to France to restore the prestige of the English.

Beaulieu Abbey, a famous abbey and sanctuary in Hampshire, was founded by King John for Cistercian monks in 1204. There Anne Neville, widow of the King-maker, took refuge after her husband's defeat and death at Barnet in 1471; and to Beaulieu it was that Perkin Warbeck fled in 1497, after the failure of his attempts to seize the crown.

Beaumont, THE FAMILIES OF. (1) Robert de Bellomonte, or Beaumont, who was allied paternally to the ducal house of Normandy, inherited the county of Meulan from his mother, and, following the Conqueror into England, obtained there large grants of land in the midlands. It is stated by Ordericus Vitalis that, in reward for the support he gave to Henry I, he received the earldom of Leicester; but evidence is inconclusive. His eldest son Waleran succeeded to the county of Meulan; his second son Robert to the English estates, with the title of Earl of Leicester. On the death of the 3rd earl, Robert, without issue, 1204, the earldom expired. Simon de Montfort, afterwards leader of the crusade against the Albigenses, having married Amicia, eldest sister of the last earl, received a grant of the earldom from John. This connexion with England was, however, purely nominal, and it remained for his youngest son, Simon de Montfort (q.v.), to enter into effective possession of the earldom. (2) Henry de Beaumont (q.v.), grandson of John de Brienne, King of Jerusalem, was summoned to parliament in 1309 as a baron. His descendant, John Beaumont, 6th baron, was created viscount in 1440, being the first of that dignity in England. His son, a partisan of the house of Lancaster, was attainted in 1461, and his estates conferred on Lord Hastings. In 1485 he was restored in blood and honour, but on his death without male heirs the viscounty became extinct. In 1840 the abeyance of the barony was terminated in favour of Miles Stapleton, a descendant of the last viscount's sister.

Beaumont, HENRY DE (d. 1340), son of Louis de Brienne, and grandson of John de Brienne, King of Jerusalem, was employed by Edward I in Scotland, and became one of Edward II's favourite advisers. In 1311 the Ordainers demanded his banishment, but this does not seem to have been carried out, as we find him subsequently enjoying the royal favour. He deserted Edward in 1326, and joined Isabella and Mortimer, who confirmed him in his possessions, and gave him some of the confiscated lands of the Despensers. In right of his wife he claimed the Scottish earldom of Buchan, and participated as one of the "Disinherited" in the attempt to restore Baliol to the Scottish throne (1332).

Bec, COMPROMISE OF (1106). [ANSELM.]

Beckaskog, THE CONVENTION OF (October 3, 1805), supplementary to the Convention of Helsingborg in the preceding August, concluded between Great Britain and Sweden, in order to enable Sweden to join heartily in the European coalition against Napoleon, consisted in an arrangement as to a subsidy to be supplied by Great Britain. Sweden agreed to employ 12,000 men in Pomerania, for whom Great Britain was to pay at the rate of £12 10s. annually for each man. Pay for five months was to be handed over to Sweden in advance, and £50,000 was to be paid down at once for the purpose of putting Stralsund into an efficient state of defence.

Becket, ST. THOMAS, ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY (1118-70), was the son of Gilbert Becket, a native of Rouen, a merchant, and at one time portreeve of London. His mother was a native of Caen. Thomas was put to school—first at Merton Priory, and then in London. He served for three years as a clerk in the office of Osbern "Eightpence," his kinsman, and there gained a good insight into business. He also served as secretary to Richer de l'Aigle, a knight who had been the friend of his parents. He was introduced into the household of Archbishop Theobald, and took minor orders. As Theobald introduced the teaching of canonical jurisprudence into England, Thomas, who soon became his favourite, devoted himself to that study. He went to Bologna, where Gratian was lecturing, and stayed there a year, and then went to Auxerre. On his return Theobald employed him in some important negotiations. In 1152 he is said to have prevailed on Pope Eugenius to forbid the coronation of Eustace, and thus paved the way for the success of Henry of Anjou. The archbishop richly rewarded Becket's services. He was made rector of St. Mary-le-Strand and of Otford in Kent, and prebendary of St. Paul's and Lincoln; in 1154 archdeacon of Canterbury and provost of Beverley. When Henry succeeded to the throne he made Thomas his chancellor. The early years of the reign must have been full of work for the new chancellor. Thomas was zealous for his master. When Henry exacted a "donum" from the ecclesiastics in 1159 the chancellor approved the arbitrary measure, while his old patron Theobald opposed it. The part which he took in the suit between the Bishop of Chichester and the Abbot of Battle ("Chron. de Bello," pp. 88-104) is sometimes urged as evidence of his scant regard for ecclesiastical pretensions, but the charge is unfair. Becket was only one of the group of judges before whom the case was tried, and his view was shared by Archbishop Theobald and sustained by subsequent popes. Much of the time of the chancellor was taken up with hearing causes, and he visited some counties as an itinerant justice. His style of living was splendid, and many young nobles were educated in his household, among whom was the king's eldest son, Henry. This splendour was remarkably displayed in his embassy to Louis VII, in 1158, to arrange the marriage of the young Henry. In the expedition to Toulouse the next year, he fitted out and maintained a large force at his own expense, and, clad in armour, led his troops in person, and distinguished himself in the field.

In 1161 Henry was anxious to make his chancellor archbishop. Thomas was unwilling to accept the office, and told the king that it would cost him the royal favour. The next year he was elected by the monks of Christ Church and by the suffragan bishops and clergy of Canterbury. He was ordained priest, and the following day received consecration. From that time the life of Thomas was changed. Till then his sympathies and efforts had been wholly for the king; henceforward they were devoted to the Church. The man remained the same—impulsive, vigorous, obstinate, and sensitive. He was not such as would serve two masters, and soon resigned the chancellorship. He made some devoted friends, and already had many enemies. Gilbert Foliot, Bishop of London (q.v.), a strict ecclesiastic, disliked the appointment of one who had led so secular a life, and this feeling was probably shared by many. In reclaiming the property of his see, Thomas made other enemies, and seems to have acted with impolitic violence. In 1163 he attended the Council of Tours, and came back filled with thoughts of the power of the Church. He soon increased the feeling of distrust awakened in the king's mind by the resignation of the chancellorship, for he communicated one of the tenants of the Crown, contrary to the rule laid down by the Conqueror. He also opposed a change which the king wished to make in the method of payment of "sheriff's aid," and high words passed between the king and the archbishop. The same year (1163), in a council at Westminster, Henry raised the fateful question of the trial and punishment of criminous clerks. He complained of the exactions of the ecclesiastical courts, and of the inadequacy of the sentences imposed upon clergy guilty of serious offences; and demanded that the bishops should promise to observe the "customs of his grandfather" in the matter of ecclesiastical privilege. By the advice of the archbishop they answered that they would do so "saving their order." This answer enraged the king, and Thomas was called upon to surrender the honours of Eye and Berkhamstead, of which he had had the custody. In January 1164, at a council at Clarendon, the famous Constitutions (q.v.) were brought forward which purported to be declaratory of the ancient customs of the kingdom. These Constitutions, by their settlement of the election and status of bishops, their restriction of the right of free appeal to Rome, and by other provisions, severely limited clerical immunities; but the most important clause was that relating to the trial of criminous clerks. It seems clear that Henry did not claim the right to try clerks accused of crime, but he asserted his right to "move" the Church courts and to punish clerics who were there found guilty. (Maitland, "Roman Canon Law in the English Church.") This distinction was, however, too fine to be appreciated by Becket, who contended that the judgment of the spiritual court should be final, since "Non iudicabit Deus bis in idipsum." Although not alone in objecting to the king's demand, he was alone in daring to withstand it; but, at length, under pressure, he gave his assent to the Constitutions. After he had done so he repented, withdrew his consent, and begged the pope to pardon him for his weakness. In October of the same year the archbishop was cited to a council at Northampton. He was not summoned personally, as was his right, but through the sheriff of Kent, to answer a plaint made against him by John the marshal. At this council a violent attack was made upon him, and he was ordered by Henry to render an account of his chancellorship, although he had received an acquittance on his resignation. The bishops did not stand by him. Some, like the Archbishop of York and the Bishops of London and Chichester, were his enemies; others were afraid of the king. The archbishop saw that Henry was determined to crush him. He fled, took ship, and landing at Oye in the county of Boulogne, found shelter in the abbey of St. Bertin. Flanders was, however, no safe place of refuge. Louis, glad of an opportunity of embarrassing Henry, welcomed the archbishop to France. Alexander III was at Sens, having been forced to leave Italy by the Emperor Frederick. His fear of turning Henry wholly to the side of the emperor made the pope half-hearted and vacillating in his support of the archbishop, and he commanded him to take no steps against the king for a while. Henry confiscated the revenues of the see, and banished all the kindred of the archbishop. His violent measures were carried out with great brutality by Ranulf de Broc. Thomas found shelter in the Cistercian abbey of Pontigny. There he led a life of ascetic severity, and gave himself to the study of the canon law, which must have strengthened his resolution to defend the rights of the clergy. In 1166 Alexander was able to return to Rome. Freed from the papal prohibition, the archbishop at Vezelay solemnly excommunicated his most violent enemies, and with a voice broken by emotion declared that, unless the king repented, he would excommunicate him also. In return Henry, by threatening the Cistercians, compelled them to cause the archbishop to leave Pontigny. He took shelter at Sens. The pope was still in danger from Frederick, and disapproved the Vezelay excommunications. In 1167 he thwarted the archbishop by sending legates to Henry, and thus suspending his legative power. The destruction of Frederick's army by pestilence did not enable the pope to act more firmly, for he was forced to remain in exile. In 1169 a meeting took place between Henry and the archbishop at Montmirail in the presence of Louis. The archbishop refused to submit to the judgment of the two kings, except with the condition "saving the honour of God," and no good was done. The same year another meeting took place at Montmartre, and ended in failure, for Henry refused the archbishop the kiss of peace. Alexander was anxious to end the quarrel. He was annoyed by the violence of the archbishop, and excited his indignation by absolving the Bishops of London and Salisbury whom Thomas had excommunicated. Henry, in 1170, caused his eldest son to be crowned by the Archbishop of York. This was a violation of the rights of Canterbury, and Thomas threatened to lay the kingdom under an interdict, which he now had power from the pope to pronounce. Louis was enraged with Henry, and formed a combination against him. [HENRY II.] A reconciliation was effected at Fréteval, July 20. Even after this the king and the archbishop were on anything but friendly terms. The king complained because Thomas delayed his return to England, for he was anxious to get him out of France. The archbishop complained of the injuries done to his see. Henry still put off the kiss of peace. The archbishop landed in England December 1, and was greeted with delight by the people. A morbid desire for martyrdom had taken hold of his mind. He came back with no intention of living in peace with his enemies; he would withstand them to the end, and lay down his life for the cause of the Church. He sent before him papal letters suspending and excommunicating the bishops who had taken part in the coronation. He went to London to see his former pupil, Prince Henry, and all the city was moved with joy at his coming. Young Henry refused to see him, and bade him return to his see. His enemies, and especially the family of de Broc, annoyed him in every way in their power; and, on Christmas Day, he uttered a violent anathema against them. When the king heard of the excommunication of the bishops he spoke the well-known hasty words of anger against the archbishop. Four of his knights, Hugh de Morville, Reginald Fitzurse, William de Tracy, and Richard Brito, acted on these words. They crossed to England, took with them Ranulf de Broc and a band of men, and murdered the archbishop in Canterbury Cathedral, December 29, 1170. The archbishop was canonized 1173, and his festival was appointed for the day of his martyrdom. The impression that the martyrdom made on the popular mind was very deep, and for three centuries after his death his shrine was the favourite place of pilgrimage for Englishmen.

Beckford, WILLIAM, ALDERMAN (1709-70), was an extremely wealthy merchant, owning large estates in the West Indies. He became an alderman, and was also returned to parliament for the City of London. Both in parliament and in the common council he was a firm and enthusiastic supporter of Lord Chatham. In 1762 Beckford became lord mayor, and again in 1769. With the city authorities the government was very unpopular, nor had it a fiercer opponent than the lord mayor. A petition from the corporation of London to the king had been treated as unconstitutional and unworthy of an answer. A remonstrance was next sent, to which the king replied with a dignified rebuke. Nevertheless, Beckford, on May 23, laid another remonstrance before the king, and, when the king had expressed his annoyance and displeasure, proceeded to argue with him. "The insolence of Beckford," says an eye-witness, "exceeded all his or the City's past exploits." Within a month he was dead of a fever, which common report said was caused by the excitement of his interview with the king. Beckford's enormous wealth descended to his son William, the eccentric author of "Vathek."

Bedchamber Question, THE (1839-1841). On the resignation of Lord Melbourne in 1839, Sir Robert Peel was summoned to form a ministry. On his mentioning incidentally to the queen the changes which he thought it necessary to make in the royal household he received a letter from her majesty saying that the removal of the ladies of her bedchamber would be repugnant to her feelings. Finding that Sir Robert would not give way on this point, the queen summoned Lord Melbourne to her aid. Lord Morpeth's sister and Lady Normanby were the two ladies to whom Peel especially objected. The desire to support the queen induced the Whig statesmen, in spite of their previous humiliations, to return to their posts. In 1841, on the downfall of the Whig ministry, the question arose again. The prince consort, however, arranged that three great Whig ladies should resign the situations which they held in the household of their own accord. This prudent compromise settled the difficulty, and saved the assertion of Peel's principle.

Bedford first appears in history in 571, when the Britons were defeated there by the Saxons, under Cutha. The castle underwent many sieges. In 1138 it was taken by King Stephen, and in 1215, during the war between John and the barons, it was captured by Falkes de Breauté, who continued to hold it till 1224, when he took prisoner one of the royal justices. Thereupon a force was levied against him, and Bedford was besieged. On its capture, the castle was dismantled. During the Civil War Bedford declared for the Parliament, but in 1643 was captured by the Royalists.

Bedford, EARLS AND DUKES OF. [RUSSELL.]

Bedford, JOHN, DUKE OF (1389-1435), was the third son of Henry IV, and was created Duke of Bedford in 1414. In 1416 he distinguished himself by defeating the French fleet, and in the next year commanded an expedition to Scotland to avenge the "Foul Raid." During Henry V's absences in France, Bedford was appointed lieutenant of England, and on his death-bed Henry constituted him regent of France. To cement the Burgundian alliance, Bedford, in 1423, married the sister of the Duke of Burgundy, and by the vigour and ability of his administration the English not only succeeded in maintaining their conquests for several years, but even gained ground upon their enemies. In 1424 he won the great victory of Verneuil; but the relief of Orleans interfered with the progress of the English arms, and in revenge for the powerful aid she had given to the enemy, Bedford caused Joan of Arc when she fell into his hands to be burned to death as a witch. In 1432 his wife died, and in the next year he married, without the consent of her overlord, Duke Philip, Jacquetta of Luxemburg, thereby increasing Burgundy's estrangement from the English. In home affairs Bedford was always ready to act as the mediator between Gloucester and Beaufort, returning to England for that purpose in 1426, and by his influence over the former was able to restrain his reckless and extravagant disposition to a certain degree. The latter years of Bedford's life were embittered by the follies of Gloucester, the successes of the French, and the defection of Burgundy. With him perished all hopes of English supremacy in France, and all chance of retaining even Normandy and Guienne. A brave soldier, a skilful general, a prudent and far-sighted politician, and, taken altogether, a just and merciful governor, Bedford had in him many of the elements of greatness. His misfortune was that he was the champion of a cause which was radically unjust, and which was destined from the beginning to ultimate failure. The greatest blot on Bedford's memory is his treatment of Joan of Arc, which was equally cruel and impolitic. [In point of fact, however, Cardinal Beaufort seems to have been more actively concerned than the duke in the proceedings leading to the Maid's death.] If we except this episode, Bedford was seldom guilty either of harshness or impolicy.

Bedford, PEERAGE OF. In 1138 Hugh de Beaumont, son of Herbert, Count of Meulan, was created Earl of Bedford by Stephen; and in 1316 the title was bestowed upon Enguerrand de Coucy, one of the hostages for King John of France in 1360, who won the favour of Edward III. In 1377 Enguerrand resigned his English honours and returned to France. In 1415 John, third son of Henry IV, was created Duke of Bedford, but the title expired with him. It was in turn enjoyed by George, Lord Nevill (d. s.p. 1483) and Jasper Tudor (d. 1495), neither of whom founded a family. In 1549 John Russell, lord high steward of England, who had received the lands of the Abbey of Woburn, in Bedfordshire, was created Earl of Bedford. In 1694 William Russell, 7th earl, was created Duke of Bedford.

Bedford Level is the name given to a flat district in the east of England, which comprises the Fen country, and includes parts of Cambridgeshire, Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdonshire, Northamptonshire, and Lincolnshire. During the earlier Middle Ages this district was a vast swamp, partly inundated by the sea. Attempts were made to reclaim it in the reigns of Henry VI and Henry VII, and an act was passed for this purpose in 1601. In 1634 Francis, Earl of Bedford, and a number of other landowners of the eastern counties, obtained permission from the Crown to drain the district on condition of receiving 95,000 acres of the reclaimed lands for themselves. The works, however, owing to disagreement with the Crown, and the Civil War, were suspended for some years till 1649, when the undertaking was renewed. In 1664 the company was incorporated by royal charter. The operations of the original projectors have been largely supplemented by drainage works undertaken in more recent times.

Begum, an Indian word for queen, princess, etc., is generally used as the title of wives of a reigning or defunct monarch, or of a woman regnant—e.g., Begum of Bhopal, Begums of Oudh.

Behmeru, THE BATTLE OF (November 23, 1841), was one of the disasters which befell the British during the first Afghan War. The British were in cantonments near Kabul; and on November 14 a large force of Afghans, which had assembled with cannon on the Behmeru hills, was dislodged with some difficulty by Brigadier Shelton. On the 22nd they appeared again at Behmeru. On the 23rd a strong force set out before daybreak to dislodge them. The hill was carried without difficulty, but thousands of men quickly swarmed out of the city, and the British were overmatched. The troops, shot down like rabbits, pining with cold and hunger, lost courage and refused to follow their officers. Finally, the whole body of British soldiers abandoned the field and took to flight. Beirut (BEYROUT), THE BOMBARDMENT OF (1840). A joint British, Austrian, and Turkish squadron in this year sailed to the coast of Syria, and proceeded to bombard Beirut, a seaport at the northern extremity of the Pachalic of Acre, which was held by the troops of the rebellious pasha of Egypt, Mehemet Ali. The town was quickly reduced to ruins.

Bek, ANTHONY (d. 1310), was the son of Walter, Baron of Eresby. He attracted the notice of Edward I, by whom he was made Archdeacon of Durham in the year 1279, and bishop in 1283. In 1290 he was sent by Edward to act in concert with the guardians of Scotland, and with the advice of the Estates as lieutenant for Queen Margaret and her husband; and in 1294 he was employed as ambassador to Adolf of Nassau. He accompanied the king in his expedition to Scotland in 1296, and received the submission of Baliol, commanded a division of the royal forces at Falkirk in 1298, and was present at the siege of Caerlaverock in 1300. In the same year he became engaged in a quarrel with the monks who constituted the chapter, which lasted the rest of his life, and, moreover, embroiled him with Edward I, who, in 1302, seized his temporalities. The bishop made his submission and his lands were restored, only to be confiscated once more in 1305. He obtained the empty but high-sounding title of Patriarch of Jerusalem from Clement V (1306), and in 1307 Edward II restored him to the palatinate and recognized him as king of the Isle of Man. With the new king, Bek was a great favourite and he enjoyed his honours in peace till his death in 1310. Bek represented the baronial party in the Church, which saw in Edward I's consolidating and centralizing policy the overthrow of its own privileges. He is also a type of the "political" bishop of the day—a veritable "prince of the Church."

Beket, THOMAS. [BECCKET.]

Belasyse, JOHN, BARON (d. 1689), was the second son of Lord Fauconberg, and, like his father, took a prominent part on the Royalist side in the Civil War. He was at the battles of Edgehill, Newbury, and Naseby, and the sieges of Reading and Bristol, and was subsequently made governor of York. He was wounded several times, and three times suffered imprisonment in the Tower. He was raised to the peerage in 1644, and at the Restoration was appointed commander of the force in Africa and governor of Tangier, which offices he held till 1666. In the reign of James II he was appointed one of the lords of the treasury.

Belesme, ROBERT DE, one of the Norman followers of William the Conqueror, and eldest son of Roger de Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury. He was the leader of the disaffected barons against the Norman kings. In 1077 he joined Robert against his father, in 1087 he opposed William II's accession to the English throne, and in 1101 supported Robert's claims against Henry I. On this latter occasion he was banished from England, to the great joy of the people, and sought refuge in Normandy, where he remained a constant source of trouble. In 1112 he was sent to Henry as an ambassador by the French king, but Henry served him as a rebel and kept him a prisoner till his death, the date of which is unknown. He stands out as one of the worst examples of the feudal baron, and by his treachery and brutality fully justified his nickname of "Robert the Devil." Ordericus Vitalis exclaims, when mentioning his banishment from England in 1101, "Rejoice, King Henry, and give thanks to the Lord God, for you became a free ruler from the day when you banished Robert of Belesme from your realm."

Belfast was the site of an important Norman castle which was in the possession of the de Burghs, Earls of Ulster, in the thirteenth century. In 1333 William de Burgh was murdered there by the rebellious English of the Pale. The castle subsequently fell into the hands of the O'Neills, from whom it was taken after the rebellion of Shane O'Neill, and forfeited to the Crown. In 1604 the castle and district was granted to Sir Arthur Chichester, who settled there numerous colonists from Devonshire. The castle was rebuilt, and a town speedily grew up round it. In 1613 the town was constituted a borough, and became very flourishing. In 1637 Strafford gave it certain trading privileges which did much to increase its prosperity. The city has ever since continued to increase, and has become the chief manufacturing and commercial town in Ireland. By the Irish Universities Act of 1908, Belfast was granted a university. The town became the capital of Northern Ireland in 1921.

Belgæ, THE, were found by Cæsar in occupation of northern Gaul and Belgium and of south-eastern Britain. They seem to have established themselves in this country in the course of the second century B.C., and represent the last great wave of Celtic invasion. The Belgic inhabitants of Britain included the Atrebatæ of Berkshire and Surrey, whose name is identical with that of the Atrebatæ of Artois; and the Catuvellauni of Hertfordshire, Bedfordshire, and Oxfordshire, whose kinsfolk on the other side of the Channel were the Catuvellauni of Châlons; as well as the confederacy of tribes in Hampshire, Wiltshire, and Somersetshire which was called by the racial name of Belgæ. It is highly probable that the Cantii of Kent, the Regni of Sussex, and the Trinobantes of Essex were also of Belgic origin; and some authorities have maintained that the Iceni were members of the same race. The result of the Belgic immigrations was to establish a close political bond between Gaul and Britain, which was the justification for Cæsar's expeditions in 55 and 54 B.C.

Belgian Question, THE (1830-2). The effect of the French Revolution of July 1830, in Europe, was to cause a general uprising of nationalities. Belgium, among others, threw off the yoke of Holland, and all Europe now became interested in the settlement of the difficulty. The Dutch government applied for troops to Lord Aberdeen, who straightway summoned the London Conference. This conference in vain attempted to solve the question. It sat from November 4, 1830, till September 30, 1832, and then dissolved, having effected nothing, the final cause of dissolution being a difference of opinion between the three northern and the two western powers as to the employment of force. A convention was immediately concluded between Great Britain and France for carrying out the stipulations of the treaty of November. This treaty was signed October 22, and on November 6 an embargo was laid on all vessels bearing the Dutch flag in British ports. A French army entered Holland and captured Antwerp; and the war was over. Belgium gained her independence with the capitulation of Antwerp.

Belle Isle, (1) THE BATTLE OF, was fought in October 1747, and resulted in the defeat of the French by the British fleet commanded by Admiral Hawke. Early in the day Hawke fell in with a large fleet of merchant ships bound for the West Indies, and convoyed by nine men-of-war. Without waiting for his ships to fall into line of battle, he vigorously attacked the enemy, and was rewarded with the capture of seven out of the nine men-of-war. The French were completely defeated, and the admiral received the honour of knighthood for the exploit.—(2) THE CAPTURE OF, took place during the Seven Years' War. In 1761 (June 7) a fleet under Admiral Keppel, conveying 8,000 troops under General Hodgson, arrived before the south-east point of the island. The troops, after being once repulsed, made good their landing, captured Palais, the chief town of the island, and compelled the garrison to capitulate. The island was held till the close of the war (1763).

Bellingham, SIR EDWARD (d. 1549), was sent to Ireland as lord deputy by Somerset in 1548, having previously won fame for himself in Hungary and at Boulogne, as well as in the Isle of Wight, where, in his capacity of governor, he defeated the French in 1545. His short period of rule in Ireland was eminently successful, and was marked by strong, wise, and vigorous administration.

Benares, THE TREATY OF (September 1773), was concluded between Warren Hastings and the Vizir of Oudh. Its stipulations were that Hastings should lend the vizir a British force to be used against the Rohillas, and should cede the districts of Corah and Allahabad; that the vizir should give a donation of forty lacs of rupees, and a monthly payment for the services of the troops; and that he should pay additionally for the ceded districts.

Benbow, JOHN, ADMIRAL (1653-1702), entered the merchant service very early in life. In 1679 he was master of a ship which traded in the Mediterranean. He is said to have pickled the heads of a crew of Saltee pirates, which he threw down as salt provisions on the table of the Cadiz magistrates. On his return James II placed him in command of a ship in the Royal Navy. William III employed him in checking the Dutch privateers, and in bombarding the French ports, duties which he carried out with courage and success. In 1698 he was sent with a squadron to the West Indies. There he attempted to settle the disputes which had broken out between the Spanish and English settlers owing to the attempted colonization of the isthmus of Darien by the Scots. On his return he was made vice-admiral (1700). He was sent out again in order to engage the Spanish colonies to disown Philip, the French claimant to the crown of Spain; or, if they refused this, to seize their galleons. He arrived at Barbados in 1701 and sailed thence for Jamaica, where he heard that du Casse had arrived with a squadron of French ships in order to crush the English slave trade. On August 19, 1702, Benbow, while cruising off Santa Marta, came in sight of du Casse. He resolved to attack, but the captains of his three best ships, from motives of personal dislike, refused to bring their vessels into action. Benbow, however, with his own ship, fought the enemy for five days. At last the captains addressed a written remonstrance to him, in which they declared that the odds were too great for a continuance of the conflict. Benbow, who was badly wounded, returned to Jamaica to die. Before his death he had the satisfaction of procuring the condemnation of two of his captains, and the dismissal of the third from the service.

Benburb, THE BATTLE OF (June 5, 1646), was fought between Owen Roe O'Neill and General Monro with the Scottish and English troops. O'Neill, whose rear and right wing were protected, prevented Monro's brother from coming to the aid of the English, and converted Monro's retreat into a rout by means of a sudden charge, capturing much ammunition and many guns. This battle was the last great victory achieved by an Irish general on Irish soil.

Benedict Biscop was born of a good Northumbrian family, and was probably one of the thegns of King Oswiu. In 653 he went on a pilgrimage to Rome, and on his return laboured hard in missionary work in the north of England. About 665 he undertook a second journey to Rome, and subsequently entered the Benedictine monastery of Lerins, where he took the tonsure, and remained some time. He then went to Rome again, and was commissioned to return to England as assistant and interpreter to Archbishop Theodore. On their arrival in England, Benedict was made abbot of the monastery of St. Peter's, at Canterbury. At the expiration of two years he abandoned this office, and undertook another journey to Rome. On his return he received from Egfrid of Northumbria a grant of land at the mouth of the Wear (674). Here he founded a monastery with a church of stone, and glass windows, and endowed it with numerous books, pictures, and relics, obtained by him on his journeys to Rome. In 682 he founded a second monastery at Jarrow, where Bæda spent most of his life. By the impulse he gave to monasticism and to ecclesiastical art in England, Benedict did work of considerable service to the Anglo-Saxon Church.

Benedictines, THE, the most important of the mediæval monastic orders—if, indeed, they can be said to have constituted an order in the accepted sense of the term—owed their foundation to St. Benedict of Nursia (480 ?–542 ?). Before his time there had been little uniformity or permanence in monastic societies. Instead of fluctuating assemblies of individuals, Benedict established stable communities, marked by a careful gradation of ranks and duties under the supreme authority of the abbot. His rule rejected the extremes of Eastern asceticism, and judiciously combined mental and manual labour with contemplation and liturgical exercises; but the vows taken were irrevocable. It was so well adapted to the needs of the West that its spread was rapid. There is little doubt but that it was introduced into England in 597 by St. Augustine, whose companions were monks from the monastery of St. Andrew in Rome. Its influence was, however, rivalled by that of the Celtic monasticism imported from Iona; and it subsequently suffered from intrusive secular tendencies, and from the destructive onslaughts of the Danes. Alfred made some attempt at reform, but it was not until the reign of Edgar that the strict Benedictine rule was restored by Dunstan, Ethelwald and Oswald, by whose inspiration the “Regularis Concordia” was drawn up. A further revival was effected by Lanfranc and Anselm after the Norman Conquest. The Benedictines were by far the richest and most powerful of the monastic orders in England. Their strength lay mainly in their vast landed estates, which, in the case of the pre-Conquest foundations, were usually held in chief on terms similar to those on which the great lay lords held their baronies. All the cathedral convents with the exception of Carlisle, and all the mitred abbeys save those of Waltham and Cirencester, were Benedictine; as also were the great majority of the “parliamentary” abbeys. At the time of the Dissolution there were some 113 Benedictine monasteries, with revenues amounting to over £57,000, besides 73 nunneries whose revenues totalled £8,000. [MONASTICISM.]

Benefice denotes “the right which a clerk has to enjoy certain ecclesiastical revenues on condition of discharging certain services.” For the enjoyment of a benefice four things are necessary:—(1) Ordination as a priest; a deacon or a layman may be presented, but he must be ordained priest before he can be instituted. (2) Presentation by the patron. Self-presentation, where the patron is himself a clerk, is forbidden by the act of 1923. (3) Institution to the cure of souls by the bishop, if satisfied of the sufficiency of the clerk. For the remedies, in cases where the bishop refuses to institute, vide supra under ADVOWSON. When the bishop is himself patron, there is neither presentation nor institution, but collation. (4) Induction to the temporalities by the archdeacon or a neighbouring clergyman upon the bishop’s mandate. The papal power of granting dispensation from that canon of the Lateran Council of 1215 which forbade the holding of two benefices by the same person, was transferred at the Reformation to the Archbishop of Canterbury. But the evils of pluralism were so great that by the Acts 1 and 2 Vict., c. 106, 13 and 14 Vict., c. 98, and 48 and 49 Vict., c. 54, it was forbidden to hold two benefices unless the churches were within four miles of one another, and the value of one was not greater than £200. Vicarages, rectories, perpetual curacies, and chaplaincies are termed benefices, in contradistinction to dignities such as bishoprics. The holder of a benefice is called the incumbent or minister.

Benefit of Clergy. In the twelfth century the Church claimed for all clergy exemption from any kind of secular jurisdiction. Henry II, in the Constitutions of Clarendon (q.v.), attempted, in the interests of law and order, to secure to the lay courts a measure of control over “criminous clerks.” All clerics accused of a felony were to appear in the first instance before the temporal court, there to plead their clergy. They were then to be sent to the ecclesiastical court to be tried in the presence of a royal officer. If found guilty they were to be degraded and afterwards surrendered once more to the secular arm to receive the appropriate layman’s punishment. The murder of Becket prevented the execution of this scheme in its entirety. The temporal courts waived their claim to punish the criminous clerk found guilty in the courts Christian, but maintained the principle that all clergy accused of felony should appear in the first instance before them. This gave rise to the Privilege or Benefit of Clergy. During the Middle Ages cases in which it might be urged were such as affected the life or limbs of the offender, with the exception of high treason. It was at first restricted to bona fide clerics, but was subsequently extended to all who could read a verse in the Psalter, known as the neck-verse, generally out of the 51st Psalm. Should it be declared by the bishop’s commissary that the prisoner read like a clerk, he was delivered over to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. It was, however, an indictable offence at common law to teach a felon to read in order that he might claim benefit of clergy. The abuse of this custom was very great, and in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries it provoked constant disputes between the judges and ordinaries. Henry VII in 1488 restricted it by declaring that it should not be allowed more than once to persons not actually in orders; and under Henry VIII and later the privilege was abolished altogether in a large number of cases. The practice of handing over to the ecclesiastical court the person who successfully pleaded his clergy was abandoned in the later sixteenth century. Thus the original character of benefit of clergy was entirely lost sight of, and it became simply a complicated set of rules exempting from capital punishment certain persons found guilty of certain felonies. In Queen Anne's reign (1705) the neck-verse was no longer required to be read; but benefit of clergy was not finally abolished until 1827 (7, 8 George IV, c. 28). The privilege did not extend to women, with the exception of professed religious, until they were specially included by a statute of 1692 (4 William and Mary, c. 9).

Benevolences, a means of raising money by nominally voluntary gifts, were first used eo nomine by Edward IV. In earlier times the practice of expecting and even asking for "free-will offerings" was not unusual on the part of kings. [Such payments were frequently exacted by the early Plantagenets, especially from the clergy, under the title of dona.] Edward II and Richard II seem to have used similar methods of levying money. But Edward IV raised it to a system, and by his popular manners was wonderfully successful in dealing with that large number of his subjects who did not know how to refuse a king's request. Such a method of using personal pressure was, of course, unconstitutional, and gave the king a dangerous means of raising money without parliament. Under Richard III, in 1483, an act of parliament was passed abolishing benevolences as "new and unlawful inventions"; but Henry VII revived them, and obtained a quasi-parliamentary sanction by an act of 1495, which enforced the payment of arrears of money promised by private persons to the king. It was often argued seriously that the law of Richard III, being the act of a "usurper," was not valid. Henry's chancellor, Archbishop Morton, used to beg for his master, and is traditionally credited with the invention of a dilemma which was known as "Morton's fork." "If a man lived handsomely he told him that he clearly had money to spare; if he lived plainly, that he was saving money, and must be rich enough to help the king. Henry VIII, who levied two benevolences, one in 1528 and another in 1545, appointed in the latter year commissioners who were to move men to grant to the king twenty pence in the pound on the value of their lands: those who refused were to be summoned to answer before the privy council. [An alternative to the benevolence was the forced loan, of which the most familiar example is the so-called "Amicable Loan" of 1525, which provoked a successful opposition led by London.] Elizabeth at times solicited loans, but she was frugal, and generally repaid them in time. James I, in 1614, had recourse to this, amongst other schemes for raising money. The council wrote to the sheriffs requesting them to solicit subscriptions in their counties. Bacon defended the proceeding, saying that it asked for a free gift, and had nothing in common with the extortions of previous times. So many protests, however, were made against this exaction, and so little money was raised by it, that it was not again used by the Crown. Even Charles I, in his worst straits, rejected proposals for reviving so unpopular a usage.

Bengal. The province of British India which lies about the lower portions and the deltas of the Ganges and Brahmaputra. The provinces of Bengal proper, Bihar, Orissa, and Chota Nagpur, were included in it until 1905, when certain districts were detached and added to Assam. This partition was revoked in 1911. The population numbers over forty-six millions, or eighty millions with those of Bihar and Orissa. Bengal was conquered by the Mohammedans in the thirteenth century, and was subsequently ruled by Mussulman viceroys appointed by the various reigning dynasties. In the eighteenth century the Nawab of Bengal was a deputy of the Mogul at Delhi. The first English settlements were formed between the years 1620 and 1640. In 1696 the British bought a small district at the mouth of the Ganges, on which Fort William (Calcutta) was erected. For many years the British were involved in frequent disputes with the native governors, culminating in Suraj-ud-Dowla's massacre of the Europeans in 1756. [BLACK HOLE.] This was followed by Clive's great victory at Plassey, and some years of fighting. [CLIVE.] In 1765 the dewan of Bengal, Bihar, and Orissa was ceded to the East India Company, and the Nawab, Mir Jafar, was pensioned off. A native dewan was, however, appointed to collect the revenues. In 1773 Warren Hastings abolished the double government, and placed the administration directly in the hands of the company. The governor-general of India was also governor of Bengal till 1854, when the offices were separated, and Bengal was placed under a lieutenant-governor. In 1793 Lord Cornwallis effected the "Permanent Settlement," by which the zemindars, or tax collectors, were recognized as proprietors on payment of a land tax to the government; but the rights of the cultivators were recognized and extended by the Bengal Land Law of 1859. The province suffered from an earthquake in 1897, and severe plagues in 1900 and 1904.

Bengal Mutiny, THE (1795-6), resulted from the reforms of Lord Cornwallis's administration, which had abolished sinecures in both branches of the service and increased the salaries of civilians without increasing those of the army. Delegates assembled accordingly from the different regiments and drafted a series of demands—among them promotion by seniority and the restoration of old allowances—a refusal to comply with which would lead to violence. During the governorship of Sir John Shore the question was mismanaged, but the arrival of the Marquis Wellesley in 1798 put an end to the crisis.

Benkulen, in Sumatra, was held by the East India Company as a trading settlement from 1682 to 1824. It was attacked and laid in ruins by the French in 1760. In 1824 it was given up to the Dutch in exchange for their Malacca settlements.

Bennet, HENRY, EARL OF ARLINGTON (1618-85), was originally intended to take orders, but on the outbreak of the Civil War he joined the Royalist army as a volunteer. After the death of Charles I, he joined Charles II, and was employed by him as ambassador to Madrid. In 1662 he was made one of the secretaries of state, and in 1663 was created a baron. In 1667 he joined the Cabal ministry. Next year he arranged the Triple Alliance (q.v.), and in 1670 was privy to the Treaty of Dover. In 1674 he was impeached by the House of Commons, and sold his office to Sir J. Williamson, purchasing in his turn the post of lord chamberlain, which he held till 1681. Arlington was a Catholic, but never showed himself very zealous for his religion. Sharing the want of political principle, and "the cosmopolitan indifference to constitutions and religions" which distinguished the politicians with whom he was associated, Arlington was nevertheless superior to most of them, both in morals and in culture, and is said to have been regarded as "the man in England who least overstepped the line of good conduct." Bennington, THE BATTLE OF (August 16, 1777), fought during the American War of Independence, took place at Bennington, in New Hampshire, where the Americans had stored large supplies. Burgoyne had detached a considerable force, under Colonel Baum, to seize the magazines at Bennington, and thence to march on to Albany and join the main army there. Finding the place stronger than he expected, Baum entrenched himself, and sent for reinforcements. General Stark, with the New Hampshire men, in vain offered him battle, and on being reinforced, determined himself to attack. The movement was conducted with great skill, and Baum's position was secretly surrounded before he was aware of an intended attack. The entrenchments were gallantly held until ammunition failed the defenders, who then made a bold attempt to cut their way through the American lines. Baum, however, was shot, and the rest of the force laid down its arms.

Bensington, in Oxfordshire, near Wallingford, although now a village, was in early times a place of considerable importance. It was one of the four towns that Cutha took from the Britons in 571; and in 777 or 779 Offa defeated Cynewulf of Wessex here, and took the town from him.

Bentham, JEREMY (1748-1832), educated at Westminster and Queen's College, Oxford, was originally intended for the bar, but being possessed of private means, he determined to devote his life to the reformation, rather than the practice, of the law, and wrote numerous works with this object. In spite of their unequal value, his books remain a storehouse for the politician and the law reformer. Indeed, there are few administrative reforms which have not been suggested wholly or in part by Bentham's writings. But his value does not only consist in being a suggester of reform on the details of legislation and procedure; he is also one of the fathers of English jurisprudence. His place in that science is midway between Hobbes and Austin. Hobbes had first discerned the doctrine that whatever be the form of government the sovereign authority is ultimately absolute; but he had deduced from this the theory of non-resistance. Bentham perceived the fallacy in this deduction, and separated clearly the legal necessity for obedience from the political duty of resistance. The test of the propriety of political resistance Bentham held to be "Utility," in the sense of the greatest happiness of the greatest number. This maxim, whatever may be its value as the basis of a philosophy, furnishes an excellent rule for practical action. In fact, as Sir Henry Maine has pointed out, by thus making the good of the community take precedence of every other object, Bentham offered a clear rule of reform, and gave a distinct object to aim at in the pursuit of improvement. In this respect his influence may be compared with that of the jus naturæ in Roman law.

Bentham's works, which are very numerous, have been collected by his disciple, Bowring (London, 1837), who has prefixed to the collection a sketch of Bentham's method. Those of his writings which will best repay perusal are "The Fragment on Government," 1776, in answer to Blackstone; "The Book of Fallacies," and "The Tract on Usury." His theory of punishments is contained in "The Principles of Morals and Legislation" (published separately by the Clarendon Press), and in a translation from the French of his disciple Dumont, entitled "The Theory of Legislation." For criticisms of Bentham's philosophy, see preface to Green and Grose's edition of "Hume," and W. L. Courtney, "Criticism on the Philosophy of J. S. Mill"; W. L. Davidson, "Political Thought in England, the Utilitarians." [B. R. W.]

Bentinck, LORD GEORGE (1802-48), acted for some time as secretary to Canning, and in 1826 entered parliament for King's Lynn. He was chiefly occupied in sporting matters till within a few years of his death. He came prominently forward in the ranks of the opposition in 1846, after Sir Robert Peel abandoned the cause of protection. Identifying himself with the protectionists, he quickly became their chief, and led them in the bitter campaign which followed against Peel. In this position he displayed an energy, determination, and organizing power which seemed to mark him out for high distinction as a political leader. He, however, died suddenly from heart disease, within three years of the time when he had first come prominently before the public.

B. Disraeli, "Lord George Bentinck: a Political Biography," 1851.

Bentinck, LORD WILLIAM (1774-1839), entered the army in 1791, and was attached to the head-quarters of Marshal Suwaroff during the campaign of 1799-1801. In April 1803 he quitted England as governor of Madras, which post he filled till January 1808. In August of that year he was appointed on the staff of the army in Portugal under Sir Harry Burrard (q.v.). He was at the battle of Corunna, and later was appointed minister at the court of Sicily and commander-in-chief of all his Majesty's forces in the island. At the head of an expedition he landed in Catalonia (1813), and, after some successes, was repulsed at the bridge of Ordal (Villafranca del Panades). In 1814 he left Sicily, repaired to Tuscany, and incited the Italians to throw off the French yoke. In 1827 he went to Bengal as governor-general. He arrived in 1828, and was compelled to enter at once on the unpopular duty of retrenchment, owing to the deficit caused by the Burmese War. All allowances were reduced, and an order was issued (November 1828) to curtail the batta allowances at all stations within 400 miles of Calcutta. This impolitic and unjust order nearly produced a mutiny, but was forced on Lord William by the directors. The revenue was augmented by increasing the opium trade, and by resuming all lands fraudulently alienated from the state. In 1832, on the murder of the Raja of Cachar (a little province on the north-east frontier of Bengal), Lord William annexed it, in accordance with the general wish of the people; and in 1834 Coorg was also annexed. In other respects Lord William based his policy on the principle of non-intervention. The assumption of the government of Mysore was, however, forced upon him by the incompetence of its ruler. Attempts were also made to establish a connexion with the independent states beyond the company's territories, and to form defensive alliances with the Amirs of Sind and Ranjit Singh, of Lahore, with whom Lord William concluded treaties in 1831. The civil administration of Lord

William stands high in the history of British India as an era of progress. The reform of the law courts and the laws, the admission of native Christians to office, the settlement of the North-west Provinces, the abolition of suttee and the suppression of the Thugs, the introduction of steam communication, and the encouragement of education, serve to mark the period of his rule with distinction. In 1835 Lord William returned to England. He was elected M.P. for Glasgow in 1836 and 1837, but he did not take any prominent part in home politics.

Bentinck, WILLIAM, EARL (afterwards DUKE) OF PORTLAND (1649-1709), was a member of a noble Dutch family, and a close friend of William III. His friendship with William of Orange is said to have originated from his nursing the prince through a severe attack of small-pox. On the discovery of the Rye House Plot he was sent by William of Orange to England to congratulate Charles II and the Duke of York on their escape. He was sent to England in 1687 in order to confer with the leaders of the opposition. He accompanied William to England. In 1689 he was in favour of William's sole claim to the throne, and had a violent dispute with Burnet on the subject. In 1690 he was sent by William to Holland in order to calm Amsterdam, where the citizens refused to allow William to nominate the magistrates. He had been created Earl of Portland, and groom of the stole in 1689. He accompanied the king to Ireland, and commanded a troop of Dutch horse. In January 1691 he sailed with William for Holland. William had given him large grants of land in Wales, but the hostility of the Commons compelled him to revoke the grant (1695). In July 1697 a series of informal interviews took place between him and Marshal Boufflers at Hull, while the conference was sitting at Ryswick, with a view to terms of peace. It was through these interviews that the Treaty of Ryswick (q.v.) was eventually concluded (September 1697). Meanwhile the friendship between Portland and William was growing cold, for the former showed an unworthy jealousy of the king's new favourite, Arnold Van Keppel. Next year, therefore, the king sent him to Paris at the head of a magnificent embassy. Portland executed his duties with fidelity. Together with Marshal Tallard, he laid down the lines of the Partition Treaty (q.v.). Portland returned to England, and early in 1699 surprised everyone by resigning his office as chamberlain. His jealousy of Keppel seems still to have been the motive that influenced him. The quarrel between Portland and Albemarle grew in intensity, and at length he retired altogether from court. In 1701 he came forward to defend the second Partition Treaty. Together with Somers he was impeached for his share in the matter, and the Commons requested that he might be removed from the king's councils. There were additional charges against him for grants and dilapidations of the royal revenue. But the Commons, who refused to appear at the trial of Somers, allowed the impeachments to drop. He was present at the death-bed of William, and in his last moments the king took the hand of his old friend and pressed it tenderly to his heart. Portland lived in retirement for the remainder of his life.

Bentinck, WILLIAM HENRY CAVENDISH, 3RD DUKE OF PORTLAND (1738-1809), eldest son of the 2nd duke, was educated at Eton and Oxford, and entered parliament as member for Weobly in 1760, succeeding to the dukedom of Portland two years later. Under Rockingham he was lord chamberlain of the household and became a privy councillor (1765), retiring a year later with the Rockingham Whigs and violently attacking the Duke of Grafton and Lord North. In the second Rockingham ministry (1782) Portland was lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In April 1783 he became prime minister himself in succession to Shelburne, with Fox and North as secretaries of state, and held office till December, when his government was defeated on Fox's India Bill. In the panic period of 1790-7 brought about by the French Revolution, Portland and the Rockingham Whigs rallied round Pitt in the matter of repressive legislation at home. As a result of his new alliance the duke became home secretary, a knight of the Garter, and lord-lieutenant of Nottinghamshire (1794). He continued as home secretary till the fall of the ministry in 1801, and remained in the cabinet under Addington as lord president of the council, which office he retained during Pitt's second ministry (1803), surrendering it, however, to Addington (Lord Sidmouth) out of friendship for the prime minister. In 1807, on the fall of the Ministry of All the Talents (q.v.), the Duke of Portland became prime minister a second time, though by now an aged man; and in 1709 he died of grief at the dissensions in his cabinet—in particular, the duel between Canning and Castlereagh.

Beorn (d. 1049), earl of the Middle Angles, was the son of Ulf the Dane, and consequently the nephew of Gytha, wife of Earl Godwin. He attached himself to the fortunes of his uncle, and probably about the year 1045 received an earldom which seems to have included all the country between the Humber and the Nene with the counties of Hertford, Bedford, Huntingdon, and Buckingham. On the outlawry of Swegen in 1046, part of his earldom was granted to Beorn. On Swegen's return Beorn consented to intercede for him with the king, but Swegen, having lured him on board his ship, murdered him and buried his body at Dartmouth. His remains were subsequently translated with great pomp to Winchester.

Berengaria, QUEEN (d. c. 1230), was the daughter of Sancho VI of Navarre, and in 1191 was married at Cyprus to Richard I, whom she accompanied to the Holy Land. It was due in part to discourtesy shown to her at Cyprus that Richard I attacked and conquered the island. After the death of her husband, she resided chiefly in the dower city of Le Mans, and compounded with King John for her dower lands in England, receiving in return a promise of 2,000 marks a year, which was very irregularly kept. She retired in 1230 to the abbey of L'Espau, to which she was a great benefactress, and here she is supposed to have died shortly afterwards.

Beresford, ADMIRAL LORD CHARLES WILLIAM DE LA POER (1846-1919), entered the navy at thirteen. He accompanied the Prince of Wales (afterwards Edward VII) to India as naval aide-de-camp. As commander of the Condor he rendered brilliant services at the bombardment of Alexandria in 1882. Three years later he took part in Lord Wolseley's expedition for the relief of Gordon. In 1886 he was made a lord commissioner of the admiralty, but resigned in 1888 on the question of the strength of the fleet. He commanded the Mediterranean Fleet, 1905-6, was made admiral and commander-in-chief of the Channel Fleet in 1906. In 1909 he resigned his command, and a committee of inquiry on the question of naval administration followed his resignation. He was made a peer in 1916, and died in 1919. The title became extinct.

Bering Sea Arbitration (1893), was the result of a dispute between Great Britain and the United States over the fur-seal fishery in the Bering Sea. The United States had purchased from Russia all her territorial rights in Alaska and adjacent islands (1867), and had leased to the Alaska Commercial Company the right of killing seals in the Bering Sea. The dispute with Great Britain originated in the capture by the United States of several British sealers found, according to the United States' interpretation of the phrase "adjacent waters," within the boundaries of Alaska. Futile negotiations were carried on between the three powers concerned (1887-90), until by the Treaty of Washington, February 29, 1892, the question was submitted to arbitration, each party naming two arbitrators. The award, given in August 1893, was in favour of Great Britain.

Berlin, THE TREATY OF (1878), was concluded between Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, Russia, and Turkey, for the settlement of affairs in the East after the war between Russia and Turkey. Its chief provisions were, that Bulgaria should be an autonomous and tributary principality under the suzerainty of the Sultan, to be ruled by a Christian government and a prince freely elected, and provisionally administered by a Russian commissary; and that Eastern Rumelia should remain under the direct political and military authority of the Sultan, under conditions of administrative autonomy, and should have a Christian governor-general, to be nominated by the Porte with the assent of the powers. In the event of the Porte and Greece being unable to agree as to the rectification of their frontier, the powers would mediate. Bosnia and Herzegovina were to be occupied and administered by Austria-Hungary. They were subsequently annexed in 1908. The independence of Serbia, Rumania, and Montenegro was recognized. Ardahan, Kars, Batum, and other portions of Armenia were ceded to Russia, as was also the part of Bessarabia ceded to Rumania in 1856. [CRIMEAN WAR.] Complete toleration, equality, and protection of all religions were guaranteed in Turkey. The plenipotentiaries who represented Great Britain in the congress held under the presidency of Prince Bismarck, which preceded the treaty, were the Earl of Beaconsfield and the Marquis of Salisbury. They obtained for Great Britain the right to administer Cyprus.

Text of Treaty is in Oakes and Mowat, "Great European Treaties of the Nineteenth Century," 1918; see also J. A. R. Marriott, "Eastern Question," 1917.

Bermingham, JOHN, EARL OF LOUTH (d. 1329), was descended from the lords of Athenry, and was nominated, in 1318, commander-in-chief of the English forces in Ireland. He won the battle of Foughart near Dundalk, and sent Edward Bruce's head to Edward III. As a reward for this service, and for his prowess in fighting the O'Connors, he was made Earl of Louth. He was afterwards engaged as the ally of the Butlers and of the Earl of Desmond in their feud with the houses of de Burgh and le Poer. In 1329, together with some 160 noblemen and gentlemen, he was treacherously murdered at Braganstown.

Bermudas, THE, OR SOMEERS ISLANDS, were discovered in 1527 by a Spaniard named Bermudez, who gave his name to the islands. They are about three hundred in number, though about twenty only are inhabited. In 1609 Sir George Somers, who was wrecked there on his way to Virginia, took possession of the Bermudas for the Crown, and settlers soon began to arrive from England. In 1615 a Bermuda Company was formed and bought out the Virginia Company grant of 1612. The islands submitted to the Commonwealth in 1652 in spite of the presence of many Royalist settlers. The company was abolished in 1684 and the government taken over by the Crown. It is vested in a governor, an executive council of four official and three other members appointed by the Crown, a legislative council of three official and six others, and a House of Assembly of thirty-six members.

Bernard's Case (1858). On January 14, 1858, a desperate attempt was made by a man named Orsini, and others, to murder the Emperor of the French, by throwing bombs filled with explosives at him near the Opera-house in Paris [ORSINI]. The attempt failed, but many persons were injured and some killed. Dr. Simon Bernard was indicted in England as an accessory before the fact. He was probably an accomplice. But a good deal of political feeling had been imported into the matter. The French foreign office had addressed a dispatch to Great Britain on the subject of the conspiracy; this had caused great irritation, which was increased by the insulting language towards Great Britain used by some of the French officers in their address of congratulation to the Emperor Napoleon. It was felt that the conviction of Bernard would be a mark of subservience on the part of Great Britain, and a triumph for the unconstitutional government of the French emperor. The trial took place at the Central Criminal Court on April 14; and after a six days' hearing the jury returned a verdict of Not Guilty.

Berners, SIR JOHN BOURCHIER, LORD (c. 1467-1533). [BOURCHIER.]

Bernicia was the name of the Anglian kingdom stretching between the Tees or Tyne and the Forth. The several settlements in which it originated appear to have been welded together in the first instance by Ida in 547. His successor Ethelric annexed the neighbouring kingdom of Deira (588). After being dispossessed in 617 by Edwin of Deira, the Bernician royal house was restored to power in 634 in the person of Oswald, and finally established in the rule of a united Northumbria in 655 with the accession of Oswy. When Deira was conquered by the Danes in the later ninth century Bernicia appears to have retained a precarious independence under its native dynasty, until in 954 it sank to the status of an earldom under the supremacy of the West Saxon kings. Henceforward it suffered chiefly from the ravages of the Scots, who in the later tenth century captured Edinburgh, and in 1018 overran the whole district of Lothian. For the next century and a half Bernicia persisted, sometimes as a separate earldom, sometimes as part of the larger earldom of Northumbria. The political significance of the name disappeared after the Conqueror's devastation of the north in 1069. [DEIRA : NORTHUMBRIA.]

Bertha (BERCTA), QUEEN, was the daughter of Charibert, King of Paris, and the wife of Ethelbert of Kent. On her marriage it was stipulated that she should be allowed to profess Christianity and worship as she pleased. She brought with her to England as her chaplain Liudhard, Bishop of Senlis, and the little Roman church of St. Martin at Canterbury was set apart for her use. Her influence was of great service to Augustine in his missionary work. [AUGUSTINE.]

Berthwald (BRIHTWALD) (c. 650-731), Archbishop of Canterbury (693-731), is said to have belonged to the royal house of Mercia. During his archbishopric the much-vexed question of the celebration of Easter was settled by almost all the British bishops adopting the Roman practice. This period also saw the beginning of missionary enterprise abroad, and the English engaged in preaching the Gospel to their heathen kinsmen in Germany.

Bertric (BEORHTRIC) (d. 802), King of Wessex, succeeded on Cynewulf's death. He married Eadburgh, daughter of Offa, and is said to have met his death by drinking a cup of poison prepared by her hands for another person. His reign is chiefly remarkable for the banishment of Ecgbert and the first appearance of the Danes on the English coast. Peace was secured by the practical acknowledgment on the part of Wessex of the supremacy of Mercia. [WESSEX.]

Berwick, JAMES FITZ-JAMES, DUKE OF (1670-1734). [FITZ-JAMES.]

Berwick, THE PACIFICATION OF (1639), was the name given to the agreement concluded between Charles I and five Scots commissioners, the terms being that the Scots and the Royalist armies should be disbanded, ecclesiastical matters referred to a free general assembly, and civil matters to a parliament.

Berwick, THE TREATY OF (January 1560), was concluded between Queen Elizabeth (represented by the Duke of Norfolk) and the Lords of the Congregation. Its object was the expulsion of the French garrisons and troops from Scotland, Elizabeth engaging to send troops to the north for that purpose.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Berwick-upon-Tweed was one of the fortresses delivered to the English in 1174, as security for the fulfilment of the conditions of the Treaty of Falaise, and it remained in their hands till 1189. It was one of the four royal burghs of Scotland (Edinburgh, Roxburgh, and Stirling being the others), and from its importance and wealth was for centuries a thorn in the side of England. In March 1296 it was taken by Edward I, and most of the townsmen put to the sword, but it was recaptured by Wallace in September 1297. Having fallen again into the hands of the English, it was taken by Bruce in 1318, and held by the Scots until after the battle of Halidon Hill, 1333, when it was seized by Edward III. From this time it was rarely in the hands of the Scots until it was surrendered by Henry VI, in 1461, in order to secure a refuge in Scotland. It became again an English possession in 1482. It was made independent both of England and Scotland in 1551. In 1836 it was created a county of itself.

Bethell, RICHARD, 1ST LORD WESTBURY (1800-73), was the son of a physician at Bristol; he was educated at Wadham College, Oxford. He was called to the bar (1823), and soon acquired an extensive practice. He obtained distinguished success as advocate for Brasenose College in a suit which brought him a continually increasing practice, and in 1840 he became a queen's counsel. In 1847 he unsuccessfully contested Shaftesbury in the Liberal interest. In 1845 he was more successful, and was returned for Aylesbury as a "Liberal, favourable to the ballot and the abolition of Church rates." In 1859 he was elected for Wolverhampton, which he continued to represent till he was called to the Upper House. In December 1852 he became solicitor-general under the coalition government of Lord Aberdeen. His services at this time were of much use to Gladstone in carrying the Succession Duty Bill, many of the points in which were so intricate and so strictly technical that no one but an equity lawyer could have explained them properly to the House. Bethell also took an active part about the same time in carrying the bills for reforming the University of Oxford, and for abolishing the ecclesiastical courts. In the winter of 1856-7 Sir Richard became attorney-general. It became his duty to introduce and carry through the House the Probate and Administration Act and the Divorce Act. When the new Court of Probate and Matrimonial Causes was formed, the judgeship was first offered by Lord Palmerston to Sir Richard Bethell, who, however, refused it. In 1857 he carried through the House of Commons the Fraudulent Trustees Bill. He had a large share in the preparation of the Conspiracy to Murder Bill of 1858, which caused the retirement of Lord Palmerston's cabinet from office. In 1861, on the death of Lord Campbell, the great seal was offered to Sir Richard, and he took his seat in the House of Lords as Lord Westbury, having previously carried the Bankruptcy Bill of 1861 through the Lower House. In the summer of 1865 some scandalous proceedings which it was thought he ought to have detected and checked were brought to light in connexion with the Leeds Bankruptcy Court, and in consequence of these, and of an adverse motion in the House of Commons, he resigned the great seal in the July of that year. From that date until his death, Lord Westbury constantly took part in the decision of appeals brought before the House of Lords, and as arbitrator in delicate and important commercial cases.

Bexley, NICHOLAS VANSITTART, LORD (1766-1851). [VANSITTART.]

Bharatpur. A native state of Rajputana. The town of Bharatpur has been twice besieged by the British. (1) In 1805, the Bharatpur raja having taken part with the Mahrattas, General Lake determined on investing the place. It was a town and fortress, eight miles in circumference, surrounded by a lofty mud wall of great thickness, and protected by numerous bastions, and a deep ditch filled with water. It was garrisoned by about 8,000 of the raja's troops and the remnant of Holkar's infantry. Without a sufficient siege train, Lake resolved at once to carry the town by assault. Four unsuccessful assaults were made, entailing the loss of 3,200 men in killed and wounded, and the British finally were compelled to withdraw. This memorable siege lasted from January 4 to April 21. (2) In the year 1825 a disputed succession to the throne of Bharatpur occurred. The expelled prince had been under British protection, and so, though Lord Amherst was at first inclined for non-intervention, Lord Combermere, the commander-in-chief, undertook to reduce the hitherto impregnable stronghold. Having demanded the dismissal of the women and children, which was refused, he proceeded to bombard the town. After two months' siege, the assault was given, and in two hours the town was taken; the fortress was then razed to the ground, and the rightful prince restored.

Bhawalpur, or DOODPOUTRA, is a native state of the Punjab governed by a prince called the Bhawal Khan, with Bhawalpur as his capital. His dominions extended at one time across the Sutlej to the Upper Indus, but he was a tributary of the Durani monarch. Ranjit Singh demanded the same tribute, and, on failure of payment, seized the territory between the rivers. The Amirs of Sind also took from the Bhawal Khan a large district on the left bank of the Lower Indus. Thus pressed, he readily accepted, in 1838, the protection of the British, by whom his dominions were guaranteed against further encroachments on the part of his powerful neighbours.

Bhonsla was the family name of the Rajas of Nagpur or Berar. [MAHRATTAS.]

Bhopal is a small Indian native principality in Malwa, in the valley of the Narbada. In 1778 the reigning prince was the only chief in Central India who afforded any support to General Goddard in his adventurous march across the peninsula. This created an undying friendship between the Bhopal dynasty and the British, who protected Bhopal against the Mahrattas. In 1817, during the Mahratta War, Lord Hastings concluded a defensive alliance with this state, and granted it five valuable provinces which had been taken from the Peshwa. The Bhopal state has long been governed by female rulers or begums, who have displayed great capacity for administration. The principality is said to be the best governed of the Indian native states. In the Indian Mutiny the Begum of Bhopal gave great assistance to the British, and both she and her daughter and successor were created knights of the Star of India.

Bhutan War, THE (1864-5). In the year 1862 a quarrel arose between the independent Bhutan state in the eastern Himalayas and the British government with reference to some frontier territories in Assam. Various outrages were committed by the Bhutias on British subjects, and in 1863 an embassy under the Hon. Ashley Eden was insulted and ill-treated. War was declared in November 1864. The Bhutias struggled desperately, but finally were compelled to sue for peace; they ceded the frontier districts of Assam, for which the British agreed to pay a yearly grant of 25,000 rupees.

Bible, ENGLISH TRANSLATIONS OF THE. In the early times of English Church history translations of portions of the Scriptures were undertaken for the use of the less learned priests. Bishop Aldhelm, of Sherborne (who died in 709), is said to have translated the Psalter. Bæda translated the Gospel of St. John, and finished the work on his death-bed in 735. King Alfred encouraged, if he did not actually undertake, the translation of the Gospels which was current in the tenth century. Towards the end of that century a Benedictine scholar, Elfric (who died Archbishop of Canterbury in 1005), translated parts of the Books of Moses, together with Joshua, Judges, Kings, Esther, Job, Maccabees, and Judith. After the Norman Conquest the early form of the English language gradually altered, and these translations became obsolete. In the middle of the thirteenth century a version of the whole Bible in Norman-French was current amongst the nobles. In the early fourteenth century two translations of the Psalms into English appeared almost at the same time. One was formerly erroneously ascribed to William of Shoreham, a Kentish priest; the other was by Robert Rolle, who is known as the Hermit of Hampole. The end of the fourteenth century saw the first complete version of the Bible into English, a work directed by John Wyclif (q.v.). Besides being a philosopher and theologian, Wyclif was also a fervent and diligent pastor. He was struck by the popular ignorance of the Bible, and resolved to remedy it. He himself, it has been thought, undertook the New Testament, while his friend and follower, Nicolas de Herford, began the translation of the Old Testament. Nicolas advanced in his work as far as the Book of Baruch, when he was called to account for a sermon which he had preached at Oxford. Wyclif perhaps completed the unfinished work, but it is more probable that the task was shared among several translators. It would seem that this translation was done by the end of 1382, and was rapidly disseminated among the people by itinerant preachers. The translation was made from the Latin version of St. Jerome, known as the Vulgate. There was a great difference in style between the work of the two chief translators. Nicolas de Herford gave a literal rendering of the Latin in a stiff and bald manner. Wyclif was less a slave to the original, and showed a power of forcible and idiomatic writing which sets his translation as the highest point in the development of Middle English prose. No sooner was the work done than Wyclif was aware that it needed revision. This task he at once began, and it was carried on after his death by his follower, John Purvey, who probably finished the revision in 1388, and thereby gave greater uniformity and precision to the work. The circulation of the Wyclifite versions in manuscript amongst the people did much to prepare the way for the doctrinal changes which the influence of the German reformers introduced amongst a growing party in the English Church. But Wyclif's translation existed only in manuscript, and the printing-press had begun to work its change in the spread of literature. A printed Bible was necessary, and this work was undertaken by a Cambridge scholar, William Tyndale (q.v.). He did not adopt Wyclif's version, because its language was by this time antiquated, and it was a translation of the Vulgate, whereas the knowledge of the Greek text had in his day made considerable progress amongst learned men. Tyndale translated the New Testament from the Greek text of Erasmus, but was obliged to withdraw to the continent for the purpose of printing it. In 1526 this translation, which was printed at Worms in 1525, was secretly introduced into England, and was largely circulated, though efforts were made by the bishops to seize the copies and commit them to the flames. Tyndale next began the translation of the Old Testament, and published, in 1530, an English version of the Pentateuch. He was continuing his labours when, in 1535, he was imprisoned at Antwerp, and was put to death as a heretic in the following year by the order of the Emperor Charles V. At his death his translation had advanced as far as the end of the Books of Chronicles. His work was revised by his friend and fellow-labourer, John Rogers, and its publication, under the name of Thomas Matthew (probably a wealthy merchant who found the funds for the undertaking), was begun secretly in Antwerp. Meanwhile, another English translation of the Bible was in progress at the hands of Miles Coverdale (q.v.), who was favoured by Cromwell. This translation was not made from the original, but was the result of a comparison of the Vulgate and the German translations. It was published secretly (probably at Zurich) in 1535, and dedicated to Henry VIII, to whom it was presented by Cranmer and Cromwell. Tyndale's version, as edited by Rogers, was completed from Coverdale's translation. It was published by Grafton, an English printer, in 1537, and received the king's licence. The royal sanction given to this transaction marked the final victory of the party which was in favour of doctrinal reform. From this time the knowledge of the Scriptures was no longer regarded as dangerous for the people, but was expressly sanctioned. The circulation of translations of the Scriptures was eagerly promoted. In 1539 was published at London an edition of Matthew's Bible, slightly revised by R. Taverner. In 1540 a considerable revision of this version was made under Cranmer's direction, and Cranmer's Bible, known also as the Great Bible, was the first "appointed to be read in churches" by royal command. In 1542 a reaction set in. The Roman party objected to Cranmer's Bible, and endeavoured to obtain a revision in their own favour. Henry VIII, by act of parliament, forbade the perusal of the New Testament in English to women, labourers, and uneducated persons. During the reigns of Edward VI and Mary nothing more was done in the way of translation. But at the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth appeared a new version, known as the Genevan Bible, because it was the work of English exiles at Geneva, where it was first published in 1560. Chief among the translators were Goodman, Whittingham, and Knox. It was translated from the Hebrew and the Greek, but, as was to be expected, betrayed leanings towards the theology of Calvin. In consequence of the existence of these various translations, Archbishop Parker thought it desirable to establish a uniform and amended edition. He accordingly distributed the various books of the Bible, as they stood in Cranmer's edition, amongst the bishops for revision, desiring them not to change the text save where it varied manifestly from the Hebrew or Greek original. The result of two years of revision was the publication, in 1568, of the Bishops' Bible. The Convocation of 1571 ordered that all Church officers should provide copies for use in their churches. Finally, the English Bible assumed its present form in the reign of James I. For the purpose of securing a complete revision, forty-seven of the most learned men in the kingdom were selected for the task. They divided themselves into three companies, which met at Westminster, Oxford, and Cambridge. Twenty-five undertook the Old Testament, fifteen the New Testament, and seven the Apocrypha. They worked under rules laid down by the king for their guidance. They were bidden to take as their basis the Bishops' Bible, and depart from it only when necessary. The work done by the separate committees was afterwards supervised and reduced to regularity by a committee of six persons. After three years' labour the version known as the Authorized Version was produced (1611). Some doubt, however, exists as to the nature of the authorization. It bears on its title-page the words "appointed to be read in churches"; but there exists no record of any authoritative or exclusive authorization. However, either by royal authority or by natural selection, the version of 1611 has ousted its predecessors, and for two centuries and a half was exclusively used in England. In 1870 the conviction that increased knowledge both of the text and of the language of the original, required an alteration of the Authorized Version found expression in the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury. Two companies for the revision of the Authorized Version were appointed, one for the Old Testament, the other for the New. The members were chosen from Biblical scholars of various Protestant denominations, and committees were formed in America for the purpose of acting with the English revisers. Following previous precedent, the object of the revisers was the revision of the Authorized Version with as few changes as was consistent with faithfulness. The Revised Version of the New Testament was completed in 1881, the Old Testament in 1884, and the Apocrypha only in 1895. The work, which was conceived on a most ambitious scale, gave rise to much controversy and unfavourable criticism, but the storm in recent years has died down, and the use of the new version has become general.

Bidasoa, THE PASSAGE OF THE (October 7, 1813), by the British in the Peninsular War, was a well-planned surprise of a remarkably strong position. The French held the heights of a lofty mountain group—the Rhune, the Commissari, and the Bayonette—and they had also strengthened their position by artificial works. Wellington, with great skill, concealed the real point of his attack. Suddenly, in the early morning of October 7, the columns of attack forded the river with such celerity that the French had hardly fired a gun before the troops formed up on the right bank. One after another the three ridges—the Bayonette, Commissari, and Puerto de Vera—were successively carried; but Clausel fell back on the Rhune, the strongest of all, and held it during the night. On the next day he retreated and concentrated his forces on the ridge behind Sarre.

Bigod, FAMILY OF. The first person bearing the name of Bigod to appear in English history is a certain Robert, described as a poor Norman knight in the service of William the Conqueror. Later we find a Roger Bigod (perhaps the son of the above) receiving a grant of many of the forfeited estates of Ralph de Guader, Earl of East Anglia (or Norfolk), together with the office of "dapifer" or steward in the king's household. This Roger died in 1107 and was succeeded by his son William, who, however, was drowned in the White Ship (1120). His younger son, Hugh, obtained the earldom of Norfolk from Stephen (date uncertain), and was confirmed in it by Henry II. He took part in the revolt of 1173, but made his submission in the next year. His son Roger, 2nd earl, and his grandson Hugh (afterwards 3rd earl), were among the twenty-five executors of Magna Carta. Hugh married Maud, eldest co-heiress of William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, and had two sons—Roger, 4th earl, who inherited the marshalship of England through his mother, and died without issue; and Hugh, who was appointed justiciar by the barons in 1258, and whose son Roger (q.v.) succeeded his uncle in the earldom in 1270.

Bigod, ROGER, 5TH EARL OF NORFOLK and MARSHAL OF ENGLAND (1246-1306) is well known as a leader of the opposition to the arbitrary taxation of Edward I's later years. He was, with Humphrey Bohun (q.v.), the constable, the hero of the famous altercation over the king's demand for service in Gascony in 1297. As hereditary leaders of the feudal host the earls refused to cross to France unless accompanied by the king in person. Edward departed to Flanders without them, and in his absence Bohun and Bigod, who had collected a large force, compelled the regent to agree to a confirmation of the Charters which was subsequently ratified by the king himself. In 1301 a further confirmation was extorted from Edward in the form of the "Articuli Super Cartas" (q.v.); but Bohun had died in 1298 and the power of Bigod was already declining. In 1302 he surrendered his lands to the king, receiving them back in tail; and on his death in 1306 without male issue they reverted to the Crown and the earldom became extinct in the Bigod family.

Billeting soldiers in private houses had become such an oppressive burden under Charles I that one of the clauses in the Petition of Right (q.v.) was expressly directed against the practice of quartering soldiers or mariners on private individuals against their will. The practice, however, still continued until an act passed in 1681 provided that "no officer, military or civil, or other persons, shall quarter or billet any soldier upon any inhabitant of the realm of any degree, quality, or profession without his consent." This act was suspended annually by the Mutiny Act, which allowed soldiers to be billeted on innkeepers and victuallers, until replaced by the Army Act of 1881, and supplemented by the Army (Annual) Act of 1909, which latter provided for the billeting of Territorial forces in cases of national emergency. A Naval Billeting Act was passed in 1914.

Bills, PARLIAMENTARY, are either public, dealing with matters of public policy, or private, being such as concern personal or local interests. The system by which legislation was founded on petition made it possible to alter the terms of the petition so that the statute should not really answer to the request, and even to found a statute on a petition in which the Commons had not concurred. These evils were remedied in the reign of Henry VI, when bills in the form of statutes began to be passed by both Houses. As the Commons have the sole right of taxation, the larger number of bills must originate with them. Bills on certain subjects, such as religion and trade, must originate in committee of the whole House. The mode of procedure with reference to bills is nearly the same in both Houses. In the Commons, however, a member has to obtain leave to bring in a bill, but this is not the case in the Lords. When leave is moved for, the title of the bill is read and its object is usually stated. If the motion is agreed to, the bill is ordered. It is then presented, and the question is put that it be now read the first time. This question must be decided without amendment or debate. If it is negatived, the bill disappears from the orders, but the question may be again brought forward. If it is carried, the question is put that it be read a second time, a day is fixed for the second reading, and the bill is printed. When the day comes the bill appears in the orders, and the question is put that it be now read a second time. This is the critical stage, and the whole principle can now be made a matter of debate. A bill may be opposed at all its stages, but as it is at this point that opposition is generally made, it is well to speak of this subject here. It is usual, in opposing a bill, to do so by an amendment of postponement for three or six months, or by some resolution contrary to the tenor of the measure. "The previous question" may also be moved. By this means, however, the bill is not extinguished and can be ordered for another day, while the postponement of a bill to a time when parliament will not be sitting, or the adoption of an adverse resolution, puts an end to it for the session. It is unusual to reject a bill in direct terms, and such a course would imply that it contained matter offensive to the House. When the bill has been read a second time, it is brought before the committee of the whole House, and receives any amendments which may be made to it. When it has received its final shape it is reported to the House. It has then to be read a third time, and after that the question is put "That this bill do pass," and on this it is not usual to divide. It is then sent up to the Lords or down to the Commons, as the case may be, and may be amended or rejected by the House which receives it. If it is amended, it is again sent to the House in which it originated, and if the amendments are disagreed upon, it is usual to send a message to state the reasons of the disagreement, or to desire a conference. When the bill is passed by both Houses it receives the royal assent, which may be given by commission, in the words, "Le roy le veut." The form of dissent, "Le roy s'avisera," has not been used since 1707, so that the Crown may be said in effect to have relinquished its right in this matter. The principle was early established that all money bills must originate with the Commons, and, though the Lords might until recently reject a money bill, they might not amend it. This gave rise to the unconstitutional practice of "tacking," by which, when the House of Commons wished to force a measure on the Lords, it was tacked on to a money bill, so that the Lords had to pass the bill entire or refuse the supply. This plan was adopted on the questions of the Irish Forfeitures, 1699, and of the Occasional Conformity Bill, 1705. The rejection by the Lords of the bill repealing the paper duty, May 21, 1860, was viewed with much jealousy by the Commons, and such rejection was made almost impossible for the future by including the whole financial scheme of the budget in a single act. In 1909 the question of the financial powers of the Lords was raised again in an acute form, when Mr. Lloyd George's budget was rejected by the Upper House. The result was the Parliament Act of 1911 (q.v.), which deprived the Lords of the last vestiges of control in financial affairs, and further provided that any bill, other than a money bill, which passed the Commons in three successive sessions should become law irrespective of the consent of the Upper House.

Petitions to parliament on private matters occasioned the appointment of Receivers and Triers of Petitions. These officers, if they found no redress for the wrong complained of in the courts, referred the matter to parliament. Petitions to the Commons are frequent from the reign of Henry IV. From these petitions private bills took their rise. These pass through the same stages as public bills. In dealing with them the judicial functions of parliament are especially prominent. Private bills are brought in on petition and at the expense of the promoters. Before a private bill is brought in, it is subjected to examiners of both Houses, who see that the standing orders are complied with. The second reading of a private bill affirms the claim, but only on the supposition that the facts stated in the preamble can be made good. It is referred, if opposed, to a select or special committee to decide on this, and by this committee the question between the petitioners and their opponents is heard and determined. [PARLIAMENT.]

Bingham, Sir Richard (1528-99), who was employed in Ireland, 1579, was one of Elizabeth's most able naval officers. In 1586 he was employed on service in Ireland, and cut to pieces a Scots force which had landed to join the rebels on the banks of the Moy. As governor of Connaught, he gained considerable notoriety by putting to death all the Spaniards who were wrecked on the coast of Ireland after the dispersion of the Armada in 1588.

Birinus (d. 650), the apostle of Wessex, was perhaps Irish by birth, and was commissioned by Pope Honorius to "scatter the seeds of the holy faith in those farthest inland territories of the English which no teacher had yet visited." Landing in Wessex in 634, he found the people still pagan, and accordingly preached the Gospel there. Thanks to the influence of Oswald of Northumbria, the ally and probably also the overlord of Wessex, he met with immediate success. The king, Cynegils, and perhaps also his son Cwichelm, were baptized, and Birinus was made first Bishop of Dorchester (on the Thames), whence he "went up and down among the West Saxons—that is, from Dorset to Buckinghamshire, from Surrey to the Severn—preaching, catechizing, baptizing, calling many people to the Lord, and building and dedicating churches."

Birmingham, as a market town, is of considerable antiquity. Previous to the Conquest it formed part of the possessions of a family of the same name, and the manor continued to belong to the Birminghams till the sixteenth century. In Leland's time it was already known for its cutlery and hardware manufactures. During the Civil War Prince Rupert's passage through the town, in 1643, was resolutely opposed by the inhabitants, and a sharp skirmish took place. Birmingham shared largely in the industrial movement at the close of the eighteenth century, and rapidly reached a position of importance among English towns. Its inhabitants took a very prominent share in the transactions which led to the Reform Bill of 1832. It received the franchise by that measure, and in 1838 was granted a municipal constitution under the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835. The university received its charter in 1900, and a bishopric of Birmingham was created in 1904. Since 1910 the population has increased greatly in size, and Birmingham now ranks as the third largest city in Great Britain. Under the act of 1918 it sends twelve members to parliament.

Birmingham Political Union,

THE, was an association formed in the beginning of 1830. Its original purpose was to obtain a repeal of the act of 1819 for the resumption of cash payments; but it soon adopted the programme of parliamentary reform, and became the centre of the agitation for that purpose. As early as February 1830 it was noticed and denounced in the House of Commons by Huskisson. Its leading member was Thomas Attwood (q.v.), who afterwards sat in the reformed parliament for Birmingham. The original design was "to form a general political union between the lower and middle classes of the people"; and as the political unions of many other places were affiliated to that of Birmingham, it may be said that the reform agitators of that town were practically at the head of the movement. When the House of Lords showed a disposition to reject the bill, immense meetings were held under the auspices of the Birmingham Union, in which threats of refusal to pay taxes, and even of open violence, were freely used. In 1831 a proclamation was issued against political unions, and, in consequence, the Birmingham Union considerably modified its organization. It continued, however, to display great activity, and on May 10, 1832, all the unions of the Midland counties assembled at Newhall Hill, Birmingham, to the number of 150,000 members. Such proofs of the determination of the country had their effect on the House of Lords, and brought about the final acceptance of the bill.

Birmingham Riots (1791) arose out of the intolerant party spirit which was largely evoked in England by the events of the French Revolution of 1789. In many places associations had been formed for the celebration of July 14 as the anniversary of the Revolution. The extreme Tories, who styled themselves "the friends of order," everywhere took alarm; and in Birmingham a handbill was circulated in which the principles and objects of the association were grossly exaggerated or misrepresented. The association at once denied its authenticity, and at first thought of giving up the meeting in consequence of the feeling excited by the circular. This opinion was, however, overruled; and the meeting took place on July 14. While the members of the association were at dinner, the hotel was surrounded by a mob, who, after shouting "Church and King!" for half an hour, retired only to return in redoubled force. They then broke into the house, but found that the members had fled. Baffled and disappointed, they diverted their fury upon two Dissenting chapels, which they demolished. They next attacked the house of Dr. Priestley, and setting fire to it burnt it, together with the valuable library of its owner; and for two days and nights they carried on the work of destruction against the property of prominent Dissenters. On the third day their efforts slackened, and on the fourth several squadrons of cavalry coming into the town soon restored order.

Bishop. The highest order of clergy in the Church. The early British Church was organized under bishops, three of whom are said to have been present at the Council of Arles in 314. Christianity, which died away before the invasion of the English, was brought back in southern England by the Roman missionary Augustine, who, under the direction of Pope Gregory I, established bishops to direct the ecclesiastical affairs of his converts. In Northumbria the Columban missionaries had monastic bishops after their custom. When the conversion of England was completed, and the Church united under the Roman organization, Archbishop Theodore (668-93) carried out the work of diocesan arrangement. The whole of England was divided into dioceses which were the sphere of administration of a bishop. England was also divided into two ecclesiastical provinces, over each of which was set an archbishop. The mode of electing bishops seems to have varied; sometimes the clergy appointed, sometimes the king in the witenagemot. The bishops sat in the witenagemot, and also in the shiremoots; they had temporal jurisdiction within their own lands; moreover, they exercised a penitential discipline over moral offenders, and judged the offences of the clergy. The connexion between Church and State was close, and we find no disputes between the ecclesiastical and secular jurisdiction. Similarly, national or provincial councils made canons for the Church, frequently in the presence of the king and ealdormen. Bishops soon showed themselves statesmen, and Dunstan may be reckoned as the first great English minister. After the Norman Conquest William I recognized the political importance of bishops by dispossessing the English occupants of their sees and setting Normans in their stead. Archbishop Lanfranc was in all things William I's chief adviser, and by his influence the ecclesiastical courts were separated from the secular courts. The bishops no longer held pleas in the hundred court or shire court, but in courts of their own, which alone decided spiritual cases according to canon law. William II applied to the lands of bishops the full rigour of feudal extortion, and kept bishoprics vacant that he might himself receive their revenues. Under Henry I Anselm raised the question of investitures—he refused to receive at the hands of the king investiture to a spiritual office. The result of this conflict was a compromise (of Bec) [ANSELM], by which it was agreed that bishops were to receive the emblems of their spiritual office from spiritual persons, and were to do homage to the king for their temporalities. By this change the bishops were not really benefited; their constitutional position was made more like that of barons, and lost much of its distinctive character. The election to bishoprics, according to the canons, was invested in the chapter of the cathedral churches; but practically their right was exercised in accordance with the royal will. The methods of capitular elections frequently led to disputes, which were referred to the decision of the pope. In 1206 Pope Innocent III rejected both the nominee of the king and of the chapter of Canterbury, and appointed Stephen Langton archbishop. From this time the popes frequently appointed, and appeals were common. The system of provisions was in the next century extended to bishoprics. But as the Crown grew stronger in the next century the king nominated, and the pope appointed the same person by provision. Papal interference was strong enough to overthrow the rights of chapters, but was powerless against a strong king.

The bishops of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries were a strong element in the resistance to the royal oppression, and rank amongst the staunchest upholders of English liberties. But the growth of Lollardism in the fourteenth century led them to support the Crown, and under Henry VIII they were unable to oppose the royal will. The alternations of religious policy in the reigns of Edward VI, Mary, and Elizabeth, led to frequent deprivations, imprisonment, and in the case of Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, to the execution of bishops. In the reigns of Edward VI and Elizabeth the rapacity of courtiers despoiled the sees of many of their possessions. Elizabeth showed her bishops scant courtesy, suspended them at her pleasure, and even threatened them with deposition. From that time, with the exception of the reign of Charles I, bishops exercised little political influence. Under the Commonwealth episcopacy was abolished, and bishops were dispossessed of their sees till the Restoration. The petition of the Seven Bishops (q.v.) to James II against his Declaration of Indulgence, and their subsequent trial for libel and acquittal, is the last time when the action of bishops materially affected the course of English history.

At present a bishop is the head of the clergy within his diocese. He has the power of ordaining priests and deacons, of consecrating churches, and performing certain ecclesiastical acts according to the law of the Church; he is an ecclesiastical judge in certain cases within his diocese, and exercises disciplinary power over his clergy. [There are at present (1926) two archbishops and thirty-six bishops in England and one archbishop and five bishops in Wales; but two new sees are already in process of creation.] The archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the bishops of London, Durham, and Winchester, always sit as lords spiritual in the House of Lords; of the other bishops, twenty-one are summoned (apart from suffragans) in order of seniority of creation. The Bishop of Sodor and Man is in no case a lord spiritual, and by an act of 1847 it was enacted that the number of lords spiritual should not be increased by the creation of new bishoprics. [The bishops form the upper house of Convocation in the two provinces of York and Canterbury and the House of Bishops in the National Assembly as constituted in 1919.] The election to bishoprics was settled by an act of 1544; providing that the king send to the dean and chapter his licence to elect, called his congé d'élire, which is always accompanied by a statement of the person whom he would have them elect; if they delay above twelve days the king may nominate. In the year 1848 the dean and chapter of Hereford elected, according to the royal congé d'élire, Dr. Hampden; but at the time of his confirmation objections against him were tendered. The Court of Queen's Bench decided that these objections need not be received, as the congé d'élire was imperative. Thus the appointment to bishoprics is practically vested in the Crown, which acts on the advice of its ministers.

Bishopric. The sphere within which a bishop exercises his authority. In the British Church there seem to have been three bishoprics (at London, Lincoln, and York) corresponding to the three provinces into which Britain was divided by the Romans. When in 597 Pope Gregory I sent Augustine to evangelize England, his scheme for ecclesiastical organization was that London and York should be the centres of the island. Augustine was to be Bishop of London with twelve suffragans, and was to send another to York, who was in turn to have twelve suffragans. This scheme was not fully carried out; but the formation of sees marks the progress of the conversion of England, and the sees followed the divisions of kingdoms or tribes. Augustine at Canterbury was Bishop of Kent; in 604 he set up Justus at Rochester as Bishop of West Kent, and Mellitus at London as Bishop of the East Saxons. In 625 Paulinus was ordained bishop of the Northumbrians with his see at York; but the work of Paulinus did not last, and Northumbria received Christianity from the Columban monks of Iona, one of whom, Aidan, was made Bishop of Lindisfarne in 635. In 630 Felix created the see of East Anglia at Dunwich. In 634 the West Saxons received as bishop Birinus, who fixed his seat at Dorchester. The see of Mercia was, in 656, set up at Lichfield. Thus the early kingdoms received bishops, and were converted into ecclesiastical dioceses. The further organization of England was due to the energy of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Theodore, a monk of Tarsus, who laboured from 669 to 693. He broke up the large dioceses, but in so doing followed the lines of tribal arrangements that were earlier than the seven kingdoms. He divided East Anglia into north and south, and set a bishop over the northern part at Elmham in 673. He established a see for the Hecanas at Hereford in 676, and for the Lindiswaras at Sidnacheater in 678. The Northumbrian Church had before this conformed to the Roman use. Its large extent was divided by the recognition of York as the see of the Deirans, while Bernicia was divided between Lindisfarne and Hexham, which was made a see in 678; in 681 the Northumbrian dominions in Strathclyde received a bishop at Whithern. In 680 the Hwiccas had a bishop at Worcester, and the Middle-Angles at Leicester. In 681 a mission see for the South Saxons was set up at Selsey, and in 705 Wessex was divided by a new see at Sherborne. In 909 King Edward the Elder divided the see of Sherborne, and gave the men of Somerset a bishop at Wells, and the men of Devon a bishop at Crediton. The troubles of Northumbria affected its episcopal arrangements; after 814 no bishop of Hexham was appointed, and through the ravages of the Picts the bishopric of Whithern ceased about 810. In 875 the monks of Lindisfarne were driven to quit their monastery, carrying with them the body of St. Cuthbert; they settled at Chester-le-Street, whence they were again driven in 990, and finally settled at Durham in 995.

At the time of the Norman Conquest episcopal sees were transferred from villages to cities, as being more convenient. Already in 1050 the see of Crediton had been changed to Exeter. In 1075 the see of Sherborne was removed to Old Sarum, that of Selsey to Chichester, and that of Lichfield to Chester and then to Coventry. The see of Dorchester was removed to Lincoln in 1085. In 1088 the see of Wells was transferred to Bath; that of Elmham, which had been transferred to Thetford in 1078, was finally established in Norwich in 1101. With the gradual conquest of South Wales the British Church lost its independence, and received Norman bishops. The Archbishop of St. David's (who had never perhaps exercised any practical authority over the other Welsh bishops) became a suffragan of the province of Canterbury in 1115; Bangor and Llandaff soon afterwards; and the see of St. Asaph was established (or possibly only re-established) in 1143. Moreover, Henry I cared for the interests of the Church in England by subdividing the huge diocese of Lincoln in 1109, and setting a bishop over the great minster of Ely. In like manner the allegiance of the new English possession of Cumberland was strengthened by the appointment of a Bishop of Carlisle in 1133.

From this time till the Reformation no new sees were created. After the dissolution of the monasteries, Henry VIII made some show of restoring the goods of the Church by the creation of six new bishoprics—Westminster in 1540, Gloucester, Chester, Peterborough, and Oxford in 1541, Bristol in 1542. The see of Westminster did not long continue. Its first occupant, Thomas Thirlby, wasted its possessions; he was translated to Norwich in 1550, and the see was dissolved. In 1542 the ancient see of Sodor and Man, which was founded by Pope Gregory IV, was annexed to the province of York; but as the island of Man did not come into the possession of the Crown till 1825, its bishop was never a lord of parliament. No further creations were made till the increase of population in the nineteenth century led to the formation of the see of Ripon in 1836, and of Manchester in 1847. In 1836 the sees of Gloucester and Bristol were united, but were again separated in 1897. Several new sees were created by voluntary effort, according to the provision of an act of parliament. The sees of Truro and St. Albans were founded in 1877, that of Liverpool in 1880, that of Newcastle in 1882, that of Southwell in 1883, that of Wakefield in 1884, that of Southwark in 1905, and that of Birmingham in 1904.

[In 1914 Chelmsford, St. Edmundsbury and Ipswich, and Sheffield were created bishoprics; in 1918 Coventry was made an independent see; and in 1920 a new diocese was established at Bradford. In 1926 considerable changes were again inaugurated and bishoprics were erected at Leicester, Blackburn, Guildford, and Portsmouth. In Wales, since the Disestablishment Act of 1914, new sees have been created at Monmouth, Swansea and Brecon.] [M. C.]

Bishopric, THE, was a special title given to the patrimony of St. Cuthbert, which was ruled by the Bishops of Durham. On Cuthbert's consecration as Bishop of Lindisfarne in 683, Egfrid, the Northumbrian king, made him large grants of land round Lindisfarne, as well as the vill of Craik near York, and the town of Carlisle. In 883 the monks of Lindisfarne were fleeing with the body of their patron saint before the Danish invaders. The Danish king was dead, and his host was without a leader. According to tradition, St. Cuthbert appeared in a vision to Abbot Eadred, and bade him tell the Danes to take as their king a young captive who was a slave. The Danes obeyed the admonition, and their new king, Guthred, aided by the advice of Alfred the Great, showed his gratitude by conferring on St. Cuthbert the land between the Tyne and the Wear. Over this new grant, and the old lands of the church of Lindisfarne, the bishop was given the rights and dignities of the king. Bishop Cutheard (900–15) purchased the ancient parish of Bedlington north of the Tyne, with an area of thirty square miles, and received a grant of similar jurisdiction over it. It is probable that William the Conqueror, finding this state of things, considered it desirable to leave it unchanged. In the thirteenth century the process was completed and the lands of the church of Durham were finally organized as a county palatine. [COUNTIES PALATINE.] The bishopric was not co-extensive with the diocese of Durham. It consisted of the modern county of Durham, and the districts known as Bedlingtonshire, Islandshire, and Norhamshire. Within this the bishop held his own courts and appointed his own officers; writs ran in his name, and he had his own mint. The men of the bishopric were similarly privileged, and went by the name of Haliwerefolc, men for the defence of St. Cuthbert and his patrimony. This exceptional position continued till the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recommended its abolition in 1833, and with the death of Bishop van Mildert, in 1836, the Bishopric came to an end.

Bishops, SUFFRAGAN. In 1534 an act was passed indicating twenty-six new bishops suffragan in place of the Roman bishops in partibus infidelium who had previously assisted the English bishops in their dioceses. Seven bishops were appointed under it, but the movement was then dropped until 1871, when the act was revived as a means of affording assistance to the bishops of populous dioceses.

Bishops, THE SEVEN, is the appellation usually given to the prelates who were tried for their resistance to James II's Declaration of Indulgence (q.v.). On April 27, 1688, the king issued his second Declaration of Indulgence, and on May 4 an order in council enjoined that it should be read in all churches on two successive Sundays, the bishops being required to distribute copies of it in their dioceses. The Primate Sancroft and six bishops (Ken of Bath and Wells, White of Peterborough, Lloyd of St. Asaph, Trelawny of Bristol, Lake of Chichester, and Turner of Ely) drew up and presented a petition, declaring the loyalty of the Church, but begging to be excused from reading in divine service an illegal declaration, since parliament had declared that the sovereign had no power to dispense with statutes. "This is the standard of rebellion," James said as he read it; and, when only four churches in London obeyed the order, he determined to take his revenge by trying the bishops for publishing a seditious libel. The bishops, after having at the king's command acknowledged their writing, were committed to the Tower, where they were visited by many Whig peers and a deputation of Nonconformist sympathizers. When the trial came on (June 8) the handwriting was proved by the clerk, who had heard the bishops' confession; and Sunderland, whom they had begged to present it, proved the publishing. Among the counsel for the defence was Somers, afterwards chancellor, whose speech on this occasion created his reputation. After some hours' disputing, the king's brewer, who was on the jury, was persuaded to risk the loss of royal patronage, and a verdict of not guilty was returned (June 30). The action of the king in this matter lost him the active support of the Church, and disposed it to acquiesce in the measures of William of Orange.

Black Act, THE (1722), was the name given to an act passed to check the outrages committed by persons with their faces blackened or otherwise disguised, who appeared in Epping Forest, near Waltham, and destroyed the deer. The penalty of death was imposed on all such transgressors of the law. The act was made perpetual in 1758, but was repealed in 1827.

Black Assize. [ASSIZES, THE BLACK.]

Black Death, THE. This name has been given to an epidemic disease of fearful destructiveness which devastated England, in common with the rest of Europe, in 1348-9, and burst forth anew in 1361-2, and again in 1369. In contemporary and later literature it is usually called the "Pestilence," or the "Great Pestilence," under the former of which expressions it is mentioned by both Chaucer and Langland. It is regarded as having been merely an aggravated outburst of the bubonic and pneumonic plague. Whether disturbances of nature were answerable for the visitation may be questioned; but there is abundance of evidence to prove their actual occurrence, and the ablest scientific writer on the subject—Hecker—has no doubt of the connexion between the adulteration of the air that followed them and the virulence of the pestilence.

"This disease," he says, "was a consequence of violent commotions in the earth's organism—if any disease of cosmical origin can be so considered." It would be safe at least to suspect that the lingering traces of the epidemic of 1342, and the general physical demoralization produced by the disturbance of the conditions of life, left men's bodies an easier prey to the malignant agency. The quickening power, however, came from the East. [Its place of origin has never been satisfactorily determined. "Russian records place it in India, Greek in Scythia, English in India and Asiatic Turkey, Arabian in Tartary and the land of darkness. According to Indian tradition it originated in Cathay, to the north of China, and spread in every direction from that focus; northward by Bokhara and Tartary to the Black Sea; to India and the towns south of the Caspian, and to Asia Minor; and by way of Baghdad through Arabia and Egypt to the north of Africa" (Dr. Crawford). It appears to have arrived from the Levant in ships calling at the Mediterranean ports, notably Genoa and Marseilles. Early in 1348 it had established itself in France and Italy. In papal Avignon it broke out with unsparing fury, and in the heat of summer, Clement VII, with fires roaring in the hearths of his palace, "strove with rare energy to give peace to a distracted world."] It advanced to Spain, and early in April appeared at Florence, where it came under the observation of Boccaccio, who has left a detailed account of its action. Passing through France and visiting, but not as yet ravaging, Germany, it made its way to England. This country it entered at Weymouth, where it cut down its first English victims in August 1348. Thence it travelled—by way of Devon and Somerset, of Bristol, Gloucester, and Oxford—to London, but so slowly that winter had begun before it reached the capital. Soon it embraced the whole kingdom. Its chief symptoms in this country were spitting, in some cases actual vomiting, of blood, the breaking out of inflammatory boils in parts, or over the whole, of the body, and the appearance of those dark blotches upon the skin which suggested its most startling name. Some of its victims died almost on the first attack, some in twelve hours, some in two days, almost all within the first three. Before it medical skill was powerless; few recovered, until, as the plague drew towards its close, men bethought them of opening the hard, dry boils—a treatment that relieved the system of the venom and saved many lives. Contagion bore it everywhere; the clothes, the breath, everything the patient touched, the very air that surrounded him, were thought to be poisoned with it; even a glance of his eye, men fancied, might strike down the onlooker. [Bubonic plague is now regarded as being chiefly conveyed by rats, bugs, and fleas; hence the great virulence of the Black Death among the very poor.] Its career in England on this visitation lasted for about a year; but its destructive energy would seem to have been at its height between May 1349 and the following Michaelmas, the summer heats doubtless stimulating its fury. The havoc it made in the population far exceeded that made by any similar scourge recorded in history; the exaggerations of a contemporary annalist, gross as they are, help us to realize its extent. "Towns, once close packed with men, were stripped of their inhabitants; and to so pernicious a power did the plague rise that the living were scarce able to bury the dead. In certain religious houses, out of twenty inmates there hardly survived two. By several it was reckoned that barely a tenth part of the population had been left alive." It is stated that it slew 100,000 human beings in London—50,000 of whom were buried in a plot of ground which Sir Walter Manny had bought for the purpose, a space now covered by Smithfield—nearly 60,000 in Norwich, and proportionate numbers in Bristol and other leading cities. These numbers are thought incredible; but one scrupulously careful writer has found evidence which satisfies him that at least half the population died by this outbreak, whilst another, of equal industry, admits that the full sum of the victims cannot have been less than a third. And the leaning of historians is generally towards the higher reckoning, by which the actual carnage would amount, at highest, to 2,500,000, at lowest to 1,500,000, for the estimates of the population at the time range from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000. [Although recent research has been unable to establish any more definite statistics of mortality, it yet seems probable that the very high figures accepted by nineteenth-century historians should be regarded with caution, since our information only refers to certain classes of persons, and recent inquiry has shown that some localities suffered very little loss.] For obvious reasons, the mortality was greatest among the clergy and the humbler classes; yet the contagion reached even the highest. A newly-elected primate, Bradwardine, and Edward III's daughter, Joan, caught it and perished. For a time its progress seemed arrested by the Scottish border, and "the foul death of the English" is said to have been a favourite oath with the Scots, who felt a malicious pleasure in their enemies' misfortunes; but the scoffers soon involved themselves in the same disasters by making a foolish raid into England, and the work of death went forward in Scotland also. The disease passed over to Ireland, where, if report can be trusted, it discriminated between the intruding English and the natives; the former were taken and the latter left. Its immediate effects on society were of the kind usual in such frightful calamities. Humanity showed itself at its worst and its best; there was much reckless profligacy and revolting selfishness, but not a few examples of self-sacrificing devotion. The terror-stricken rushed to religion for comfort and help; many gave up lands and goods, and sought a haven in monasteries; an earlier and fiercer fanaticism—that of the Flagellants (q.v.)—was reorganized, and fascinated or horrified men by its ghastly ritual. [Yet the cult failed to make the same way among the sober English as it was achieving on the continent.] The permanent impression that the Black Death made on the human memory is shown in several ways—in this conspicuously, that it was set up as a fixed mark to reckon time from; it was long a practice to date charters and legal instruments from it. The visitations of 1361-2 and 1369 were also formidable in the extent of their ravages, yet mild as compared with their terrible predecessor. They may be regarded as stages in the gradual settling down of the "great mortality" into the endemic state that it remained in for centuries. [The effects of the plague on rural economy have for long been the subject of intense interest among historians, whose opinions have swung from the view that it produced a cataclysmic change and was the chief factor in the breakdown of manorial organization, to the contention that its effects were ephemeral and generally negligible from the standpoint of agrarian development. A diminution in the total population of something between a third and a half must have raised considerably the amount of money per head of population. In the same way the amount of labour required from each worker, if the normal production of food were to be maintained, was also increased. Hired labour naturally became scarce for a year or two. It could demand an increase in wage rates of nearly 50 per cent. beyond what was paid before the pestilence, and manorial lords on whose estates the tendency (working side by side with the progress of commutation) had for some time been to hire workers in increasing numbers, found themselves crippled in many cases by their swollen wage-bill. One of the results of their dissatisfaction was the promotion of the Statutes of Labourers (q.v.), measures which attempted to reimpose the old rates of wages and commodity prices, and to put a check on the increasing mobility of free labour. There is evidence to show that survivors among the villein tenantry often found sufficient incentive elsewhere to tempt them to flee from the manor to which they were tied, and either to join the class of hired wage-earners or to find a new holding in an area where the landlord was prepared to offer more favourable terms. There seems to be little doubt that the Black Death stimulated landlords in many districts to rent out their demesne either in whole or in part, a movement which much impressed Thorold Rogers, who saw in the stock-and-land lease of this period a potent factor in the break-up of the manor. Certainly, where such a modification of the manorial scheme was adopted, the new conditions would lead the lord to commute for money rents those services which had previously been employed in the cultivation of the land in question; and thus it may be argued that the Black Death was a hastening influence in the progress of commutation. On the whole, recent study of manorial records has not produced the evidence required to prove the existence of any marked alteration in the rate of commutation attributable to the pestilence.

It should be remembered that the economic changes under discussion should not be given the same importance in the country north of the Trent (where the manorial system of the south had never had such strong roots), and in the western counties, where commutation of services was already almost complete.] [COMMUTATION; LABOURERS, STATUTES OF; PEASANTS' REVOLT.]

Black Friday is the name given (a) to May 11, 1866, when a commercial panic was at its height in London, occasioned by the failure of Overend, Gurney and Co.; (b) to April 15, 1921, the day on which the Triple Industrial Alliance strike (q.v.) came to an end.

Black Hole of Calcutta, THE (June 20, 1756). Suraj-ud-Dowlah, the Nawab of Bengal, a young man, cruel, effeminate, and debauched, who succeeded Ali Vardi Khan early in 1756, was greatly enraged with the British at Calcutta for concealing a fugitive from him. He marched down on Calcutta on June 18 on the pretence that the British had erected some new fortifications without consulting him. The town was ill-prepared to resist an assault, and was moreover weakened by the disgraceful desertion of Mr. Drake, the governor, with the military commandant, who slipped off unperceived, and rowed down to the ships. Mr. Holwell was thereupon placed in command by common consent, and the fort was gallantly held for forty-eight hours, when it became necessary to surrender. The Nawab gave Holwell every assurance of protection, and retired about dusk to his encampment. In spite of this the prisoners, 156 in number, were thrust into a narrow chamber, some twenty feet square, which had been used as the prison of the garrison, and, however suited for the confinement of a few turbulent soldiers, meant simply death to the crowd thrust into it at the sword's point in one of the hottest nights of the most sultry season of the year. The agonies endured during this terrible night were horrible beyond expression. The night was intensely hot, and as the torments of thirst and suffocation came upon them, the prisoners struggled with one another for a mouthful of fresh air at the windows. They insulted the guards to induce them to fire on them. The majority died in raving madness; and the few who survived owed their lives to the freer ventilation obtained by standing on the bodies of their dead or dying companions. Twenty-three ghastly survivors alone were dragged out the next morning. Mr. Holwell was so broken that he had to be carried before the Nawab, who manifested no compunction at the results of his infamous cruelty.

Black Mountain War, THE (1868).

The Hassanzai tribe of Afghans, inhabiting the Agror Valley in the Black Mountain range, broke out into hostilities and attacked a police station. As they showed no disposition to submit, General Wilde was sent against them, September 26, and after various operations, which lasted till November 7, reduced the insurgents, who submitted, and the force was withdrawn on November 10. Black Prince. [EDWARD THE BLACK PRINCE.]

Black Rod, or "GENTLEMAN USHER OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS," is an official instituted in 1350, appointed by letters patent and responsible for the maintenance of order in the House of Lords. He has also the duty of summoning the Commons and the Speaker to the House of Lords to hear a speech from the throne or the royal assent to bills. On such occasions the door of the House of Commons is closed against him, and he strikes on it three times. On being admitted he advances to the bar and delivers his summons. This procedure dates from the attempt of Charles I to arrest the five members in 1642.

Black Sea Conference, THE. In 1871, in consequence of a declaration by Russia that she would no longer be bound by the Treaty of Paris of 1856 with regard to the navigation of the Black Sea, a conference of the powers was invited to meet at London to settle the questions. In assuming a right to abolish her own treaty engagements, there can be no doubt that Russia counted upon some general understanding she had arrived at with Prussia, to the effect that the latter power would assist her in effecting her wishes. Some delay arose in the assembling of the conference owing to the anomalous position of France, but on December 18 Lord Granville received a formal intimation that a French plenipotentiary would present himself at the conference. The emergency at Paris, however, prevented this, and the representatives of the other powers proceeded (January 17) to deliberate without France; but the Duc de Broglie, the French plenipotentiary, eventually appeared on March 13. As the result of the conference the Treaty of London was concluded. Its provisions were that articles XI, XIII, and XIV of the Treaty of Paris, 1856, should be abrogated; that the principle of closing the Dardanelles and Bosphorus should be maintained with power to the Sultan to open the said straits to the fleets of friendly and allied powers, in the event that the execution of the stipulations of the Treaty of Paris should require it; and that the commission for managing the navigation of the Danube should be continued in its existing form for a further period of twelve years. The result of this treaty was to open the Black Sea to Russian ships of war, and to allow the Sultan to open the Dardanelles to foreign ships of war if the defence of his throne required it.

Blackburn Riots, THE (1826), were a demonstration by the weavers of Lancashire against the use of machinery. In April a large number of persons assembled at Henfield and proceeded to Accrington, where they demolished the machinery in several mills. The mob then proceeded to Blackburn, and, though a party of dragoons arrived there as soon as the rioters, they could not prevent them from breaking into the factory of Messrs. Bannister, Eccles and Co. A collision occurred; stones and fire-arms were freely used by the mob; and the Riot Act was read. A great deal of Messrs. Eccles's machinery was destroyed, and much damage done all through the town; and the excitement became so dangerous that the dragoons were ordered to clear the streets. The following day a great deal of destruction was completed, and another collision occurred between the rioters and the military, in which the former were finally routed by a discharge of musketry, nine persons being killed and several wounded. Similar riots broke out next day in Manchester. Troops, however, quickly poured into the disturbed districts, and the riotous assemblages were at an end.

Blackheath, THE BATTLE OF (June 22, 1497), was fought between the troops of Henry VII and the Cornish rebels. The rebels had taken up a strong position on a hill at Blackheath, within sight of London. The king had recalled the troops destined for service against Scotland, and had collected together at London a large army composed of all the fighting men in the neighbouring counties. He stationed one portion of his army (under his personal command) in St. George's Fields. A second detachment, under the command of the Earls of Oxford and Suffolk, was ordered to make a circuitous march round the hill occupied by the rebels, and take up as strong a position as possible in their rear.

The remainder of his forces, under Lord Daubeney, he sent forward to attack the rebels in front. The Cornishmen fought bravely; but ill-armed, ill-led, they were unable to offer any long resistance to the disciplined, well-equipped troops who attacked them in front and rear simultaneously. Two thousand of their number were slain, and the remainder surrendered. Among the large number of prisoners were the rebel leaders Lord Audley, Michael Joseph, and Thomas Flamank, who were put to death.

Blacklow Hill, an eminence between Warwick and Coventry, was the scene of the execution of Piers Gaveston by the revolted barons under the Earls of Lancaster and Warwick in 1312.

Blackmail was the compulsory payment exacted by the border chieftains from the dwellers in the more civilized districts on the English side in return for the protection of their cattle and goods. The levy of blackmail was made a felony by 43 Eliz. c. 13 (1601). The name was also given to the payment made to the chiefs of some of the Highland clans by those who lived in their neighbourhood in return for the immunity of their cattle from capture. It did not entirely cease till 1745.

Blackstone, SIR WILLIAM (1723-1780), legal writer and judge, was the posthumous son of a Cheapside silk-mercator, and was educated at the Charterhouse and Pembroke College, Oxford. He obtained a fellowship at All Souls, and was called to the bar by the Middle Temple in 1746. As bursar of All Souls he showed administrative skill and zeal for reform; and the building of the Codrington Library was mainly due to his exertions. In 1757 he was elected to a fellowship at Queen's College, and a year later he was elected to the newly-founded Vinerian Professorship of Law. In this capacity he delivered the lectures which were subsequently (1765) embodied in the "Commentaries." In 1761 he was appointed principal of New Inn Hall, a post which he held for five years in the vain hope of establishing at Oxford a college for legal education. He also during this period sat in parliament for Hendon and Westbury. From 1770 until his death he was one of the judges of the Common Pleas.

Blackwater, THE BATTLE OF (1598), was fought near the fort of that name in Tyrone. Hugh O'Neill, called the "arch rebel," here defeated the English marshal, Sir Henry Bagenal, who had marched to the relief of the fort. O'Neill killed the English leader with his own hands. One thousand two hundred of the English fell, and all their stores and ammunition were captured by the Irish, as well as the fort itself. The forces engaged on each side amounted to something like 5,000 men. This victory led at the time to an almost general revolt of the natives.

Bladensburg, THE BATTLE OF (August 24, 1814), fought during the American War, took its name from a small village on the left bank of the eastern branch of the Potomac. This position commanded the only bridge over the river; and here the American general, Winder, prepared to oppose the advance of the British, under General Ross, upon Washington. To effect their object it was necessary for the British to carry the bridge and the commanding position of the Americans. Ross accordingly formed his forces into two columns, one under Thornton, the other commanded by Brooke. The attack was entrusted to the former; and so fierce an onslaught did his column make upon the defenders of the bridge that it was carried immediately. On the other side of the river, Thornton's column was joined by Brooke's men, and a general attack was made upon the American position. One impetuous charge carried it, and the American army broke in confusion, and, flying through Washington, never stopped till they had taken up a position on the heights of Georgetown. The British entered Washington without encountering any further opposition.

Blake, ROBERT (1599-1657), was born at Bridgwater and educated at Oxford. He sat in the Long Parliament as member for Bridgwater. At the outbreak of the Civil War he raised a regiment, took part in the defence of Bristol, and successfully held Taunton against the Royalists. In 1649 Colonel Blake was appointed one of the commanders of the navy, and shortly afterwards warden of the Cinque Ports. He was eminently successful as a naval commander. He drove Prince Rupert from the British seas to take refuge in the Tagus, and in January 1651 destroyed almost the entire Royalist fleet in Malaga harbour. Later in the year he recovered the Channel Island fortresses from the Royalists, and was made a member of the council of state. In May 1652 he fought a sharp but indecisive action with the Dutch in the Strait of Dover; and on September 18 defeated them in the Downs. In November he fought a terrible engagement against the Dutch under Van Tromp, whose forces were greatly superior. The English were defeated and compelled to take refuge in the Thames. Blake was present in the bloody and obstinate engagements in February and June 1653, but, owing to ill-health, took no part in the great English victory of July 31, in which Van Tromp was killed. When war broke out between England and Spain in 1656, Blake was appointed to command the English fleet in the Mediterranean. In April 1657 he performed the daring feat of sailing into the harbour of Tenerife in spite of the fire from the forts, and captured a large fleet of galleons which lay at anchor there. He died the year following, just as he was entering Plymouth Sound. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, but after the Restoration his remains were disinterred and hung at Tyburn. Clarendon speaks in very high terms of his ability as a naval commander. "He was the first man that declined the old track, and made it manifest that the science might be attained in less time than was imagined; and despised those rules which had been long in practice, to keep his ship and his men out of danger, which had been held in former times a point of great ability and circumspection; as if the principal art requisite in the captain of a ship had been to be sure to come safe home again."

Blanche, DAUGHTER OF HENRY IV (1392-1409), was married in 1403 to Louis of Bavaria, eldest son of the Emperor Rupert.

Blanche of Lancaster. [LANCASTER, THE HOUSE OF.]

Blanche of Navarre, wife of Edmund Crouchback (second son of Henry III), and mother of Thomas of Lancaster (q.v.), was the daughter of Robert of Artois, brother of St. Louis, and the widow of Henry, King of Navarre.

Bland, JOHN (d. 1555), the rector of Adisham in Kent, was one of the martyrs of the Protestant persecution of Mary's reign. Being convicted of heresy by a commission composed of Thorneley, Bishop of Dover, Collins, the deputy of Cardinal Pole, and Nicholas Harpsfeld, the archdeacon, he was burnt at Canterbury.

Bland's Case (1585). John Bland, a currier of London, was brought to the bar of the House of Commons for using slanderous language, saying that the carriers could get no justice in the House, and that the shoemakers were unjustly favoured. On account of his poverty he was dismissed upon making his submission on his knees, and paying twenty shillings to the serjeant. This is an important precedent for the power of the House of Commons to punish even non-members for offences against its privileges.

Blanketeers. The name given to a body of Manchester workmen who met at St. Peter's Field, March 10, 1817, each man carrying a blanket or great-coat with him. It was intended to join the Derby rioters, and march on London; but the attempt proved completely abortive.

Blasphemy. Before the Reformation, offences against religion, of which blasphemy was one, were almost exclusively dealt with in the ecclesiastical courts, and several statutes, passed in the fifteenth century, gave the bishops power to deal with the offence. These powers were not finally dropped till the temporary suppression of the ecclesiastical courts in 1640, and their revival after the Restoration without the ex-officio oath. In 1676 the common law writ, de hæretico comburendo, was abolished by parliament; but the judges of King's Bench, like the Star Chamber, had already begun to treat blasphemy as a criminal misdemeanour at common law. It has been held to consist of denial of the being and providence of God, or uttering contumelious reproaches against Jesus Christ or the Holy Ghost, or denying the truth of Christianity. According to the celebrated judgment of Sir Matthew Hale in the case of Rex v. Taylor, "Christianity is parcel of the law of England, and therefore to reproach the Christian religion is to speak in subversion of the law" (1676). This rule was acted on for the next 150 years, and was extended from blasphemous words to blasphemous libels; but in the nineteenth century it was held (e.g., by Lord Coleridge in the case of Reg. v. Foote and Ramsay, in 1883) that a person may attack the fundamentals of religion without being guilty of a blasphemous libel "if the decencies of controversy are observed"; and this view has since been confirmed. Penalties against blasphemy were enacted by 9 and 10 Will. III, c. 32, by 53 Geo. III, c. 160, and by 60 Geo. III, c. 8; but no one has been debarred from office under the first of these acts, or banished according to the last, which was repealed in 1830. In Scotland a statute of 1661 prescribed the penalty of death for blasphemy, which was mitigated to fines and imprisonment by 6 Geo. IV, and 7 Will. IV, and 1 Vict., c. 5. If the blasphemy is published otherwise than by word of mouth, it is called a blasphemous libel.

Blenheim, THE BATTLE OF (August 13, 1704), was fought during the third campaign in the War of the Spanish Succession. Louis XIV had determined to menace Vienna, hoping to strike at the heart of the Austrian power, and at the same time to make full use of the assistance of his Bavarian ally. Marlborough, however, perceived his object and effected a junction with Prince Eugene, who commanded the Imperial forces in Würtemberg. They were hampered by their colleague, Prince Louis of Baden, a general of the old formal school. The Schellenberg, a hill above Donauwörth, was stormed, and the Bavarians driven from it. Next day Marshal Tallard effected a junction with the armies of Marshal Marsin and the Elector of Bavaria. Marlborough and Eugene got rid of Louis of Baden by persuading him to attack the fortress of Ingolstadt, and prepared for a decisive battle near Blindheim or Blenheim. This village was situated on the northern bank of the Danube, near the place where it is joined by a little brook, the Nebel. About two miles away, and nearly parallel to the river, is a range of low wooded hills. The small stream of the Nebel runs from these hills. The Nebel divided the two armies. Marlborough commanded the left of the allied forces, Eugene the right. Tallard was opposed to Marlborough, the Elector of Bavaria and Marsin to Eugene. Tallard committed the great error of throwing all his best troops into Blenheim, thereby weakening the centre. The attack of Lord Cutts on the village was repulsed. Marlborough, seeing the weakness of the French centre, threw his cavalry across the Nebel, and after a terrific struggle cut the French line in two. Meanwhile, on the right, Eugene only saved the battle by the steadiness of his Prussian infantry. He had been greatly hampered by the difficulties of the ground. Marlborough's cavalry charge on the French centre had won the day. The French cavalry fled; Tallard was taken prisoner. The French troops in Blenheim were surrounded, and surrendered after a gallant resistance; but the forces opposed to Eugene retreated in good order. The allies are computed to have lost 11,000 men out of an army of 52,000, the French altogether 40,000 out of 60,000, including 14,000 prisoners. The broken army of the enemy retreated with extreme rapidity, and withdrew beyond the Rhine.

Bligh, CAPTAIN WILLIAM (1754-1817), well known in connexion with the mutiny on the Bounty, in April 1789, which was caused by his tyrannical conduct, was in 1805 appointed governor of New South Wales, but his appointment was so unpopular, and his conduct so harsh and despotic, that in January 1808 he was deposed by the colonists and the other civil and military officers of the colony, and sent back to England. Blockade. [NEUTRALITY; ARMED NEUTRALITY; PARIS, THE DECLARATION OF.]

Blockade, THE AMERICAN. It is a principle of international law that a state cannot blockade its own ports. When, therefore, the American Civil War broke out in 1861, President Lincoln had to choose between the blockade or the declaration that the Confederate ships were pirates. The American government chose the former, and in April declared the ports of the revolted provinces to be blockaded. This practically acknowledged the existence of war with the Confederates, and the British government were therefore justified in recognizing the Southern states as belligerents, which was done May 14, 1861. The Federal government protested that the recognition by Great Britain was an unfriendly act, but subsequent writers on international law, both American and British, are agreed that Great Britain was acting strictly according to the recognized principles of the law of nations.

Bloet, ROBERT, BISHOP OF LINCOLN (d. 1123), though born of obscure parentage, was chancellor to both William the Conqueror and William Rufus until his appointment to the see of Lincoln in 1093. Under Henry I he was made justiciar and was that king's most trusted adviser. In 1102 he besieged Robert of Belesme's castle of Tickhill for the king. Later he lost the king's favour and retired from public life. His see of Lincoln was partitioned in 1109, when Ely was made a bishopric.

Blois, PETER OF (d. 1200), was descended from a noble family of Brittany, and studied at Paris and Bologna. Subsequently he taught at Paris, and was invited to England by Henry II. He became "cancellarius" to Richard, Archbishop of Canterbury, and afterwards to Baldwin, and archdeacon of Bath about 1175. For his support of William Longchamp he was deprived of the latter office about 1191. Afterwards, however, he was made archdeacon of London and prebendary of St. Paul's. He was the author of numerous letters, more than 200 of which are extant. Many of them are very valuable for their notices of the politics and manners of the writer's age. Peter was long credited with a Continuation of the spurious Chronicle of Ingulf; but the work is a manifest forgery.

Blondel, or BLONDIAN, DE NESLE, was a celebrated French trouvreur who became attached to the court of Richard I. He is said to have discovered the place of the king's imprisonment in Austria by singing the king's own favourite lays before each keep and fortress till the unfinished song was at length taken up and answered from the windows of the castle of Dürenstein, where Richard was imprisoned. The story, however, does not appear until some seventy years after the events it purports to describe and has been generally rejected as mythical. The searchers officially sent from England were the Abbots of Boxley and Robertsbridge, who eventually discovered the king at the castle of Ochsenfurt on his way to the emperor's presence at Spire.

Blood, COLONEL THOMAS (d. 1680), was an Irish soldier of fortune remarkable for his reckless audacity. In 1663 he joined a conspiracy to seize Dublin Castle, but the plot being discovered, he fled. In 1670 he seized the Duke of Ormonde in the streets of London with the intention of hanging him at Tyburn, but the duke fortunately escaped. In the next year Blood distinguished himself by attempting to carry off the regalia from the Tower, and very nearly succeeded in his object. Charles II, however, pardoned him, and gave him an estate worth £500 a year.

Bloody Assizes. [ASSIZES, THE BLOODY.]

Blore Heath, THE BATTLE OF (1459), was fought, during the Wars of the Roses, between the Lancastrians, under Lord Audley, and the Yorkists, who were commanded by the Earl of Salisbury. The latter was marching southwards with the intention of effecting a junction with the Duke of York, and Lord Audley was dispatched to intercept him. They met on Blore Heath, about two miles and a half from Market Drayton, in Staffordshire. The Yorkists, though inferior in numbers, were completely victorious. Lord Audley, and many other leading men on the same side, were killed, and a large number of prisoners were taken. Salisbury's further march was uninterrupted, and he effected a junction with the Duke of York at Ludlow.

Blount, CHARLES, EARL OF DEVON (1563-1606), was the second son of the 6th Lord Mountjoy. Having won the favour of Queen Elizabeth, he became a rival of Essex, with whom he fought a duel, though afterwards the two became great friends. In 1594 Blount, who had now become Lord Mountjoy by the death of his brother, was made governor of Portsmouth, and three years later accompanied Essex on his unfortunate expedition to the Azores. In 1601 he was made lord deputy of Ireland, and successfully crushed the rebellion of Tyrone, after storming Kinsale (December 1601). He was created Earl of Devon by James I in 1603, and died in 1606.

Blount, ELIZABETH, LADY TAILBOIS (d. 1540 ?), was the daughter of Sir John Blount, and the wife of Sir Gilbert Tailbois (d. 1530), at one time governor of Calais. She was one of Henry VIII's favourite mistresses, and the son (Henry Fitzroy) whom she bore him was specially distinguished by the marks of his father's regard, being created successively Earl of Nottingham and Duke of Richmond and Somerset.

Blue Books, or the reports and documents printed by order of parliament, covered usually with blue paper, were first issued in 1681, and first sold to the public in 1836 at the rate of a halfpenny per sheet of four pages. They correspond to the French Yellow Books, Italian Green Books, etc.

Board of Trade, etc. [TRADE, BOARD OF, etc.]

Bocher, JOAN (Joan of Kent) (d. 1550), was an Anabaptist who was condemned by the commissioners appointed to inquire into heresy in 1549. Their report being that she held heretical and erroneous opinions on the nature of the incarnation, she was burnt at Smithfield, May 2, 1550.

Bocland, in Anglo-Saxon legal phraseology, was land held by "book" or charter, as distinguished from "folkland," or land held by folk-right (national custom). Bocland could only be created in virtue of a formal act of the king and his witan. From the seventh century onward the practice of "bocking" land (especially churches and monasteries) became increasingly prevalent, and it early became customary to include in the charter a clause of exemption or immunity freeing the land from some or all of the services and dues with which it had been burdened. In some cases it was even exempted from the "trinoda necessitas." Land held by book was held in full ownership and was alienable by gift or will. [LAND TENURE.]

Boer War, THE, is the name given to the struggle which lasted from October 1899 to May 1902 between Great Britain and the Boer republics of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. The Boers first attacked Natal, were checked at Talana Hill and beaten by French at Elandslaagte. But Ladysmith and Kimberley were besieged by the Boers, and Buller had to defer his attack on the Orange Free State. Methuen's column to relieve Kimberley was defeated at Magersfontein, and Buller repulsed at Tugela River in December. Immediately Buller was replaced as commander-in-chief by Roberts with Kitchener as chief of staff, and volunteers were enrolled for the war. French was holding De Wet and De la Rey at Colesberg, and in spite of two reverses with which Buller met at Spion Kop and Vaalkrantz, French was able to relieve Kimberley and Roberts to advance on the Orange Free State by February. Cronje surrendered at Paardeberg, after being cut off, and the war changed from one of attack to one of guerrilla warfare waged by Boer farmer squadrons in their own country. Buller succeeded in fighting through to Ladysmith, which was relieved on February 28, 1900. The Boers evacuated Natal, Roberts occupied Bloemfontein, Mafeking was relieved on May 17, and on May 24 the Orange Free State was annexed. Pretoria was occupied immediately, and Prinsloo surrendered two months afterwards. Roberts and Buller joined forces, and after the flight of Kruger and the occupation of Koomati Poort (September 25), Roberts sailed for home, having annexed the Transvaal.

Then followed eighteen months of vigorous guerrilla warfare which even spread to disaffected Cape Dutch. Thirty thousand more troops were dispatched to South Africa, large tracts of land were devastated, and Kitchener organized systematic extirpation of the worst areas. De Wet's invasion of the Cape in February 1901 had failed, and Kitchener organized a series of cavalry drives from a base of fortified block-houses, clearing vast areas of inhabitants, placing women and children in concentration camps, and fighting or capturing the men. At a mass meeting of representative burghers at Vereeniging, a majority decided on surrender; and after some discussion peace was signed at Pretoria on May 31, 1902, and proclaimed the day following. Among the conditions of peace the following were the most important. All burghers to have complete immunity on laying down their arms and taking the oath of allegiance to King Edward; the Dutch language to be taught in schools at the request of parents, and to be allowed in law courts; the Boers to be permitted to own sporting rifles; martial law to be replaced as soon as possible by civil administration, representative government to follow in due course; the question of native franchise not to be considered until such government be granted; £3,000,000 to be given to the farmers as compensation for damage done to their farms; and a commission to be formed to repatriate burghers. Subsequently in the Imperial parliament the sum of £8,000,000 was voted, to be apportioned for grants to burghers to aid them in resuming their normal employments; for grants in respect of losses incurred through the operations of war; for supplementary loans, to be repaid after a term of years at 3 per cent. interest. The first and second amounts were to be charged on Imperial funds; the third on the colonial governments. On the British side 5,774 officers and men were killed in action, and 22,829 wounded; of the Boers about 4,000 were killed, while the number of their wounded is uncertain. There were 40,000 Boer prisoners at the end of the war. At least 250,000 British troops were on duty in 1902, and over 20,000 died of diseases.

Bohemia, RELATIONS WITH. Dealings between England and Bohemia begin with the grant of the Emperor Henry VII to his son John, which established a German line of kings in Bohemia, and involved it in Western politics. John constantly resided in France, and, as the opponent of Louis of Bavaria and the friend of Philip of Valois, was led by his restless chivalry to take part in the war against England, which ended by his death at Crecy (1346). His son, Charles IV, was of a more practical temperament; and the same Diet at Metz which accepted the Golden Bull witnessed his attempted mediation between France and England. In time more intimate relations grew up on the marriage of Anne of Bohemia, his daughter, with Richard II. Under Wenzel, her brother, still more than under Charles, the Luxemburg house had become national kings of Bohemia at the expense of the Imperial dignity, which degenerated into a mere title. Hence close dealings between Bohemia and England; and as Catholicism and the papacy were associated with the hated German influence, the Bohemian national party greedily listened to the doctrines of Wyclif, which all the Bohemians at Richard's court had ample opportunities of learning. What in England was mere abstract dialectic, and at best the expression of inarticulate discontent, was turned by Bohemian patriotism into the watchwords of a national party of religious Puritanism. Prague became a more popular Oxford. Jerome of Prague actually brought Wyclif's teaching from the Thames to the Moldau. The direction taken by Huss was entirely the result of English influence. In one library there are still five treatises of Wyclif copied out in his own hand, with copious notes. Henry V had already become intimately allied to Sigismund by their common efforts to restore the unity of Christendom. A fresh link of orthodox antagonism to heresy united the sovereigns if it separated the peoples. The Council of Constance marked the time of their closest approximation. With the suppression of the national movement, Bohemia sank into insignificance or dependence. Ferdinand I united its crown with the Austrian house. Only on the last attempt at the assertion of Bohemian nationality, which in 1618 led to the endeavour to set aside Ferdinand of Styria for Frederick of the Palatinate, the son-in-law of James I, were direct relations between the two states renewed. But though the cause of the Protestant Pfalzgraf was exceedingly popular in England, James refused to support him until it was too late. The battle on the Weissberg (1620) destroyed at once the fortunes of Frederick and Elizabeth, and the nationality and independence of the Czech kingdom.

Creighton's "History of the Papacy" (Bk. II, ch. iii and iv) brings out very clearly the connexion between Huss and Wyclif. Cf. Milman, "Latin Christianity" (vol. viii); Count F. Lutzow, "History of Bohemia," 1896 and 1920.

Bohun, THE FAMILY OF, was founded by a certain Humphrey de Bohun, said to have been a kinsman of William I. In 1200 Henry de Bohun was created Earl of Hereford by John. He inherited the office of hereditary constable from his father Humphrey, whose mother was the daughter of Miles, Earl of Hereford and lord high constable. He married the daughter of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, Earl of Essex, and upon the death of his brother-in-law William, the last Earl of Essex of the house of Mandeville, succeeded to his estates. His son Humphrey, 2nd Earl of Hereford, was created Earl of Essex about 1236. William de Bohun—who fought at Crecy—fourth son of the 4th Earl of Hereford, was created Earl of Northampton 1337. His son succeeded to the earldoms of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton, and died 1372, leaving two daughters, Eleanor—who married Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester—and Mary—who married Henry of Bolingbroke (afterwards Henry IV), who thus gained the earldoms of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton.

Bohun, ELEANOR DE, DUCHESS OF GLOUCESTER. [GLOUCESTER, THOMAS OF WOODSTOCK, DUKE OF.]

Bohun, HUMPHREY DE, 3RD EARL OF HEREFORD, 2ND EARL OF ESSEX (d. 1298), lord high constable of England, succeeded to his grandfather's title and estates in the year 1275. His father had been a supporter of Simon de Montfort, and the son inherited the traditions of the baronial party. This Earl of Hereford is chiefly remarkable for having headed with Roger Bigod the marshal (q.v.) the opposition to Edward I's demands in 1297, and refused to serve the king abroad. Their alliance was instrumental in securing the confirmation of the Charters in 1297 and again in 1300. Hereford's conduct on this occasion was probably actuated by a desire for revenge for his imprisonment in 1292.

Bohun, HUMPHREY DE, 4TH EARL OF HEREFORD AND 3RD EARL OF ESSEX (d. 1322), was the son of the above, and married Elizabeth, the seventh daughter of Edward I. He inherited something of the spirit of his father, and was one of the Ordainers in 1310. Eight years later he was appointed one of the four earls in the permanent council of 1318. In 1321 he was forbidden to attend a meeting of the aggrieved lords, at which he meditated exposing his wrongs. His great cause of complaint was the power of the Despensers, who were threatening his influence on the Welsh Marches. In the same year he was the chief prosecutor of the Despensers in parliament, and was formally pardoned for the part he took in these proceedings. Edward, however, took prompt action in defence of his favourites, and next year Bohun was slain at the battle of Boroughbridge (1322).

Bois-le-Duc, THE BATTLE OF (November 12, 1794), was fought during the campaign of the allies with the British contingent under the Duke of York, in Flanders. For some time great preparations had been pushed forward by Moreau in obedience to the instructions of the Committee of Public Safety at Paris, who were resolved on subjugating Holland while the severity of the winter had neutralized the defensive advantages of the country. To carry out this project, the first step was to cross the Meuse, and, with this object in view, boats for a bridge had been collected at Fort Crèvecoeur on that river. When all preparations had been completed, the passage was attempted at daybreak on November 12. But the firm resistance of the allies, under the Duke of York, prevented all the attempts of the French; and at length, seeing that it was impossible to carry the passage, Moreau desisted from the attempt, and placed his troops in winter quarters between the Meuse and the Rhine.

Boleyn, ANNE (1507-36). [ANNE BOLEYN.]

Boleyn, GEORGE, VISCOUNT ROCHFORD (d. 1536), was ennobled immediately after the marriage of his sister Anne with Henry VIII (February 1533). In 1536 he was accused of immoral intercourse with his sister, and executed on May 17. His wife was executed with Catherine Howard (February 13, 1542), on the charge of having been an accomplice in that queen's treason.

Boleyn, MARY. An elder sister of Anne Boleyn, second queen of Henry VIII, and at one time herself an object of the king's passionate admiration. This, however, was one of Henry's earlier attachments, and took place at a period when his affection for Katharine of Aragon was still sufficiently strong to prevent his seriously entertaining any idea of a second marriage by means of a divorce. Mary Boleyn married, in July 1521, Sir William Pavey, a descendant of the Beaufort family; and disappearing for a while from the vicinity of the court, was spared any renewal of the king's attentions.

Biographies of Anne Boleyn.

Boleyn, SIR THOMAS, EARL OF WILTSHIRE (1477-1539), was the father of the ill-fated Anne Boleyn. When first made aware of the king's passion for his daughter, he does not appear to have given Henry's wishes any sort of encouragement. On the contrary, when the king, after breaking off the courtship then going on between Anne Boleyn and Lord Henry Percy, visited him suddenly at his house at Hever, Sir Thomas Boleyn, though fully aware of the real object of Henry's visit, did not give him any opportunity of seeing or conversing with his daughter. In course of time, however, both he and his daughter yielded to the king's perseverance, and Sir Thomas, in view of his future greatness as father-in-law of the king, was made successively Viscount Rochford and Earl of Wiltshire. Bolingbroke, HENRY ST. JOHN, VISCOUNT (1678-1751). [ST. JOHN.]

Bolton Castle, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, was the scene of Mary Stuart's imprisonment, 1568. The intrigues of the Queen of Scots caused her to be removed in the following year to the "straiter custody" of the Earl of Shrewsbury at Tutbury.

Bombay. A presidency and governorship of British India. The town and island of Bombay were ceded to England in 1661, as part of the dowry of Catherine of Braganza on her marriage with Charles II. A few years afterwards it was handed over to the East India Company in return for a nominal annual payment. In 1687 Bombay was constituted a separate presidency; but in 1753 it was under the authority of the Calcutta government. The dominions of the presidency were very limited in extent until the wars with the Mahrattas, comprehending only the town and island of Bombay, with Salsette and Bassein; by the end of the administration of the Marquis of Hastings it included Surat, Broach, Ahmednuggur, Belgaum, Sholapur, and the whole dominions which had belonged to the Poona state, with the exception of Sattara, which was annexed in 1848. In 1843, on the conquest of Sind, that province was also placed under the governor of Bombay.

Bond of Association (1584). [ASSOCIATION.]

Boniface of Savoy (d. 1270), Archbishop of Canterbury (1241-70), was the son of Thomas, Count of Savoy, and consequently uncle to Eleanor of Provence, wife of Henry III. To this connexion he owed his appointment to the archbishopric. He was one of the most clerical and most unpopular of our archbishops; his sympathies were with the foreigners at Henry III's court, and his tastes were military. At times when his interests seemed to be opposed by the Poitevins he sided with the barons, but his policy was a purely selfish one, and seen through by all parties. During the Barons' War he was absent from England, but returned after the battle of Evesham, and accompanied Prince Edward on his Crusade.

Boniface, SAINT (680-755), the apostle of Germany, was born probably at Crediton, and became a monk first at Exeter and later at Nursling. His original name was Winfrith. After an abortive visit to Frisia in 716 he set out two years later for Rome, and received a commission from Gregory II to preach to the heathen nations of Germany. His earnest missionary labours met with the greatest success in Bavaria, Thuringia, Hessa, and Frisia, and immense numbers were converted. He laboured in Central Germany under the patronage of Charles Martel for more than thirty years, establishing among others the bishoprics of Salzburg, Passau, Freising, Ratisbon, Würzburg, and Erfurt, and a very large number of monasteries. His influence in civilizing and evangelizing the wilder parts of Germany was very great. Besides labouring as a missionary, and organizing the newly converted districts, Boniface was entrusted by the pope with the reformation of the Frankish Church. He became Archbishop of Mainz, and his efforts made that see the Canterbury of Germany. He was assisted by numerous missionaries, whom he sent for from England, and was high in favour with the Carolingian princes. Pepin is said to have been crowned king by Boniface at Soissons. In 755 he made his last missionary journey into Friesland; but near Dokkeim he was attacked and slain by a band of the pagans. His remains were buried in one of the most famous of his abbeys—that of Fulda.

Bonner, EDMUND (c. 1500–69), successively Bishop of Hereford and of London, said to have been the natural son of a priest named Savage, studied at Broadgates Hall, Oxford, and became one of Wolsey's chaplains. He subsequently attached himself to Cromwell, and in 1532 was sent on a mission to the pope concerning the divorce question. According to Burnet, his demeanour greatly enraged Clement, "who talked of throwing him into a cauldron of melted lead, or of burning him alive." In 1538 he was made Bishop of Hereford, and in 1539 translated to London. During Henry VIII's reign Bonner was a leading member of the Anglican Conservative party led by Gardiner and Norfolk, but on the accession of Edward VI he declined to follow the advanced Reformers, and protested against Cranmer's homilies and injunctions. For this he was committed to the Fleet, and, although soon liberated, was tried by a special commission in 1549, deprived of his bishopric, and imprisoned in the Marshalsea. He was restored by Queen Mary, and was one of the most active agents in carrying out her reactionary policy. He restored the Mass in St. Paul's even before the publication of the royal ordinance which commanded it, accepted the restoration of the papal authority, despite his former policy, and his diocese was distinguished by the number of persons burnt in it, and the vindictive energy with which the bishop pushed on the work of persecution. At the accession of Queen Elizabeth, when he appeared before the queen to tender his allegiance, she shrank from him with undisguised aversion. In May 1559, refusing to take the oath of supremacy, he was deprived and indicted for præmunire. He was committed to the Marshalsea, where he passed the remainder of his life.

Booth, HENRY, LORD DELAMERE (1652–94), sat as member for Chester in the reign of James II, after being accused of taking part in the Rye House Plot and Monmouth's rebellion, and tried in the Lord Steward's Court. Although Jeffreys, whom Delamere had formerly called a "drunken jack-pudding," employed all his brutality against him, Delamere was acquitted. The verdict was most popular. On the arrival of the Prince of Orange in England, Delamere rose for him at the head of his tenants in Cheshire, and marched to Manchester. He was one of the messengers sent by the House of Lords to James, requesting him to retire to Ham on the Thames. He was placed on the treasury bench and made chancellor of the exchequer. He soon quarrelled with his colleagues, Mordaunt and Godolphin, and attempted to drive Halifax from office. On the appointment of Carmarthen as chief minister, he retired from office, and was created Earl of Warrington (1690). Large grants of lands belonging to Jesuits were made to him, and a large sum paid him for expenses incurred at the time of the Revolution. Nevertheless, he complained bitterly of the injustice of his treatment. He is supposed to have written a bitter pamphlet when Tory lord-lieutenants were substituted for Whigs. He protested against the rejection of the Place Bill of 1692. "He was," says Macaulay, "a zealous Whig . . . gloomy and acrimonious."

Booth, LAWRENCE (d. 1480), Archbishop of York (1476–80), after holding several minor preferments, was in 1457 appointed Bishop of Durham. He sided with the Lancastrians, and his temporalities were seized by Edward IV, but he subsequently reconciled himself with the king, and from 1473 to 1474 acted as chancellor during the illness of Bishop Stillington. He was appointed to the archbishopric of York in 1476.

Booth, WILLIAM (1829–1912), was the founder of the Salvation Army, which originated in the East London Revival Society (1864) and took its present name in 1878. Booth organized it on the lines of the regular army. Under his leadership the movement was extended to the United States, Australia, India, and throughout Europe.

Biography by W. Booth, 1912.

Borders, THE. The English invasion established in the north-east of Britain the kingdom of Northumberland, which extended from the Humber to the Forth. West of this the Celtic kingdom of Strathclyde extended from the Dee to the Clyde. North were the Celtic kingdoms of the Picts and Scots. In 829 Northumbria submitted to the supremacy of Ecgbert, King of Wessex, and after the repulse of the Danes that supremacy was still further extended. In 919 the princes of Northumbria, Strathclyde, and Scotland submitted to Edward the Elder. In 945 the kingdom of Strathclyde or, more probably, the Scandinavian settlement in Cumbria, was conquered by Edmund, but subsequently granted by him to the Scottish king. Similarly, Lothian was granted to the Scottish king by Canute. In 1092 William II took Cumberland, and from that time the boundaries between England and Scotland were the Solway, the Cheviot Hills, and the River Tweed. At the time of the Norman Conquest, Scotland became the refuge of many of the English, and Lothian remained the most purely English part of the two kingdoms. William I, finding it difficult to keep his hold on the northern part of England, resorted in 1069 to the savage measure of ravaging Northumberland. The northern counties were laid waste, and the subsequent inroads of the Scottish king completed the work of devastation. The northern counties are omitted in the Domesday Survey, probably because they were not considered worth the trouble of examining. The disputes between England and Scotland exposed the Border to perpetual ravages. But attempts were made to introduce order, and the thirteenth century saw Cumberland and Northumberland tolerably prosperous in agricultural pursuits. It is probable that the necessities of constant defence enabled the men of the Borders to retain many of the old English customs more definitely than was the case elsewhere. The township organization was not superseded by the manor, and traces of its existence till recent times are frequent. In 1249 an attempt was made to promote peace on the Borders by the issue of Border laws, which were determined by an inquest of twelve English and twelve Scottish knights. They related to the trial of malefactors who fled across the Borders, and the redress of grievances amongst the Borderers themselves. They recognized courts to be held on the Marches, at which English and Scots were to meet and try their respective criminals. Peace and prosperity were, however, destroyed by the Scottish wars of Edward I. From that time England and Scotland stood in avowed hostility, and a perpetual warfare was waged on the Borders of the two kingdoms. The land was divided into three Marches, the Eastern, the Western, and the Middle, and over each was set a warden to provide for its defence. The chief military road was along the east coast, from Newcastle through Berwick or Coldstream, and along this the chief battles between English and Scots were fought. But the passes by the valley which runs from the Cheviots were mostly used for the incessant plundering raids that marked Border life. Along the valleys of the Jed, the Teviot, the Coquet, the Tyne, and the Rede freebooters from both countries were perpetually ravaging. The state of life along the Borders is sufficiently seen in the aspect of the country. It is rich in ruined castles, vast fortified piles in strong positions, dating in their main parts from the fourteenth century. Besides these are ruins of monastic buildings (those along the Tweed being especially famous) which were the sole abodes of peace, yet even they bear traces of careful fortification, and were generally under the shelter of a neighbouring castle. The only other buildings of any antiquity are low square towers, called peil towers, which sufficed as shelter against a sudden raid of robbers. They probably stood in an enclosure, which contained the cattle hastily driven away. Some of the older churches have towers of the same kind, which were used for defence. The dwellings of the people were mere hovels, and their possessions were nothing but arms and cattle. Of Border frays, the battle of Otterburn (1388) (q.v.) is the most famous, and has passed into legend under the name of "Chevy Chase." The great families on the Borders grew to be important men. The Percys, Greys, Dacres, and Umfravilles are famous in English history; and the Douglasses, Hepburns, Lindsays, and Durbans are no less famous in the history of Scotland. Moreover, families of freebooters formed themselves into powerful clans, and waged hereditary feuds amongst themselves—the Armstrongs, Elliots, Charltons, and the like. After the battle of Flodden Field (1513) (q.v.) Scotland was greatly weakened, and Henry VIII made use of the robber warfare along the Borders as a means of still further reducing the Scottish power. The records of plunder and bloodshed which have been preserved show almost incredible barbarity. The result of this long-continued warfare was an entire lawlessness among the Borderers: they regarded plunder as their trade, and bloodshed as an episode in their life. When peace was made between England and Scotland in 1549, it became an object of importance for both countries to bring their Borders into order. Regulations were made for that purpose; but they could not be enforced. A watch was set along the English Borders; each hamlet sent its men to keep guard by night, and the news of a Scottish inroad was flashed by beacon light from place to place. The Wardens' Courts were regularly held, and the balance of bloodshed and rapine was adjusted between the two countries. But how difficult it was to keep the peace was shown in 1575, when, at a Wardens' Court held at Redeguisse, some disagreement led to an appeal to arms, and the English warden was carried away prisoner. This occurrence threatened to lead to a breach between the two countries, and gave rise to long negotiations. The carefulness of Elizabeth's government is nowhere seen more clearly than in the steady attempt to introduce order into the English Border. The union of the crowns of England and Scotland in the person of James I increased the general desire to pacify the Border. There was no longer war between England and Scotland; but theft and murder had become hereditary. The dwellers of one valley were the immortal foes of those in another. It was necessary to root out blood-feuds and robbery by strict justice, and Lord William Howard, known as "Belted Will," did much to make the law respected. The rudiments of civilization had to be introduced, and the bad habits of the past were slow in dying away. Redesdale, Tynedale, Liddesdale, and Teviotdale were wild and lawless places, and retained traces of their old characteristics up to the beginning of the nineteenth century. Now there are no more orderly people than those of the Borders, and nowhere is agricultural enterprise and prosperity more marked.

Borh. [FRANKLEDGE.]

Born, BERTRAND DE (d. c. 1210), one of the most famous troubadours, played an important part in the quarrels between Henry II and his sons. He took up the cause of Eleanor of Guienne, and subsequently joined the Poitevin rebellion against Richard, inciting by his verses the young Prince Henry against his father. Taken prisoner at Limoges, he was set at liberty by Henry II, and eventually ended his days in the monastery of Cîteaux.

Borneo, a large island of the Malay Archipelago (293,496 sq. miles), is divided into four political areas: British North Borneo, Brunei, Sarawak, and Dutch Borneo. The island has never been a political unit. It became known to Europeans in 1511, when Albuquerque sent d'Abreu on a voyage, but was first visited in 1522 by some of Magellan's survivors. In 1580 Spain obtained permission to trade there, but was soon followed by Dutch trading posts (1604) and by the British East India Company (1609), who in 1698 set up a British settlement at Banjarmasin. British interest was negligible, in spite of Dalrymple's concession in 1759, until the advent of Sir James Brooke (q.v.). During the Napoleonic wars the Dutch had abandoned the island (1809), but were left in undisputed possession, with the restoration of Java in 1816. Brooke became Raja of Sarawak in 1842, and Dutch and British boundaries were defined in 1891 by treaty. Exploration of the island was hazardous, owing to both nature and the Dyak head hunters, but Dalrymple (1769), Tobias, Hartmann, and Müller in the eighteenth century, Henrioi and Horner in the eighteenth, followed by the ubiquitous Dr. Schwaner (1844-7), Von Gaffron, and Ida Pfeiffer, by 1850 had made known much of the interior.

BRITISH NORTH BORNEO is a Moslem state of some 260,000 inhabitants, exploited and administered by the British North Borneo Company which was incorporated in 1882. Labuan had been occupied as a Crown colony in 1848, and in 1872 the Labuan Trading Company established a branch in Sandakan. Six years later Dent negotiated with the Sultan of Sulu the transference of all the trading rights in North Borneo to a syndicate of which he was a member. In 1881 the British North Borneo Provisional Association took over this concession and was incorporated as the British North Borneo Company in 1882. After various accessions, the company's territory in 1885 became, by agreement with the state of North Borneo, a British protectorate administered by the company. This was formally acknowledged in 1888. In 1890 Labuan was added to its sphere and direction, but was at its own request in 1905 transferred to the Straits Settlements. In 1898 a cession from the Sultan of Brunei rounded off the company's territory, but in the following years a campaign had to be fought against the natives. An exchange of territory in 1904 with Sarawak obtained for the company coaling rights on Brunei Bay. The governor is appointed by the company with the approval of the secretary of state, and is advised by a nominated legislative council of seven officials and five other members. The law is based on Indian criminal and civil procedure, while a separate court exists for Moslems.

BRUNEI is a native state under British protection since 1888. It was once a state of great power and its pirates were renowned among the sailors of the Eastern Archipelago. In 1906 a British resident was accepted by the governor to assist him in the administration. The resident is responsible to the governor of the Straits Settlements, who acts as high commissioner, and he is virtually the ruler of the country.

SARAWAK is a protected state ruled by an hereditary British raja, assisted by a supreme council of four Europeans and five Malay magistrates, and a triennial general council of fifty European and Malay officials and native chiefs. The raja has an advisory council in England, consisting of his heir and three others, and appoints, to administer the government, a civil service of Englishmen. Sir James Brooke obtained in 1841 from the Sultan of Borneo the government of Sarawak, of which he became raja in 1842, and to which he greatly added by concession. Great Britain has the right to decide succession disputes, and control foreign relations, but must not interfere in the internal administration.

Boroughbridge, THE BATTLE OF (1322), during the barons' revolt in Edward II's reign, was fought between the royalists under the command of the king and Sir Andrew Harclay, and the baronial forces headed by the Earls of Lancaster and Hereford. The barons were routed, the Earl of Hereford slain, and the Earl of Lancaster taken prisoner and subsequently executed at Pontefract.

Borough-English was the name given in England to a not unusual custom in certain manors "that lands shall descend to the youngest son, or, in default of issue, to the younger brother of the owner." Certain analogous extensions of the custom which, for example, gives rights of succession to the youngest daughter or sister, though not strictly included in the recognized custom of borough-English, may be roughly grouped with it under such a term as "ultimogeniture" (suggested by the Real Property Commissioners), "junior-right," or "juniority" (Elton). The foreign "Droit de Mainet ," "Juveignerie," and "J ngsten Recht," are closely analogous to borough-English. Concerning its origin we can only guess. The theory of the old lawyers that the youngest was naturally the weakest and wanted most attention, is obviously inadequate to explain it. Neither does Sir Henry Maine's view—that it sprang from the "patria potestas," and the youngest son inherited because the least likely to have forfeited his rights by emancipation—wholly cover the ground. Elton, while admitting that the problem is difficult, perhaps insoluble, suggested the theory that the custom might be a survival of very early times, perhaps pre-Aryan, certainly before Celt, Teuton, and Slav had branched off from their common parent stock. Just as primogeniture sprang from the Aryan domestic worship which it was the special function of the eldest to conduct, so "ultimogeniture" might be, he thought, a survival of ancestor-worship in a race that saw no pre-eminence in the eldest. The widespread nature of the custom has been held to support this view. Maitland believed, however, that it more probably had its origin in the will and interest of the lord; who was able to dictate a rule of inheritance to his dependent peasants which should safeguard the impartibility of the tenement by guaranteeing it to the "fireside" child. We read of it in England as far back as Glanvil's time, and by its modern name in the Year-book of the I Edward I. The custom occurs especially in the south-east of England, Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, and the environs of London, and less so in the eastern counties. It is also common in Somerset, but rare in the Midlands, and unknown north of the Humber. A very early form of the custom appears in the Welsh laws of the tenth century, and also in Brittany and other Celtic districts. It was also common in North France, Friesland, Westphalia, and, in modern times, in South Russia.

Boroughs. The origin and early development of this English social institution are still largely matters of speculation. We have to rely on a few valuable hints scattered here and there in our sources until the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, when information becomes easier to obtain. The medi val borough was predominantly the sphere of activity of an association of merchants, often grouped together in a club or "hansa" known as the gild merchant [GILDS], which it is occasionally impossible, and often difficult, to distinguish from the government or control exercised by the burgesses of the town. As has often been pointed out, the agricultural element in the medi val borough was strong, and the majority of the town's inhabitants were much concerned with the cultivation of their fields, the pasturing of their beasts within and without the walls, and the great annual occasion of the harvest; but the government of the borough was in the hands of an aristocracy of traders for whom agrarian questions scarcely existed, and these men gave the borough its mercantile stamp. It is not improbable that most of the English boroughs owed their early elevation to a level of jurisdiction and importance above that of the ordinary township to the possession of a market, thus becoming the nucleus of the trade of the locality. Motives other than trade sometimes led to the growth of a borough. In Anglo-Saxon times there were burhs which were specially associated with the residence of the king, places where his special burhright, "a severe and exalted peace," reigned. Some boroughs grew up, or rather, were definitely established, as military strongholds, and in after days the liability of the burgesses for watch and ward marked the survival of their responsibilities. A large monastery naturally attracted artisans and traders to its neighbourhood. The companions of the Conqueror not only added to the security and importance of the trading centres with their keeps and fortifications, but they probably brought with them a following of Norman townsmen who helped to swell the number of burghers. The Danish invasion was a stimulus to town life. The value of stout timber defences was realized; for the fortified burh could serve as a stronghold when the locality was invaded. A special town government existed under a port-reeve, and the burghal tenants attended assemblies three times a year. We find that a highly organized police system existed in London in the tenth century, controlled by a court of local officials. From the "Burghal Hidage" and the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" we learn of the existence of about fifty burhs. Under Edward the Confessor trade was extended, and though it suffered a temporary set-back at the Conquest, we can regard the borough from the early twelfth century onwards as essentially a place of industry and business. This was the first characteristic of the mediæval borough. The second was the existence of a borough court. The third was the holding of land and dwellings under a special form of tenure among the inhabitants. [BURGESS.] Fourthly, the borough generally freed itself from the interference of the royal officers in financial matters by "farming" the revenues of the borough. The "firma burgi" was a composition made with the Crown in the form of a fixed money rent by the burgesses for such dues as market-tolls, the profits of justice and the burgrave rents, which would otherwise be collected by the sheriff or king's bailiff. Further privileges granted by charters from the twelfth century onwards to a large number of new boroughs, and to many of the old boroughs which remained, included immunities from outside jurisdiction for the possessors of all tenements in the borough, power to elect mayors and other officers, and permission to form a merchant gild with an alderman and other officers, a court, and a code of rules. It is usual to distinguish between three classes of boroughs: (1) Towns on the royal demesne. This is the largest and most important class. The king was chiefly concerned with his financial relations with his boroughs. If these were satisfactory he was prepared to grant wide liberties in self-government and jurisdiction—for a consideration. Moreover the king was not averse to the weakening of the sheriff's power. If the king granted a borough to a tenant-in-chief, it was not usual for any considerable reaction to set in, since demesne lands retained some part of their old privileges even when alienated from the Crown. (2) The mediate boroughs on baronial estates. Here freedom was harder to obtain, since the local lord was not anxious to part with his authority by making grants of privileges. Nevertheless there were towns in mediate ownership which bought liberty and the foundations of prosperity from their lords, in spite of circumstances. (3) The third group consisted of towns connected with the Church. Here the struggle for independence was longest, hardest, and least successful.

There were flourishing towns under the control of abbots which were so restricted that they were unable to achieve burghal status. At the very end of the Middle Ages the Church seemed often to be the victor. A famous example of monastic control is that of Bury St. Edmunds.

As the growth of the town constitutions was never uniform, but varied in each individual case, we must be content with indicating their broad features. "In England the development of the boroughs is conditioned at every point by common law and royal power" (Maitland). In most of the commercial towns the gilds or associations of merchants rapidly assumed importance. They became practically the governing bodies of the towns: all the more as their members would also be the members of the township courts and courts leet. Their chiefs were the aldermen, and their chief functions were to regulate trade. At the same time the communa or corporation appears alongside of the gild, with the mayor as its representative officer. The first mayor of whom we have any historical knowledge was Fitz-Alwyn, the mayor of London in the reign of Richard I, and in 1215 John granted the citizens the right of electing their mayor annually, which, after a severe struggle with the royal power, they succeeded in making good. The provincial towns, in most cases, lagged behind the capital, and we do not find a mayor in Leicester, for instance, until 1246. By an obscure process of amalgamation a municipality was evolved out of the three elements of the borough, the original township, representing the primitive landowning community, the gild, or voluntary association of merchants, with its alderman, and the communa, with its mayor, until by the fifteenth century we have a close corporation of mayor, aldermen, and council, whose numbers and organization are defined by charter. These corporate officers acquired under Richard II the right of exercising the functions of justices of the peace, and the right of each chartered borough or city to send members to parliament, which had been practically acquired during or before the reign of Edward III, was definitely recognized by charter in the case of Wenlock in the reign of Edward IV. By this time, too, the internal struggle for municipal privileges, which had been going on in some cases for nearly three centuries between the trading element and the newer craft gilds, or trading companies which had sprung up in later times, was over. The crafts had established their own right to form part of the municipal governing oligarchy. In the fifteenth century and under the Tudors a policy of strengthening the power of the municipal corporations at the expense of the inhabitants was followed. In the fifteenth century a system of close election and irresponsible government was recognized by charter in many cases, the mayor and councils being in the first instance nominated by the Crown, and subsequently self-elected by co-optation. It often happened also that the power of electing the borough members of parliament was made over to the corporation by charter, to the material injury of the power of the burgesses. Under Charles II and James II the last remnants of popular representation, by the exercise of which the towns still stoutly opposed the personal power of the Crown, were vigorously attacked. In 1683 the corporation of London was remodelled in a way that made it the creature of the court, no mayor or sheriff being admitted until approved by the king, and quo warranto informations were soon afterwards brought against other towns by Judge Jeffreys, many of which hastened to meet the government by a voluntary surrender. The corporations were then remodelled on an oligarchical plan, by which the king was reserved the right of appointing the first members. The object of this aggression was, of course, to control the return of members of parliament, a course of action which had already been inaugurated under the Tudors by the profuse creation of boroughs. After the Revolution the old charters of the remodelled corporations were for the most part restored to them, and they continued to exercise their narrow independence. The parliamentary side of the question now came exclusively to the front, and the incompetency of the close corporations for the purposes of local government were forgotten, while attention was turned to the system by which pocket boroughs flourished, and the franchise was limited to small bodies of freemen. After this abuse was remedied by the great Reform Act of 1832, reformers began to probe the corruption of municipal institutions. The report of the royal commission appointed in 1832 revealed an incredible amount of jobbery and corruption, municipal councils being for the most part self-elective, and holding office for life, while the freemen, who often formed a very small fraction of the population, alone had any share in the local administration. The result of this state of affairs was that finance was managed most negligently and dishonestly, and that justice became a matter of political partisanship. By the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, framed on the report of the commission, these abuses were swept away, and a uniform system of government established in the 183 boroughs to which it applied. The government was placed in the hands of the mayor, aldermen, and councillors, forming a council. They were to be elected by the burgesses, i.e., the resident ratepayers, freemen as such having no rights as burgesses, though they were entitled to parliamentary franchise. The qualification for a vote, at first three years' payment of rates, was afterwards reduced to one. Twenty of the largest boroughs were to be divided by the king in council into wards, and a certain number of common councilmen were attached to each ward. Separate committees of burgesses were to manage the charity estates, and, should an adequate salary be provided, a recorder, who was to be a barrister of five years' standing, might be appointed. There was also a provision by which new municipalities might be created by charter on the petition of a certain unspecified number of resident householders, but only about seventy towns have since availed themselves of it, partly because of the cumbersome nature of the process, and partly because of the opposition of the local authorities. The Municipal Corporations Act has since been frequently amended, and the whole legislation bearing on the subject has been consolidated by the Municipal Corporations Act of 1882. London was specially exempted from the act of 1835, and was allowed to retain its old constitution. [LONDON.] In Scotland, where the history of the boroughs is closely akin to that of England, the corporations were reformed in 1833. Those of Ireland were regulated, and many of them abolished, by the Irish Corporations Act of 1840. [BURGESS; GILDS; FARM.]

Boscawen, EDWARD (1711-61), first distinguished himself at the attack on Porto Bello in 1740. He was appointed commander-in-chief of an expedition to the East Indies (1747). In 1755 Boscawen received the thanks of parliament for the capture of two French ships, and became vice-admiral, and in the following year admiral. In that year he commanded the expedition to Cape Breton Island, and took the town of Louisburg. In the following year he defeated the French fleet in Lagos Bay, and received the thanks of parliament. In 1759 he was sworn of the privy council. Boscawen's career was brief, but he was not the least remarkable of the naval heroes who won such triumphs on the sea during the closing period of George II's reign.

Boscobel, in Shropshire, the house of John Giffard, was the hiding-place of Charles II after the battle of Worcester in 1651. The fugitive king was committed by Lord Derby to the charge of some woodcutters named Penderell. Here he remained in concealment for some days, and at one time it was even thought necessary that he should pass some time in an oak-tree in the Boscobel woods, so hot had the pursuit become. The king eventually effected his escape. From his hiding in the oak, the fashion of wearing oak-leaves on the day of the Restoration (May 29) originated.

Boston, in Lincolnshire, is said in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle to have been founded by St. Botolph. It rose to great importance in the twelfth century, and was one of the chief ports in the kingdom. Edward III made it one of the wool staples in 1369, and its prosperity continued till the early part of the sixteenth century, from which time it gradually declined.

Boston, in Massachusetts, was settled in 1630 by John Winthrop, most of the earliest colonists coming from Lincolnshire. During the Civil War the settlers sided with the Parliament, and even received two of the regicides with rejoicing in 1660. The town was on bad terms with the royal government all through the latter half of the seventeenth century, and in 1689 a rebellion broke out, and the governor, Sir Edmund Andros, was compelled to quit the country. The Boston people warmly supported the revolution of 1688. The town increased greatly in wealth and consequence, and was noted for the stern Puritanism of its inhabitants, and their sturdy spirit of independence. Boston took the lead in resisting the attempt of the British government to apply its revenue system to the colonies. On March 5, 1770, the riot known as "the Boston Massacre" took place, and in December 1773 the attack on the tea ships was made in Boston harbour. For a time the trade of the town was nearly ruined by the Boston Port Act (q.v.), and a large number of British troops were sent to garrison the port. The town was surrounded (1775) by an American force, between whom and the British the battle of Bunker Hill (q.v.) was fought, June 17. The British abandoned the place in March 1776. After the war Boston became one of the chief cities in the United States, and the centre of art, literature, and education. During the quarter of a century preceding 1860, Boston was the head-quarters of the movement for the abolition of negro slavery.

Boston Port Act, THE (1774), is important as being one of the immediate causes of the outbreak of the American War of Independence. In the year 1773, in order to find a market for the accumulated stores of the East India Company, Lord North withdrew the whole of the duty payable in Great Britain on any teas exported to America by the company. The teas, however, were still subject to a colonial tax of threepence on the pound. On December 16, 1773, the people of Boston, excited by the speeches of Samuel Adams and others, proceeded to the wharf where three tea ships lay, and threw their cargoes, valued at £18,000, into the water. Popular indignation was aroused throughout Great Britain by this act, and it was resolved to make an example of the little port. On March 14, 1774, Lord North brought in the Boston Port Bill. The preamble set forth that in the present condition of Boston, the commerce of his majesty's subjects could not be safely carried on, nor the customs be duly collected there; and it was therefore proposed that from and after June 1 it should not be lawful for any person to lade or unlade, to ship or unship, any goods within the harbour. The king in council was to have the power, when peace and order should be established at Boston, and full compensation paid for the teas destroyed, to restore the town to its former position. Some opposition was offered to the measure by Dowdeswell, Burke, and Charles Fox, but on the whole it was approved both by parliament and the country. The bill, accompanied as it was by the Massachusetts Government Bill, was received with great indignation in America. June 1—the day appointed for the Boston Port Act to come into force—was set apart as a solemn fast. On the meeting of the Massachusetts Assembly, General Gage found the spirit of resistance so unanimous among the delegates that he felt compelled to dissolve it immediately.

Bosworth Field, THE BATTLE OF (August 22, 1485), was fought between Richard III and Henry, Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII. On August 7 Henry landed at Milford Haven and passed on without opposition to Shrewsbury, being joined by a large number of Welshmen. He then marched on to Tamworth, where he arrived on the 18th. On the 20th he was at Atherstone, where he was met by Lord Stanley and by Sir William Stanley, who both promised to desert Richard during the battle. Meanwhile Richard, having mustered his forces at Nottingham, marched to Leicester and encamped at Bosworth on the 21st. On the next morning the two armies met between Bosworth and Atherstone at a place known as Whitemoors, near the village of Sutton Cheney. The battle was mainly a hand-to-hand encounter, the Stanleys for some time keeping aloof from the fight till, at a critical moment, they joined Richmond. Richard, perceiving that he was betrayed, and crying out, "Treason, treason!" endeavoured only to sell his life as dearly as possible, and refused to leave the field till, overpowered by numbers, he fell dead in the midst of his enemies. The crown was picked up on the field of battle and placed by Lord Stanley on the head of Richmond, who was at once saluted king by the whole army. Among those who perished on Richard's side were the Duke of Norfolk, Lord

Ferrers, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir Robert Brackenbury, while the only person of note in Henry's army who was slain was his standard-bearer, Sir William Brandon, who is said to have been killed by Richard himself.

Bót was a word which signified amends, reparation, either in the simple sense, as burh bót—i.e., repair of fortresses—or more often in the sense of money compensation for wrongdoing. In the earlier laws of the various Teutonic tribes, most offences are regarded as involving a breach of the general peace, and as putting the offender in outlawry and at feud with the community, till at any rate he has come to terms with the injured party; some less grave offences regarded as merely wrongs to the individual have a fixed composition attached to them; while in some cases is seen the idea of crime as demanding punishment. It is indisputable that these conceptions belong to very different stages of thought, and respectively succeed each other. Any offence, it is clear, originally put the offender at feud with all, and exposed him to his victim's vengeance. The right of vengeance then became limited by the growth of fixed compositions. And lastly, in the most developed codes, the idea of punishment has intruded upon the region of composition payments. In the code of Alfred, a discrimination is made, and in ordinary cases homicides paid according to the wergild of the slain, while in extraordinary cases, such as wilful murder of a lord, the crime is to be punished by death. The bót, then, or money payment, represents the view of a misdeed which regards it as so much damage to the individual, reparable by payment at a fixed tariff. For less grave offences the amends must, by Anglo-Saxon law, be accepted. In graver offences only, if the amends be not paid or be unsatisfactory to the party injured, does he re-enter on his right of feud, under certain legal limitations. These two are the "bót-worthy" class of offences. And even in the "bót-less" offences, the king can at pleasure accept an amends in money for them; for instance, the perjurer is to have his hand cut off, but the king can allow him to redeem it at half his wergild. In case of treason against a lord, Alfred says "the king and his witan dare not grant mercy." The relation of the "bót" to the "wite" is very irregular, and indeed inexplicable. The amount of the bót itself is equally perplexing; 6s. is the amends for knocking out a front tooth, only 3s. for breaking a rib; 6s. for breaking an arm, but 11s. for destroying the little finger, and 20s. for cutting off the beard. On the whole it appears that the payment was on an estimate of the part affected, and its value or appearance, the degree of the affront, and the social position of the injured party, or even that of the offender. The chief peculiarities of this Anglo-Saxon system compared with that of other Teutonic tribes are—(i) the strict maintenance of rights of private property by severe treatment of theft and stringent enactments to secure bail; (ii) the great attention paid to the privileges of the Church and the enforcement of its precepts; (iii) the rapid growth of the kingly power and its recognition as the source of justice. There are many minute variations between West-Saxon and Anglian law as to the ratios of the payments of bót.

Bothwell Bridge, THE BATTLE OF (June 22, 1679), was fought between the royalist troops, commanded by the Duke of Monmouth, and the forces of the revolted Conventiclers, or Covenanters. The insurgents occupied a strong position, with the Clyde between them and the enemy; but, as they attempted to defend instead of destroying the bridge, Monmouth cleared the passage of the river by his artillery. The insurgents were forced to retire to a hill near by, known as Hamilton Heath, where they were attacked by the royal troops and completely routed. Bothwell Bridge is in Lanarkshire, near Hamilton.

Bottle Plot, THE (1823). This name was given by Canning to a riot in a Dublin theatre, got up by the Orangemen, when a rattle and a bottle were thrown into the box of Lord Wellesley, the then lord-lieutenant, who was supposed to favour the Catholics. The grand jury threw out the bill for conspiracy with intent to murder which was brought in against those arrested.

Boudicca (d. 62), was the widow of Prasutagus, chief of the Iceni, and was the leader of the great revolt against the Romans in the time of Suetonius Paulinus. The tyranny and oppression of the conquerors had been brought to a climax by the atrocious treatment to which Boudicca and her daughters were subjected, and the revolt she headed included most of the peoples of central and eastern Britain. Her success at first was very great. The ninth legion was defeated and virtually destroyed, and the important towns of Camulodunum, Londinium, and Verulamium were captured and sacked. But the return of Suetonius and his veterans from North Wales turned the tide, and the British were signally defeated in a great battle, the site of which is unknown. According to Tacitus, Boudicca committed suicide, but Dio Cassius asserts, with less probability, that she died a natural death. Her revolt taught the Romans that the Britons were still capable of resistance to oppression, and the recall of Suetonius in the next year was the inauguration of a milder and more conciliatory policy.

Boulah Common, in County Tipperary, was the place where, on July 29, 1848, Smith O'Brien (q.v.) appeared before the house of a widow named Cormack, which had been taken possession of by fifty constabulary, and took up a position in front of it with his followers. The constables fired, and, another party coming up at the same moment, under the command of Mr. Cox and of Mr. French, a magistrate, the rebels fled, leaving eighteen dead and many wounded behind them; none of the constabulary was wounded. This action, such as it was, put an end to the Irish "insurrection" of 1848.

Boulogne. I. Its capture by the English, the one important result of the combination of Henry VIII and Charles V for the subjugation of France in 1544, took place September 14, 1544, after a protracted siege of nearly two months. According to the original plan of the campaign, Charles was to strike across France by Champagne, Henry by Picardy, and neither was to stop till he reached Paris, where, in their united might, they were to dispose of the French monarchy. The first thing, however, that Henry did was to sit down with the bulk of his army before Boulogne; and when Charles reproached him for not adhering to the method of invasion determined upon between them, Henry retaliated by accusing Charles of a similar breach of their contract. The siege of Boulogne is principally memorable for the length of the resistance made by the garrison under the disadvantageous circumstances of weak fortifications, and besiegers strong in numbers and offensive engines. After the capitulation they were allowed to march out with their arms and property; whereupon, according to Hall's "Chronicle," "the king's highness, having the sword borne naked before him by the Lord Marquis Dorset, like a noble and valiant conqueror, rode into the town, and all the trumpeters, standing on the walls of the town, sounded their trumpets at the time of his entering, to the great comfort of all the king's true subjects." The town was restored to the French on the conclusion of peace (1550). II. Boulogne was also the chief station of the force collected by Napoleon for the invasion of England in 1803. The "catamaran expedition" (October 1804) was an unsuccessful British attempt to burn his flotilla there by sending in fire-ships.

Boulter, HUGH (1672-1742), Archbishop of Armagh, studied at Merchant Taylors' School, and was elected a demy of Magdalen at the same time as Addison. He was subsequently chaplain to Sir Charles Hedges, and rector of St. Olave's, Southwark. In 1719 he was consecrated Bishop of Bristol, and in 1724 elevated to the archbishopric of Armagh and the Irish primacy. He took an active share in the political affairs of Ireland, was strongly opposed to Swift on the policy of diminishing the gold coin, though he concurred with him on the question of Wood's patent, and was one of the chief promoters of the system of Protestant charter schools. He founded many charities in Armagh, Drogheda, and elsewhere, and was no fewer than thirteen times appointed one of the lords justices of Ireland.

Bounty, QUEEN ANNE'S. [QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY.]

Bourchier, FAMILY OF. The founder of this family was Sir John de Bourchier, one of the judges of Common Pleas in the reign of Edward II. His son Robert became lord chancellor in 1340 (the first layman who held the office), was summoned to parliament as a baron in 1348, and died 1349. The barony devolved on Henry Bourchier, Count of Eu, grandson of his younger son. He was created Viscount Bourchier in 1446 and Earl of Essex in 1461, and was succeeded by his grandson Henry, upon whose death the viscounty and earldom became extinct. The barony of Bourchier was carried by Anne, his daughter, to her husband William Parr, who was created Earl of Essex in 1543; and passed on his death without issue to the Devereux family. It fell into abeyance in 1647 on the death of Robert Devereux, the son of Elizabeth's celebrated favourite.

Bourchier, HENRY, EARL OF ESSEX (d. 1483), was the son of Sir William Bourchier, Count of Eu, and brother of Thomas Bourchier, Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1455 he was appointed lord high treasurer at the instance of Richard, Duke of York, whose sister Isabel he had married; but it was not until 1460 that he definitely espoused the Yorkist cause and broke with the party of Lancaster. On the accession to the throne of Edward IV, his nephew, Bouchier was again made treasurer, and was created Earl of Essex. He was once more appointed to the treasurership in 1471, and held the office till his death.

Bouchier, SIR JOHN, LORD BERNERS (1467-1533), the holder of many important state offices during the first part of the reign of Henry VIII, and the best of the early writers of English prose, was born at Therfield in Hertfordshire, and probably educated at Balliol College, Oxford. In 1474 he succeeded to the title of his grandfather—John Bouchier—who had been created Baron Berners in 1455. In 1497 Berners aided in crushing the rebellion of the Cornishmen, who had risen against Henry VII's tax-gatherers, and after fighting with the army in France at the taking of Teroenne (1513), he accompanied the Princess Mary to Paris, as her chamberlain, on the occasion of her marriage with Louis XII (1514). In 1515 he was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, and was subsequently English envoy in Spain. He attended Henry VIII at the Field of the Cloth of Gold, and was installed in the office of deputy of Calais in 1520. Although in ill-health, and embarrassed by debt, he zealously performed the duties of the position until his death in 1533. It was at Calais that he undertook a translation of Froissart's "Chronicles." The translation was so skilfully executed in idiomatic English that it might have been easily mistaken for an original work, and to its popularity has been ascribed the promotion of a taste for historical reading and composition in England in the sixteenth century. His other works include translations of several French and Spanish romances, and of the "Golden Book of Marcus Aurelius."

The editio princeps of Berners's "Froissart" was printed by Pynson in London in two vols., 1523 and 1526; reprinted by Utterson in 1812. [S. L.]

Bouchier, THOMAS (d. 1486), Archbishop of Canterbury (1454-86), was the son of William Bouchier, Count of Eu, by Anne, daughter of Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester. After holding minor preferments, he was elected Bishop of Worcester in 1434, and was translated to Ely in 1443. On the death of Archbishop Kempe, the council, at the request of the Commons, prayed that the pope would confer the primacy on Bouchier. Accordingly, he was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury in 1454. In 1455 he was made chancellor, and held the great seal for eighteen months, both Yorkists and Lancastrians being anxious to conciliate a member of so powerful a family. Bouchier was at first inclined to act as a mediator between the contending factions, but subsequently became a distinct partisan of the Duke of York. He welcomed the return of the Yorkist leaders in 1460, and crowned Edward IV in the next year. In 1463 he was nominated cardinal and in 1473 installed. He crowned Richard III, and two years after performed the same office for Henry VII. He was associated with patrons of learning such as Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester, and left a reputation for hospitality, personal generosity, and kindness.

Bourke, RICHARD SOUTHWELL, 6TH EARL OF MAYO (1822-72), eldest son of Robert, 5th Lord Mayo, entered parliament in 1847 as member for Kildare. He was chief secretary for Ireland under Lord Derby in 1852, and again in 1858 and 1866. In 1869 he was appointed governor-general of India. His reign was a period of peace, and was marked by the inauguration of numerous enterprises for the improvement of the social and material condition of the natives. Lord Mayo was assassinated on February 8, 1872, by a Mohammedan fanatic at Port Blair, in the Andaman Islands.

Bouvines, THE BATTLE OF (July 1214), was fought at a small town between Lille and Tournai, between Philip Augustus of France and the forces of the Emperor Otto IV, with the Flemings and some English auxiliaries, under William, Earl of Salisbury. John had joined the alliance for the purpose of gaining the assistance of the Germans and Flanders in the war he was carrying on with Philip for the recovery of his French territories. The battle (in which the forces engaged on both sides would appear to have been very large) terminated in a signal victory for the French. The defeat consummated the separation of Normandy from England, and by depriving John of further hopes of being able to rely on his continental dominions, as well as by the loss of prestige it occasioned him, had some effect in compelling him to submit to the demands of the barons. The battle is memorable as being one of the few occasions in which men of English, High-German, and Low-German race have fought side by side against the French and have been completely defeated.

Bowes, SIR ROBERT (1495?-1554), was a distinguished soldier, diplomatist, and lawyer in the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward VI, and Mary. In the great Northern rebellion of 1536 he was among the prisoners captured at the surrender of Hull to the rebel forces. In 1542, whilst in command of a body of 3,000 cavalry, he was defeated and taken prisoner at Halydonrigg by a Scots force under the Earl of Huntly; and on the termination of hostilities between the two countries, became warden of the East and Middle Marches. During the exercise of this office he compiled his "Informations" on the state of the Marches, and their laws and customs. In 1552 he was made master of the rolls, a position which just then was enviored with dangers. As master of the rolls, Sir Robert Bowes was one of the witnesses to the will of King Edward VI, which fixed the succession to the crown on Lady Jane Grey. He retired from his office two months after Mary's accession to the throne, and during the remainder of his life he occupied himself with his old duties on the Scots border.

Boxer Rising, THE (1900). [CHINA, RELATIONS WITH.]

Boycotting was the name applied to the system of social and commercial ostracism which was extensively resorted to in Ireland during the land agitation of 1880 and 1881. Landlords who were disliked by their tenants, tenants who had paid rents to unpopular landlords, and other persons who incurred the hostility of the local branches of the Land League were rigidly isolated. No one could be got to work for them, or even to supply them with the necessities of life. The name was derived from Captain Boycott, of Lough Mask House, a Mayo landlord and agent, one of the first against whom the process was put in force. Captain Boycott was "relieved" by a number of Orangemen, escorted by a large military and police force, November 11, 1880.

Boyd, WILLIAM, 4TH EARL OF KILMARNOCK (1704-46), joined the rebellion of 1745. After the battle of Culloden he surrendered himself, was carried to London, convicted of high treason, and executed on Tower Hill (August 18). His title and estates were forfeited.

Boyle, CHARLES, 4TH EARL OF ORRERY and 1ST BARON BOYLE OF MARSTON (1676-1731), second son of Roger, 2nd Earl of Orrery, while an undergraduate at Oxford took part in the controversy with Bentley on the "Epistles of Phalaris." In 1701 he entered parliament as member for Huntingdon, and in 1703 succeeded to the Irish peerage of Orrery. In 1709 he fought at Malplaquet; in 1713 was envoy extraordinary to the states of Brabant and Flanders; and on his return he received an English peerage. He was a favourite of George I, but in 1721 was committed to the Tower on a charge of being concerned in Laver's Plot, of which, however, he was acquitted. His later years were devoted to philosophical studies.

Boyle, HENRY, 1ST BARON CARLETON (d. 1725), was a leading Whig politician. In 1701 he was appointed lord chancellor and undertreasurer of the exchequer. He was one of those who opposed the "tacking" of the Occasional Conformity Bill. He was employed by Godolphin to request Addison to write a poem on the battle of Blenheim, the result of his negotiations being "The Campaign." In 1708 he was made secretary of state. He was one of the managers of Sacheverell's trial, and in consequence of that ill-advised step was compelled to resign his office. On the accession of George I, Boyle was raised to the peerage, and created lord president of the council, an office he held until his death.

Budgell, "Lives of the Boyles," 1732.

Boyle, HENRY, 1ST EARL OF SHANNON (1682-1764), was for twenty-five years Speaker of the Irish House of Commons (from 1733 to 1756). He was the chief leader of the Irish patriot party, and practically commanded a majority in the House. He at first took the lead against the government in the inquiry into the pension list, but was bought off by being elevated to the peerage (1714), and by the grant of a pension of £2,000 per year.

Boyle, RICHARD, 1ST EARL OF CORK (1566-1643), the son of a Herefordshire gentleman, went to Dublin in 1588, and acquired large landed properties in Ireland. Having gained the favour of Queen Elizabeth, he was specially recommended to the notice of Sir George Carew, lord-president of Munster, and was much employed by him. In 1612 he was made a privy councillor of Ireland; in 1616 raised to the peerage as Lord Boyle; and in 1620 became Earl of Cork. In 1629 he was appointed one of the lords-justices, and two years later lord treasurer of Ireland, in which position he quarrelled violently with Strafford. At the beginning of the rebellion he raised a large body of horse for the royal service.

Biography by D. Townshend, 1904; "Orrery Papers," 2 vols., 1903.

Boyle, RICHARD, 2ND EARL OF SHANNON (1727-1807), son of Henry, 1st earl, married the daughter of Speaker Ponsonby, and in close union with him endeavoured to control the Castle. In 1770 he lost his office at the head of the ordnance department, but in 1772 the Castle again made terms with him. He was enormously rich and an excellent landlord. The Earls of Shannon, together with the Ponsonbys, Beresfords, and the Duke of Leinster, were the real rulers of the Irish parliament during the greater part of George III's reign.

Boyne, THE BATTLE OF THE (July 1, 1690), was fought between the troops of William III and the Irish under James II. James, marching from Dublin, had taken up a position behind the River Boyne, and there waited for the invading army. His position was strong, and Schomberg endeavoured to dissuade William from the attack. Early in the morning, however, the English right, under young Schomberg, was sent to cross the river by the bridge of Slane, some miles higher up, and thus turn the Irish right. The bridge was captured. Four miles to the south of the Boyne the road to Dublin runs through the passage of Duleek. If Schomberg secured this pass the Irish retreat would be cut off. Lauzun, commander of the French allies, marched to oppose him. Thus the Irish alone were left to withstand William. At the head of his left wing, consisting entirely of cavalry, he forced the passage of the river not far above Drogheda.

The centre of his army was commanded by the elder Schomberg. The Irish infantry fled without a blow; the cavalry under Richard Hamilton fought bravely on. The gallant Schomberg fell while rallying his troops. But at this moment William came up with his left wing, and the battle was won. The Irish cavalry retreated slowly, fighting to the last; their leader, Hamilton, was taken prisoner. James fled early in the day towards Dublin. The fugitives poured through the passage of Duleek, where the French had steadily resisted Meinart Schomberg's attack. Considering the great importance of the victory, the loss was slight. About 500 English had fallen, and 1,500 Irish.

A striking and detailed account of the battle is given in Macaulay's "History"; also D. C. Boulger, "Battle of the Boyne," 1911.

Boy-Patriots was a name given by their enemies to a body of young and rising men who opposed Sir Robert Walpole's administration, but who coalesced neither with the Tories nor with the malcontent Whigs. The chief members of this party were Lyttelton, George Grenville, Lord Cobham, and, above all, William Pitt.

Bracton, HENRY DE (d. 1268), the writer of a valuable commentary on the laws of England, was probably educated at Oxford. Little is known of his life. He acted as a justice itinerant for various counties from 1245 onwards; and later received a number of ecclesiastical preferments, mainly in the diocese of Exeter. It is possible that he held the office of chief justice, or at least exercised some of the duties incident thereto during its abeyance from 1246 to 1258. His work, entitled "De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ," is our great authority for mediæval English law. The work is very largely influenced by Roman legal ideas.

Bracton's treatise has been published in the Rolls Series, ed. Twiss. See F. W. Maitland, "History of English Law," i; and W. S. Holdsworth, "History of English Law."

Braddock, EDWARD (1695-1755), served under the Prince of Orange in Holland from 1746 to 1748, and was appointed to the command in America in 1754, arriving at Virginia in February 1755. Dividing his army into four sections, he led one section in person in an attack on Fort Duquesne. But on July 9, when a few miles from the fort, he fell into an ambuscade of French and Indians, and his army was routed with heavy losses. Braddock himself died of wounds four days later. [FORT DUQUESNE.]

Bradlaugh, CHARLES (1833-91), Free-thinker and politician, became the Radical proprietor of the National Reformer in 1862, after serving in the army and as a solicitor's clerk. He was elected M.P. for Northampton in 1880, but was denied the right to affirm instead of swearing on the Bible. Excluded from parliament, he was re-elected in 1881, but was again excluded and expelled in 1882. The alternation of re-election and expulsion continued until 1886, when he was finally allowed to take his seat after an affirmation. He retained the seat until his death. In 1878 he vindicated the freedom of the press in a lawsuit in which he and Mrs. Besant were involved.

Bradock Down, situated between Liskeard and Bodmin, in Cornwall, was the scene of a battle during the Civil War. Here, on January 19, 1643, the Royalist officers, Sir Ralph Hopton and Sir Bevil Grenville, coming from Bodmin, encountered and defeated the commander of the garrison of Plymouth, Ruthven, who, without waiting for the support of his superior officer, the Earl of Stamford, had crossed the Tamar and occupied Liskeard. The result of the battle was that the Cornishmen resumed the offensive, drove back Stamford and his forces, and carried by assault Saltash and Okehampton.

There is a full account of the battle in a letter of Sir Bevil Grenville, printed in Forster's "Life of Pym." See also Clarendon's "History of the Rebellion," vi, ed. W. D. Macray, 1888.

Bradshaw, JOHN (1602-59), was a barrister, but was very little known, either as a lawyer or a politician, when, in 1648, he was made president of the High Court of Justice, instituted to try Charles I. The reason for his appointment seems to have been the refusal of all the leading lawyers to serve on the trial, and the necessity of having someone possessed of legal knowledge as the president. For his services he was given the house of the dean of Westminster, the sum of £1,000, large grants of land, and the office of chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. He subsequently presided at the trials of the Duke of Hamilton and other Royalists, and was president of the council of state from 1649 to 1652. He was a member of the parliament of 1654, and was probably one of those excluded for refusing to sign the engagement recognizing Cromwell's authority. In 1659 he was made one of the council of state, and shortly afterwards a commissioner of the great seal; but he died before the end of the year. He was one of those who were styled "stiff Republicans," or "Commonwealth's men," and was sincerely opposed to the government of one person, whether king or protector; but he does not appear to have been a man of any marked ability. After the Restoration his body was disinterred and hung in chains at Tyburn.

Bradwardine, THOMAS (c. 1290-1349), a native of Chichester, educated at Merton College, Oxford, was one of the most celebrated of the scholastic philosophers, and was known by the title of "Doctor Profundus." He lectured at Oxford on divinity; and in 1338 was appointed chaplain to Edward III. In 1349 he was elected to the archbishopric of Canterbury, but within a few weeks of his consecration he was carried off by the Black Death.

Bradwardine's great work, "De Causa Dei," was printed in 1618 (London, folio). His other works were chiefly mathematical.

Braemar Gathering, THE (August 26, 1715), was the name given to the great assembly of disaffected nobles and Highland chiefs which met ostensibly for the purpose of a hunting in the Earl of Mar's forest of Braemar, but in reality to organize measures for raising the standard of insurrection in favour of the Pretender, which was done soon afterwards (September 6). Among those at the Braemar gathering were the Earl of Mar, the Marquis of Tullibardine, Lords Southesk, Errol, Kilsyth, Kenmure, Strathallan, Seaforth, and Glogargary. [JACOBITES.]

Braintree Case, THE. In 1837 the majority of the vestry of Braintree postponed a Church rate for twelve months; the churchwardens, however, proceeded to levy it on their own authority. A prohibition of the Court of Queen's Bench restrained them. It was suggested, however, that the churchwardens and the minority of the vestry might legally levy a rate, as it might be argued that the votes of the majority who refused to perform their duty were not valid. The churchwardens and the minority of the vestry voted a rate accordingly (July 1841). On the matter being once more brought before the Court of Queen's Bench, that tribunal now declared the rate valid. The decision was affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, but upset on appeal by the House of Lords, which pronounced the rate invalid, and altogether denied the right of the minority of the parishioners to levy it. It was such cases as this that led to the Act 31 & 32 Vict., c. 109, which abolished compulsory Church rates, because "the levying thereof has given rise to litigation and ill-feeling."

Bramham Moor, THE BATTLE OF (1408), was fought between the Earl of Northumberland, and the other nobles who had revolted against Henry IV, and the royal troops, under Sir Thomas Rokeby. The latter were completely victorious, Northumberland being killed on the field, and his chief associate, Lord Bardolf, mortally wounded. Bramham Moor is in Yorkshire, between Leeds and Tadcaster.

Brandon, CHARLES, DUKE OF SUFFOLK (d. 1545), was a general and courtier of the reign of Henry VIII. As a commander his success in the expedition of 1513 against France was but indifferent, but as an exponent of chivalry he was without rival. His marriage to Mary, Henry's sister, very soon after the death of her first husband, Louis XII, was ultimately approved by Henry, and their issue were preferred in the king's will to those of his elder sister, Margaret of Scotland. Frances, Brandon's daughter, married Henry Grey, by whom she became the mother of Lady Jane Grey (q.v.).

Brandywine, THE BATTLE OF (September 11, 1777), in the American War of Independence, was fought on the shores of Brandywine Creek, about fifty miles from Philadelphia, and ended in the defeat of the Americans, under Washington. General Howe had landed 18,000 men near the Brandywine. Washington had only 8,000 troops fit for action. For some days he baffled Howe's attempts to drive him back. At length, while Howe and Cornwallis made a flank movement with the greater part of their forces, Washington resolved on a bold attack on the British in his front. To render this successful, the co-operation of Sullivan was necessary. But that general, instead of obeying orders, laid himself open to an attack while his troops were taking up position; this rout threw the rest of the American army into confusion, and soon they were everywhere in retreat. The American loss was set down by Howe at 300 killed, 600 wounded, and 400 prisoners, as against 90 killed and 500 wounded and missing on the British side. Washington made good his retreat; but he had to abandon the idea of saving Philadelphia when he found that Cornwallis had forced his way between his camp and that town.

Braose, WILLIAM DE (d. 1211), was one of the most powerful barons in England, lord of Bramber in Sussex and of vast Welsh estates. He was sheriff of Hereford, one of the itinerant justices in Richard I's reign, and received from John a grant of all such lands as he could conquer from the Welsh, together with the Irish honour of Limerick. Later, however, he fell out of favour, and in 1210 John stripped him of all his possessions, and, it is said, starved his wife and son to death in Windsor Castle. De Braose himself escaped to France, where he died shortly afterwards. His youngest son Reginald received back a great part of his father's possessions, but, dying without heirs in 1229, the family became extinct.

Bray, SIR REGINALD (d. 1503), was one of Henry VII's most trusted counsellors. Together with the lord treasurer he was the king's messenger in 1485 to the city of London to ask the citizens for a loan of 6,000 marks, obtaining, after much negotiation, the considerably smaller sum of £2,000. He was the object of special hatred to the Cornish rebels of 1497 as being the instrument of Henry's extortion.

Bread Riots (1816). The cessation of the Napoleonic wars, which caused many farms to be thrown out of cultivation, and the failure of the harvest, occasioned severe distress and riots throughout England, especially in the eastern counties. Declaring that the farmers had conspired to raise the price of bread, the mob set farm buildings on fire, demanded that wheat should be sold cheap, and in several places broke into the bakers' shops. The riots were suppressed by military force, and the rioters tried by a special commission. There were also occasional riots caused by famine during the Chartist movement. The most dangerous were those of 1842, in Yorkshire and Lancashire.

Breauté, FALKES DE (d. 1226), was a Norman of mean birth, who had served King John with unscrupulous fidelity as a mercenary captain, and was rewarded by him with the sheriffdoms of Glamorgan and Oxfordshire, the castles of Chilham, Northampton, Cambridge, Oxford, and Bedford, and the hand of Margaret de Redvers, widow of Baldwin, son of the Earl of Devon. On John's death, it was judged advisable to conciliate this soldier, who had taken Bedford Castle, burnt the suburbs of London, and terrorized over John's enemies in the neighbouring counties. In return for his aid to the royal cause against Louis and the rebel barons, he obtained the sheriffdoms of Rutland, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Buckingham, Bedford, Oxford, Northampton, for seven years. But from 1220 onwards the vigorous work of Hubert de Burgh was putting an end to the state of things in which such a man could move freely. Convicted at the Dunstable assizes in 1224 of thirty-five acts of violence, he audaciously captured one of the justices, and imprisoned him in Bedford Castle, under the care of his brother, William de Breauté, who refused to surrender the castle, saying "he was no liegeman of the King of England." The siege took two months, "with great slaughter of the king's nobles"; and it required an elaborate siege-train. The castle was taken and the garrison at once hanged. Falkes, now under excommunication, had fled to North Wales, the prince of which district married his daughter Eva; but he soon returned and submitted himself to the king's mercy. The judgment of the barons was that he should surrender all his goods and abjure the realm. His wife, too, obtained a divorce on the ground of constraint; and on his first setting foot in Normandy, only his crusading vow protected him from being handed by the French king. He prevailed with Honorius III to send a strong letter of intercession to the king. While on his way back to England, however, he died in Normandy. Falkes de Breauté was a typical example of the unscrupulous foreign adventurers whom the early Angevin kings introduced into England as able tools of royal misgovernment.

Breda, THE DECLARATION OF (April 14, 1660), was the manifesto sent by Charles II to both houses of the Convention Parliament. By this the king granted a free and general pardon to all "who within forty days after the publishing hereof shall lay hold upon this our grace and favour, and shall by any public act declare their doing so," except such as parliament should except. It also granted amnesty for all political offences committed during the Civil War, and the subsequent interregnum; promised that the king would rely on the advice and assistance of a free parliament; and declared a liberty to tender consciences, so "that no man shall be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion in matter of religion." The king also undertook that no inquiry should be made into the titles of lands acquired under the Commonwealth, and that the arrears of Monck's officers and soldiers should be paid.

Breda, THE TREATY OF (July 31, 1667), was concluded between England on the one side, and France, Holland, and Denmark on the other. It was entered into after a naval war between England and Holland, in which the victories had been pretty evenly distributed. France had joined the Dutch, fearing that England would make herself supreme on the seas, but she had not taken much share in the war, her policy being to use the two great naval powers as checks one upon the other. The following were the terms of the treaty: (1) The islands of St. Christopher, Antigua, and Montserrat were restored to England, and the province of Acadia (Nova Scotia) to France. (2) England and Holland made peace on the principle of uti possidetis; thus England retained New York and New Jersey, and Holland retained Surinam. (3) The Navigation Act was modified in favour of the Dutch. (4) Friendly relations were restored between England and Denmark.

Brehon, or, more correctly, BRETHEM, in Erse signifies a judge. From the earliest days of Irish history of which we have any trace, this class seems to have been a distinctly recognized one, and previous to the conversion of the Irish to Christianity we have proof that the office had become hereditary. In fact, there seems strong reason for connecting the Brehons with the ancient Celtic priesthood in Ireland, whether or no we choose to give to that priesthood the name of Druid. [DRUIDS.] Some of the chief Brehons, whose names have been handed down to us, especially a very celebrated one, Dubhthach mac na Lugair, chief author of the "Senchus Mor," is by later writers often called a Druid. Cæsar tells us that the Druids had acquired the office of judges in both civil and criminal cases, and that they were likewise bards who preserved the historical traditions of the people. The Brehons, as they are known to history—that is to say, the Brehons of Christian time—seem to have united these two offices. "The Brehons and feast poets of the men of Erin," says an opening paragraph of the "Senchus Mor." We can easily understand that when a change of religion came, and the priestly functions passed to the men ordained by Patrick and his successors, the more secular offices would be retained by the Brehons. The preaching of St. Patrick began about the year 432, and was crowned with a rapid success. One of the most important among his early conversions was that of the Brehon Dubhthach previously referred to. We may suppose there were mutual concessions between the two. Dubhthach, who was probably a Druid, renounced his magical and idolatrous practices, and Patrick in his turn "blessed his mouth" (as we are expressly told in the "Senchus Mor") when he uttered secular judgments. It was probably with St. Patrick that the idea arose of writing down the Brehon laws, or, as we should say, of codifying them. We must remember that at this time Theodosius had just codified the Roman law, a precedent which would be present in the mind of St. Patrick. In fact, from this time forward we nearly always find that the conversion of any barbarous people to Christianity is immediately followed by some sort of codifying of their ancient traditional law. The first Saxon code is that of Ethelbert, King of Kent, which was undertaken by St. Augustine. Whatever of the traditional law is not inconsistent with the Christian doctrine or the Crown law is in all cases retained, but what is opposed to these is expunged. Thus, in the introduction to the first great code of Brehon laws, the "Senchus Mor" (A.D. 438-41), we find a distinction made between the "law of nature" and the "law of God." The latter refers to the laws which came with the revealed religion; the former term bears reference to the words of St. Paul where he speaks of the Gentiles "doing by nature the works of the law," and therefore means all in the ancient code which was not inconsistent with the revealed commandments. The "Senchus Mor" is said to have had nine authors, or co-operators, in its construction, who are spoken of as "the nine pillars of the Senchus Mor." Three were kings, viz., Laeghaire, Over-King of Ireland; Core, King of Cashel; and Dairi, King of Ulster. Three were bishops or saints, namely, Patrick, Benen (Benignus), and Cairnech; these we may suppose looked after the Christian portion of the code. Finally, we have three Brehons, who were, of course, the chief authors of the law, viz., Dubhthach before mentioned, assisted by Rossa and Ferghus. These last two are sometimes spoken of simply as "bards";

but as we have before said, it is not probable that there was any distinct line of demarcation between the Brehon and the bard.

Brembre, SIR NICHOLAS (d. 1388), was lord mayor of London in 1377 and 1378, and again from 1383 to 1385. He was the head of the royalist party in the city, and in 1387 was one of those who were appealed of treason by the lords appellants. In 1388 he was impeached by parliament, sentenced to be beheaded, and shortly afterwards executed. [APPELLANTS.]

Bremule, THE BATTLE OF (August 20, 1119), was a cavalry skirmish fought during the campaign in Normandy between Louis II of France and Henry I, and arose out of the support given by the former to William Clito. The French were united, and shortly afterwards Louis made peace and abandoned William. There were only about 900 men engaged in this combat, and not more than three were killed. Both kings were present on the field.

Brentford, THE BATTLE OF (November 12, 1642), was fought between the Royalists under Prince Rupert and the Parliamentarians under Denzil Holles. After the battle of Edgehill Charles marched towards London, touching Reading and other places on the way. At Brentford Rupert encountered three regiments which were stationed there, and after a sharp skirmish forced the barricades they had erected, and occupied the town of Brentford, taking fifteen hundred prisoners and eleven cannon. The Parliamentary army being subsequently reinforced, the king was obliged to fall back from Brentford, and retired into winter quarters at Oxford.

Brest, THE EXPEDITION AGAINST (1694), was a disastrous failure. The English government had attempted to keep the destination of the expedition secret, but it had become well known to the French government. Information had been treacherously conveyed to them by various persons in England, among others by Marlborough, who wrote a letter to James II on the subject. Thus forewarned, the French government sent Vauban to put the defences in order. On June 6 the fleet, under Berkeley, with Talmash in command of the land forces, was off Cape Finisterre. It was proposed to land in Camaret Bay. The Marquis of Carmarthen, the eldest son of the Duke of Leeds, entered the basin to reconnoitre, and reported the defences formidable. But Berkeley and Talmash thought that he overrated the danger. Next day Carmarthen, with eight ships, was followed by Talmash with a hundred boats full of soldiers. A murderous fire from the batteries swept away the men. Talmash, however, imagining that he was confronted by peasants, refused to retire, and fell mortally wounded as he attempted to land. Ships and boats hastily retired from the bay, but not without the loss of 400 sailors and 700 soldiers. The expedition returned ingloriously, after attempting to blow up the pier at Dunkirk and bombarding Dieppe, Havre, and Calais.

Brétigny, THE TREATY OF (May 8, 1360), was concluded between England and France after the continued successes of Edward III, while the French king, John, who had been taken prisoner at Poitiers, remained in captivity in England. The protracted negotiations were brought to a close by a dreadful storm, recorded in history, which was interpreted to be a manifestation of divine wrath at the continuance of hostilities. France consented to cede all Aquitaine, including Gascony, Guienne, Poitou, and their dependencies and outlying districts; and in northern France, Calais, Guines, and the county of Ponthieu. King John was to pay a ransom of 3,000,000 gold crowns. The question of Brittany was left open. The French were to break off their alliance with the Scots, and to abstain from assisting them against the English, and the English were to give no further aid to the Flemings. By a separate treaty, the Kings of France and Navarre were to be reconciled. It was arranged that there should be a subsequent exchange of charters of renunciation; Edward abandoning his claim to the French throne, and John his claim to the suzerainty of the ceded districts. The instruments were, however, never executed, and thus the way was left open for the resumption of warfare in 1369.

Bretwalda. A title of supremacy among the early Anglo-Saxon kings. Bæda ("Hist. Eccles.," ii, 5) gives a list of seven kings who had ruled over the English south of the Humber. The first four—Ella of Sussex, Ceawlin of Wessex, Redwald of East Anglia, and Ethelbert of Kent—could have had no power over the Northumbrians, even if they all really possessed the influence Bæda assigns to them. But the last three—Edwin, Oswald, and Oswy—were Northumbrian kings, and therefore their "imperium" or "ducatus," according to Bæda, must have extended over all South Britain. Oswald is, in fact, called by Adamnan ("Vit. S. Columbæ"), "Totius Britanniae Imperator ordinatus a Deo," and history proves the reality of their power. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (s.a. 827), when enlarging on the exploits of Egbert, quotes Bæda's list, and adds to them Egbert, saying, "And he was the eighth king that was Bretwalda." West-Saxon prejudice probably caused the chronicler to pass over the great Mercians of the eighth century, of whom Ethelbald claimed to be "King of the South English," and Offa "Rex Anglorum" ("Cod. Dip.," i, 96, 162, etc.), while Charles the Great called the latter the "greatest of the kings of the West." Besides this passage, the remarkable word Bretwalda occurs elsewhere only in a bilingual charter of Athelstan in 934 ("Cod. Dip.," v, 218), which describes him as "King of the Anglo-Saxons and Brytaen-walda of all the island"—in Latin, "Anglo-Saxonum nec non totius Britanniae Rex." In seeking the meaning of this rare title we must first distinguish between the name Bretwalda and the fact of overlordship. Everyone admits the successive hegemony of Northumbria, Mercia, and Wessex over English and British alike. But the nature of this supremacy, and the relation of the Bretwaldadom to it, have been much debated. Rapin started a theory of an elective sovereignty, which Turner and Lingard at least tacitly accept, and which Palgrave worked out to new consequences in his "English Commonwealth." Palgrave connected the title with the imperial position of the kings, as inheritors of the remains of Roman Imperialism that still survived the withdrawal of the legions. The Bretwalda was the successor of Carausius, the predecessor of Edgar. He illustrates the continuity of Roman and British influence after the English Conquest, and the all-pervading fascination of Rome. "Heptarchic" England was a federal monarchy under an elective Bretwalda, the "wielder of Britain." Out of this office grew the later English kingship. Athelstan, the last Bretwalda, the first "King of the English," marks the contact of the two titles. Against this brilliant but unsupported theory Kemble ("Saxons in England") did his best to minimize both fact and title. The word, according to him, meant not "ruler of Britain," but "wide ruler" (from bryten, broad; cf. brytencyning). The idea of election among the "kites and crows," of continuity between rival races, of a meeting of Welsh princes to transfer to Ella the "Empire of Britain," he condemned as quite untenable. How could the feeble princes of the south-east make their influence felt up to the Humber? Hallam ("Middle Ages," ii, 352-9, and "Archæologia," vol. xxxii) inclined, though with more moderation, to a similar view. Freeman ("Norman Conquest," vol. i, note B) leaned to "an intermediate position between Kemble and Palgrave." He accepted the title as significant of a substantial hegemony, but rejected Palgrave's doctrine of Roman influence and continuity. The Bretwaldadom, he held, was of "purely English growth." Stubbs ("Constitutional History," i, 162) seems to agree with Freeman in a view that certainly best accounts for the facts. If we could get rid of Ella and the earlier Bretwaldas, there would be some reason for connecting the triumph of the Northumbrians over Cadwallon, and the final catastrophe of the Britons, with Edwin's assumption of imperial style and emblems. (See Rhys, "Celtic Britain," p. 134, for a later development of Palgrave's theory.) But there is no evidence for a consistent theory, and there is always the danger of making too much of a name that occurs only twice in the authorities.

Besides the authorities referred to in the text, see B. A. Freeman, "Norman Conquest," i, 542, note B, where there is a statement of the arguments on both sides of the question, and a list of the various imperial titles assumed by early English kings.

Brewer, WILLIAM (d. 1226), was employed as a minister, a judge, and an ambassador by Henry II, Richard I, John, and Henry III. He was a strong supporter of the royal prerogative under the two latter monarchs, and received valuable rewards for his services.

Brian Boru (or BOROMHE) is said to have been the son of Kennedy, King of Cashel or Munster. His first warlike exploits were performed under the banner of his brother, Mathgamhain. After his brother's assassination, Brian became king, and as such compelled the Danes of Dublin to pay tribute. In 984 he secured the kingship of Leinster. He was engaged in a long and finally successful war against Malachy (Maelsechlainn II), the King of Tara, and his nominal overlord. In the end he was acknowledged as lord even by the O'Neills, and Malachy, their chief, followed in his train as an under-king. The whole island had now submitted to him (1001), but the Danes made an effort to re-establish their supremacy. Leinster joined the Ostmen, but they were overthrown by Brian in twenty-five battles and finally at Clontarf (1014). Brian, who is said to have been eighty-three years of age, did not command in person, but remained in his tent, where, after the victory had been won, he was killed. Tradition makes Armagh his burial-place. Brian Boru must be regarded as the popular hero of early Irish history, and the stories told about his reign led to its being regarded as a sort of golden age. The O'Briens and many other distinguished Irish families claim him as their ancestor.

Bribery. (1) INDIRECT BRIBERY, by the bestowal of titles and offices and the like, has at some periods of our history been frequently employed by the Crown and by its ministers. The practice became very common under the later Stuarts, and under William III the abuse had become so great that by the Act of Settlement, 1701, it was enacted that no person holding an office under, or receiving a pension from, the Crown should be eligible for election as a member of parliament. This act was speedily repealed in favour of one which rendered the holders of any new office created after October 25, 1705, incapable of sitting in the House, as well as persons who were in receipt of a pension from the Crown during pleasure, and which further obliged members to vacate their seats on accepting any of the existing offices, though they might be immediately re-elected. In 1742 another act was passed against place-men; and in 1782 government contractors were prohibited from sitting in the House. After the beginning of Pitt's administration, the practice of bestowing places as a bribe to members gradually became much less common, and almost ceased after the Reform Bill; though a certain amount of this indirect form of bribery is perhaps a necessary accompaniment of our parliamentary system, which places offices at the disposal of the leaders of the successful party. [PENSIONS.]

(2) DIRECT BRIBERY by sums of money may be divided into three classes:—

(i) Bribery of Members of Parliament by the Crown or its Ministers was largely employed during the age of Charles II, when the king himself took the money of France, and partly employed it in bribing members. Instances had, however, occurred under James I, and we are told that Richard II occasionally used "gifts" to secure the passing of unpopular measures through the House of Commons. William III found it necessary to have recourse to the same means of propitiating obstinate members; and under George II (especially during the administration of Sir Robert Walpole) bribery was "reduced to an organized system." Under George III Lord Bute frequently bribed those whose votes he wished to secure. In regard to the peace of 1762, Horace Walpole says: "A shop was publicly opened at the Pay Office, whither the members flocked, and received the wages of their venality in bank-bills, even to so low a sum as £200 for their votes on the treaty; £25,000, as Martin, secretary to the treasury, afterwards owned, were issued in one morning, and in a single fortnight a vast majority was purchased to approve the peace." In 1763 Lord Saye and Sele returned Grenville a bribe of £300, saying that "a free horse wanted no spur." The practice continued under Lord North, but gradually died out under the powerful and popular administration of Pitt. The union with England in 1800 was, however, passed through the Irish parliament by the systematic bribery of the opposition members, carried out on an enormous scale. In recent years the sale of honours has been the occasion of some scandal.

(ii) Bribery of Judges and Ministers was, even in early times, of very frequent occurrence; and it was no uncommon thing to find one or more of the judges corrupt. In 1401 a statute was passed, to the effect that all judges, officers, and ministers of the king convicted of bribery should forfeit treble the bribe, be punished at the king's will, and be discharged from the king's service, whilst the person who offered the bribe was held guilty of a misdemeanour. Under the Tudors and Stuarts judicial bribery under various forms was common. So eminent a person as Lord Chancellor Bacon was, in 1621, found guilty on his own confession of having received extensive bribes, although he denied that he had permitted them to influence his judgment. He was heavily fined, sent to the Tower, and degraded. There are, however, many later instances of judges being removed for corruption. Judicial and ministerial bribery has, however, been practically unknown since the Revolution of 1688.

(iii) Bribery connected with Elections. An early instance of a penalty inflicted for bribery in elections was in 1571, when a fine was imposed on the borough of Westbury for receiving a bribe of four pounds for the election of Thomas Long as their member, "being a very simple man, and of small capacity to serve in that place," though Long himself was not expelled from the House. Under the Stuarts the practice of purchasing votes continued, and had become quite common by the reign of Charles II. In 1696 an attempt was made to pass a statute, which subsequently became law in the reign of Anne, to impose a property qualification of £600 a year from land on county members, and £300 a year on borough members, in order to check the system by which men who had made money in trade or otherwise used to buy seats in places with which they had absolutely no connexion. Ten years before this, however, the first Bribery Act had been passed, though bribery had even then been recognized as an offence by the common law, and had been condemned by resolutions of the House of Commons. The increase of corruption under George II led to an act in 1729 inflicting severe penalties on persons receiving bribes; but it seems to have had little effect, and in 1762 another act was passed inflicting pecuniary penalties for bribery. There were two methods by which candidates might purchase a seat: they could either buy the borough outright from the corporation or proprietor, or, if the electors happened to be independent, they could buy individual votes. Examples of the first method are by no means uncommon. In 1767 the mayor and corporation of Oxford offered to return their sitting members, Sir Thomas Stapylton and Mr. Lee, at the next election for £567. The offer was refused, and some of the aldermen were sent to Newgate, but subsequently discharged, after having been reprimanded on their knees by the Speaker. The borough of Ludgershall was sold for £9,000; and, says Erskine May, "it was notorious at the time that agents, or 'borough-brokers,' were commissioned by some of the smaller boroughs to offer them to the highest bidder." Bribery of individual electors also prevailed to a large extent, prices generally ranging from twenty guineas to one guinea a vote; though it is said that the electors of Grampound on one occasion received £300 apiece. In 1768, 1782, and 1786 attempts were ineffectually made to secure the acceptance of bills to restrain corruption; and it was not until 1809 that a bill was brought in by Mr. Curwen to prevent the obtaining of seats by bribery, and actually passed. Heavy penalties were imposed by it on corrupt agreements for the return of members; and in the case of persons returned by bribery or corruption, it enjoined the forfeiture of their seats, but does not seem to have been very effectual. The Reform Act of 1832 made no distinct provision for the restraint of bribery, which continued to be practised more or less openly, in many cases leading to the disfranchisement of boroughs. In 1841 a new Bribery Act was passed extending the powers of election committees. In 1852 an act provided for the appointment of royal commissioners to inquire into cases of corruption; and two years later the offer or acceptance of a bribe was rendered a misdemeanour, which might be punished by fine, imprisonment, and forfeiture of franchise; by this act also the accounts of election expenses were to be published. In 1858 another act permitted the conveyance of voters to the poll, though no money was to be given to the voters themselves for the purpose. In 1883 an act, called the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, was passed to prevent bribery and limit the expenses of elections. Stringent penalties against corruption are enacted in it. A candidate found guilty of bribery is incapacitated for sitting in the House of Commons, or voting at an election for seven years. Persons convicted of bribery, or "undue influence," are liable to imprisonment for a year, and a fine of £200. The use of hired vehicles for conveying voters to the poll is illegal. Since 1868, when the House of Commons resigned its privilege of exclusive jurisdiction in cases of controverted elections, the mode of questioning the validity of an election is to present a petition against it. This petition is tried before one of the judges of the superior courts of common law. The judge certifies the result of the trial to the Speaker, and at the same time reports any violations of the law relating to corrupt practices which have been proved before him. The House thereupon takes the requisite action on his certificate and report. [ELECTIONS.]

Bridge of Dee, THE AFFAIR OF (1639), is the name given to the forcing of the bridge over the Dee by Montrose and the Covenanters. The bridge was gained by its defenders being drawn off by a stratagem, and access was thus obtained to the city of Aberdeen. In September 1644 Montrose, this time on the Royalist side, again fought a successful engagement at the bridge of Dee.

Bridgeman, Sir Orlando (1606 ?-74), was the son of a bishop of Chester, and was returned as member for Wigan to the Long Parliament in 1640. He took part with the king, and in 1644 was one of the members of the Oxford Parliament. In 1645 he was one of the king's commissioners at the Treaty of Uxbridge. During the Commonwealth he lived in retirement, and devoted himself to conveyancing. Bridgeman and Sir Geoffrey Palmer are credited with the invention of an important legal expedient during this period. "This was the notable contrivance of 'trustees to preserve contingent remainders,' of which it is enough to say that it protected the interests of tenants in tail against the risk of being defeated by the wrongful act of preceding life tenants. From this epoch must be dated the modern type of settlement." On the Restoration he was appointed lord chief justice of the Common Pleas. He presided at the trial of the regicides. From 1667 to 1672 he was lord keeper of the great seal. His eldest son, Henry, was created Lord Bradford.

Bridgwater. An ancient town in Somersetshire on the River Parret, and said to derive its name (Burgh-Walter) from a Walter of Douai, to whom the manor was granted at the Conquest. A fine castle was built here in Henry II's reign by William de Briwere. The town was taken by the Royalists in 1643, but in July 1645 it was captured by Fairfax. By this capture the Parliamentarians secured a line of forts extending from sea to sea which blocked up and practically isolated Devonshire and Cornwall. Bridgwater was one of the places that declared for Monmouth, and it was within a few miles of this town that he met with his overthrow at Sedgemoor. The borough of Bridgwater was disfranchised in 1870.

Briefs, Church, were letters addressed by the sovereign to the archbishops, bishops, and clergy, empowering them to raise voluntary contributions for building churches, and for charitable purposes generally. They do not appear to have been issued before the Reformation, and may possibly be derived from the briefs given by the papal court to mendicant friars, empowering them to collect contributions. The granting of briefs appears to have led to great abuses. It was regulated by 3 Anne, c. 14, and practically abolished by 9 Geo. IV, c. 42, though briefs have been issued for special purposes since the date of the latter statute.

Brigantes, The, were a powerful tribe, or confederacy of tribes, of ancient Britain. They appear to have occupied the whole of the northern and north-western part of southern Britain, as far as the Firths of Forth and Clyde, and to have been driven northward from their original southern possessions by later colonists. According to the view of some authorities, they were descendants of the earlier (non-Celtic) inhabitants of the island. They were, at any rate, among the rudest and fiercest of the British tribes. Cartimandua (q.v.), the queen of one of the Brigantian tribes, was an ally of the Romans, and delivered Caratacus (q.v.) to them when he sought refuge in her kingdom. But the nation was weakened by a civil war, which broke out between Cartimandua and her husband, Venutius; and after being defeated by Cerealis in 69, was subdued, after some difficult campaigns, by Agricola. There was a tribe of Brigantes (possibly a colony from Britain) which occupied the present county of Wexford, in Ireland.

Brigham, The Conference of (March 1290), was a meeting held by the Scots estates, near Berwick, to decide about the marriage of the Maid of Norway and Prince Edward of England previously agreed upon at Salisbury. A treaty was made, and accepted by Edward I, providing that the rights and liberties of Scotland should continue unviolated; that the kingdom of Scotland should remain separate from England, divided by its proper boundaries; and that no parliament was to be held beyond the frontiers of Scotland to discuss matters respecting that kingdom, and other points favourable to Scotland. When Baliol obtained the crown of Scotland from Edward, the English king required as a condition of its bestowal the renunciation of the Treaty of Brigham.

Bright, John (1811-89), son of Jacob Bright, of Greenbank, Rochdale, took an active part in the reform agitation of 1831-2, and became, in 1839, one of the earliest members of the Anti-Corn Law League. In April 1843 he unsuccessfully contested the city of Durham, for which, however, he was returned in July following; and he continued to sit for Durham till 1847, when he was returned for Manchester. He made his maiden speech in parliament on Ewart's motion for extending the principles of free trade, August 7, 1843. During the interval between his election for Manchester and the accession of the first Derby ministry to power, Bright's activity in parliament and on the platform was varied and continuous. In the House of Commons he proposed to apply the remedy of free trade in land to the state of things which produced the Irish famine. He appealed unsuccessfully for the dispatch of a royal commission to investigate the state of India; and in 1849 he was appointed one of the members of the celebrated select committee of the House of Commons on official salaries. In parliament and in the provinces, especially at Manchester, he co-operated earnestly with Cobden in his attempts to obtain financial reform, with a view to the reduction of the naval and military establishments. He also denounced the Crimean War with great energy, and at the general election which ensued he was rejected by Manchester, but in a few months was invited to fill a vacancy at Birmingham. In 1868 he accepted office under Gladstone as president of the board of trade, but was compelled by ill-health to retire from office in December 1870. On his recovery, he became chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, which office he continued to hold till the downfall of the Liberal government in 1874. On the return of the Liberals to power, under Gladstone, in 1880, Bright again became chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. He resigned on July 17, 1882, owing to a difference with his colleagues as to their Egyptian policy. In 1886 he opposed the Home Rule Bill.

Brihwald. [BERTHWALD.]

Brihuega, THE BATTLE OF (1710), was a great defeat sustained by the British arms during the War of the Succession in Spain. General Stanhope, with Stahremberg, his Austrian colleague, had occupied Madrid, but it was found impossible to hold the city. They therefore retreated into Catalonia, marching in two parallel armies. The French commander, the Duke of Vendôme, pursued with remarkable rapidity. Stanhope was surprised and surrounded at Brihuega. The walls of the town were battered with cannon, and a mine sprung under one of the gates. The British kept up a deadly fire until their powder was consumed, and then fought on with the bayonet against terrible odds. At length the British general saw that further resistance could produce only a useless slaughter of his troops. He concluded a capitulation by which the remnant of his army, 500 in number, surrendered themselves as prisoners of war. Scarcely was it signed when Stahremberg appeared. His slowness had ruined his cause; but the battle that ensued, called that of Villa Viciosa, was admirably contested, when night put an end to it. Stahremberg remained master of the field, but all the fruits of the battle remained with Vendôme. The Austrian general spiked his cannon, and, with a remnant of his army, consisting of 7,000, took refuge in Barcelona.

Brisbane, the capital of Queensland, was founded as a penal settlement in 1825, and named after Sir Thomas Brisbane, governor of New South Wales, 1821-5. It formed part of New South Wales till 1859. The penal establishment was abolished in 1842.

Bristol has from an early period ranked as one of the most important of English towns. Until the rise of Liverpool and the manufacturing towns of the north, it was the second city in the kingdom. The castle was granted by William II to Robert Fitz-Hamon, from whom it passed by marriage to Robert of Gloucester, natural son of Henry I. Robert of Normandy was for a time imprisoned here. In Bristol Castle Stephen was imprisoned by the partisans of Matilda in 1141, and sixty years later the ill-fated Eleanor of Brittany was incarcerated at Bristol by her uncle John, who was afraid that her claims to the throne might be put forward by his opponents. In 1399 Henry of Lancaster took the town, and put to death many of the adherents of Richard II. Sebastian Cabot (q.v.) was born at Bristol, and sailed from that port on his famous voyage, and in 1609 a colony of settlers from Bristol were the first to establish themselves in Newfoundland. Bristol was made the seat of one of Henry VIII's new bishoprics. The town played a very prominent part in the civil war of the seventeenth century. At the beginning of the Great Rebellion Bristol declared for the Parliament and received a garrison under the command of Nathaniel Fiennes. In July 1643 the Royalist successes in the west made the possession of Bristol still more important, as commanding the valley of the Severn, and Prince Rupert was sent to besiege it. After a very brief attack, Fiennes determined to capitulate, and Rupert offered such good terms that a large number of the Parliamentary troops took service in his army. Bristol remained in the possession of the Royalists till September 1645, when Rupert, who was in command of the town, surrendered it in almost as unaccountable a manner as Fiennes had done two years before. In 1656 Bristol Castle was destroyed by the government. In 1685 it was the one town in Somerset that refused to receive Monmouth. In 1715 serious riots broke out here on the occasion of the accession of George I. Violent riots also occurred in 1793 in opposition to an unpopular bridge-toll, and many persons lost their lives before they were suppressed; and great rioting took place in 1831 [BRISTOL RIOTS] in connexion with the Reform Bill. The church of St. Mary Redcliffe, one of the finest in England, was in great part built by William Canyng, a wealthy merchant of Bristol, in the later part of the fourteenth century.

Bristol, EARLS OF. [DIGBY.]

Bristol Riots (October 29-31, 1831) were a series of outbreaks produced by the popular indignation which resulted from the rejection of the Reform Bill by the House of Lords. On the occasion of the public entry into Bristol of the recorder, Sir Charles Wetherell, a bitter opponent of the bill, a mob, which seems never to have greatly exceeded a few hundred persons, took possession of the principal streets, broke into the town hall, and set fire to several houses. For two days the weakness of the magistrates allowed the disorders to continue unchecked; at length they instructed the military to re-establish order, which was done without much difficulty, though with some loss of life. The blame for the long continuance of the riots was laid on Colonel Brereton, the commander of the military, who might have used the discretion with which the magistrates had armed him (probably in order to avoid the responsibility themselves) to suppress the disturbances at an earlier period. He was tried by court-martial, and, unable to face the consequences, committed suicide. Four of the ringleaders were hanged, and the town was compelled to pay £68,000 damages.

Britain. [BRITANNIA; ROMANS IN BRITAIN; BRITONS; and GREAT BRITAIN.]

Britain, COUNT OF (Comes Britanniarum), was a Roman officer who in Constantine's scheme of governing the empire, was the supreme general of the military forces in Britain. His jurisdiction was, however, subject to that of the masters of the cavalry and infantry in the west. His power was not localized within Britain, but under him were the Dux Britanniarum, who seems to have commanded the forces massed along the northern wall, and the Comes Litoris Saxonici, who was in command of the coast-line between the Wash and Wight, which was most exposed to piratical Saxon assaults.

Britannia, or BRITANNIA (the latter very rare form is the "theoretically correct" spelling), a name constructed by the Romans from the Celtic word Priten or Prydyn, meaning the painted or tattooed men; and used by them to denote the larger of the "British Islands," originally styled Albion. After Cæsar's time this is the general usage, but in an earlier form "αἱ βρετανικαὶ νῆσοι" are said to have included Ierne (Ireland) as well as Albion. [BRITONS.]

Britannia, THE ROMAN DIVISIONS OF. Originally only one province of Britain was constituted, but Severus appears to have divided it into Upper and Lower Britain, and a line drawn from the Mersey to the Humber may have constituted the boundary between the two divisions. When Diocletian and, later, Constantine reorganized the empire, the "diocese" of Britain was divided into four "provinces," Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, Flavia Cæsariensis, and Maxima Cæsariensis. To these Valentia was added in 369; it probably consisted of the district between the two walls of Hadrian and Antoninus. The situation of the rest is unknown, although an inscription found at Cirencester indicates that that town was in the province of Britannia Prima.

British Columbia. [COLUMBIA.]

British Empire, THE, consists of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Channel Islands, and the Isle of Man, the Irish Free State, India, the Dominions of Canada and New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Commonwealth of Australia, and colonies, protectorates, and dependencies, to which are attached various mandated territories. This Commonwealth of Nations occupies more than a quarter of the world's land surface, and its estimated population bears a like proportion to the whole. Out of this population only one-seventh is of European stock, and barely a fifth Christian. It is an empire which, by its conglomerate growth, the variety of its component parts and the vast differences separating them, is incapable of centralized organization and presents a multiplicity of problems that are interdependent and bewildering in their gravity. Some sort of uniform policy, however, is adopted in the administration of the dependent empire by means of the colonial office (q.v.), while the dominions office and the Imperial Conference (q.v.) regularize a harmony out of the relations of those parts of the empire called the autonomous dominions. Probably the best method of classification is according to the form of government in each component part. A territorial grouping is possible and has been adopted in this dictionary for convenience and in view of the tendency of some of the component parts of the empire to group themselves into confederations comparable to those which already exist. The governmental classification is useful, however, in showing the relation of the colony or dependency to the imperial government. India is treated separately (q.v.). I. The self-governing dominions are Canada, New Zealand, South Africa, Irish Free State, Newfoundland, and the Commonwealth of Australia with its six component states. The territories administered by the Commonwealth are of course a separate class. Autonomy was guaranteed to the dominions by the Imperial Conference of 1926 (q.v.), and its relations with the mother country then defined. II. Southern Rhodesia, which enjoys responsible self-government subject to certain conditions relating to native administration (which matters are reserved for the high commissioner for South Africa), is in a separate category by itself. III. Malta enjoys a similar uniqueness. It has responsible government with regard to internal affairs, but in matters of imperial concern the governor legislates and administers with the help of a nominated council of officers and can be overruled by the secretary of state, and even by a legislative order in council by the Crown. IV. The fourth category is that of colonies not possessing responsible government but in which the administration is carried on by public officers under the control of the colonial secretary, and also of protectorates similarly controlled. This category can be further divided as follows: (1) Colonies possessing an elected house of assembly and a nominated legislative council, viz., Bahamas, Barbados, and Bermuda; (2) colonies possessing a partly elective legislative council, the constitution of which does not provide for an official majority, viz., British Guiana, Ceylon, and Cyprus. (3) Colonies and protectorates possessing a partly elective legislative council in which the constitution does provide for an official majority, viz., Fiji, Grenada, Jamaica, Kenya (the legislative council of which has power to legislate also for Kenya Protectorate), the Leeward Islands (a confederation), Mauritius, Nigeria Colony and Protectorate (a single political unit), St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Sierra Leone Colony and Protectorate (similar to Nigeria), the Straits Settlements, and Trinidad. (4) Colonies and protectorates possessing a legislative council nominated entirely by the Crown, viz., British Honduras, the Falkland Islands, the Gambia (the legislative council of which legislates for Gambia Protectorate), the Gold Coast, Hong Kong, Northern Rhodesia, Nyassaland Protectorate, Seychelles, and the Uganda Protectorate. Northern Rhodesia has not yet passed the legislation necessary to complete the permissive constitution which provides for an elective element in the legislative council. The others in this class, with exception of British Honduras, are so regulated that there is an official majority in the council. (5) Colonies and protectorates without legislative councils, viz., Ashanti, Basutoland, Bechuanaland Protectorate, Gibraltar, the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast, St. Helena, Somaliland, Swaziland, Wei-hai-wei, and the islands included under the Western Pacific high commissionership. There is, however, behind these governmental forms of the possessions in this fourth category the ultimate legislating sovereignty of the Crown; and except in the Bahamas, Barbados, Bermuda, British Honduras, and the Leeward Islands, the Crown has the power to legislate by order in council.

Under the separate headings will be found a short historical survey and description of the constitution of all the parts of the British Empire. The colonial policy of Great Britain can best be studied in the following works :

British Legion, THE. (1) On the outbreak of the war between Isabella of Spain and Don Carlos, in 1835, an order in council was issued authorizing "any person to engage during the next two years in the military and naval service of her Majesty Isabella II." De Lacy Evans, a colonel in the British army, was selected for the command. Recruits to the number of 10,000 were enlisted, and dispatched to the Peninsula. In 1837 Evans returned to England, and in 1838 the ministry withdrew the order in council and the corps was dissolved. (2) In 1921 the four national organizations of ex-service men existing in Great Britain were amalgamated to form the British Legion, which was incorporated by royal charter in 1925.

Britons. The general name given by the Romans to the inhabitants of South Britain. Its etymology is generally traced to the Welsh brith (spotted or tattooed), but it has also been associated with brethyn, the Welsh for cloth. On the latter hypothesis the Britons were the clothed people, as opposed to the pre-

Celtic occupants, who, it was formerly thought, wore but little clothing. The classical form, "Britanni" passed away with the Romans, and was superseded by the form "Brittones." Modern inquirers have sought a remedy for the vague use of the word Briton by limiting it (in its Welsh form, Brython) to that branch of the Celtic stock otherwise called the Cymric, and it has been pointed out that large Gaelic survivals prevented South Britain from being exclusively the property of either group of tribes. [CELTS.] But as these vestiges of the Gael had almost passed away before regular history begins, we cannot do much harm in treating of the Britons in the more general sense of the ancient writers. But, politically and socially, we have not sufficient information to draw a clear line between Brython and Goidel (Gael); especially if we reject the accounts given by Bæda and his school. The absence of heroic kingship, the nearer approximation (especially in the south-east) to the higher culture and civilization of Gaul, the predominance of Druidism [DRUIDS] over the ordinary Aryan polytheism are, perhaps, the chief marks of the "Brythonic" tribes. Linguistically, they are distinguished from the Gael by the use of "p" instead of the older "qu" or "qv." The tribes of the south were, from their neighbourhood or their affinity to the Gauls, the most advanced in culture, and the Cantii were, according to Cæsar, the most civilized nation. Besides these, the chief tribes of the Britons were the Belgæ (q.v.), Atrebatii, Regni, Durotriges, and Dumnonii of the South; the Dobuni, Catuvellauni, Coritavi, and Cornarii of Middle England; the Icenii, Cenimagni, and Trinobantes of the Eastern counties; the Silures, Demetæ, and Ordovices of south-eastern, south-western, and northern Wales; the Brigantes (q.v.), and some less important tribes—such as the Parisi, Segantii, Otadini, Selgovæ, and Damnonii—of the district between the Humber and the Northern Wall. Beyond this latter the Britons, in any precise sense, hardly extended.

Brittany, RELATIONS WITH. One of the great phenomena of the fifth century was a wholesale migration of Britons to northern Gaul. The process began, according to Nennius, as early as the days of the usurper Maximus (383), but no contemporary evidence of British colonization is available before the middle of the next century. About that date large numbers of exiles from southern and western Britain sought refuge from the Saxon incursions in the neighbouring peninsula of Armorica. There they settled, bringing with them their own language, religion, and institutions and even local nomenclature, and establishing the counties of Vannes, Cornouailles, Léon, and Domnonée. Thus came into being the Brittany of later history. With the establishment of the English monarchy over Britain, the early relations of Wales and Brittany became slighter. But even in England we find Alfred sending gifts to Breton abbey, and Athelstan giving a shelter to Alan when the Breton revolt against William Longsword of Normandy had been put down. The superiority which Rolf had previously established over Brittany thus continued, and it accounts for the number of Bretons in the Conqueror's army, and their large grants of land in the west of England. Alan of Brittany received that honour of Richmond which so long remained a link between England and Brittany. It was from Brittany that Walter Map brought the old Welsh Book of Legends of Arthur that is professedly the basis of Geoffrey of Monmouth's history, and Rhys Ap Tewdwr's return from his exile in Armorica marks a new era in Welsh literature. Like the Welsh, the Bretons were constantly harassed by war and faction; and, in 1148, when the Count of Porhoet defeated Hoel VI, the defeated party invoked the aid of Henry of Anjou as Rolf's successor. Henry granted the duchy to his brother Geoffrey, whose death was succeeded by the triumph of the native prince, Conan IV. But Henry, since 1154 King of England, compelled Conan to abdicate and marry his daughter Constance to his (Henry's) son Geoffrey. Thus Henry II practically added Brittany to the Angevin dominions. Geoffrey died in 1186, and the rivalry of John and Philip Augustus for his territory ultimately led to his son Arthur's murder, the French triumph, and a new line of Breton princes that sprang from Geoffrey's daughter. In 1342 Edward III found another opportunity of intervention in favour of John of Montfort, the native claimant, against Charles of Blois, the friend of Philip VI. For many years the Breton succession war was an episode in the great hundred years' struggle of France and England. Left unsettled at the Treaty of Brétigny (q.v.), the question was at last decided, at the battle of Auray, in favour of the house of Montfort. In the early stages of England's second struggle for France, Brittany, though less energetically than Burgundy, sided with the English. But Arthur of Richmond, brother of the duke, and inheritor of the old honour of Alan, broke with the English, and became the great supporter of Charles VII. In 1488 the death of Francis II produced a European contest for the hand of his daughter Anne which, despite the exertions of Henry VII, resulted in her marriage with Charles VIII, and the ultimate annexation of Brittany to France. Thus the old ally of England became a province of her hereditary enemy.

Britton is the title of an early summary or abstract in French of English law purporting to have been written by command of Edward I. Nothing is known with certainty as to the authorship of the work. The theory that it was the work of John le Breton, Bishop of Hereford, is untenable, because there are allusions in the work to events which occurred after the death of that prelate in 1275. Selden and others have thought that the book was written by Henry de Bracton, and is an abridgment of his great work. [BRACTON.] Britton is a very useful guide to the English legal system of the thirteenth century.

Broad Bottom Administration, THE (1744-54), was a cant name given to the ministry formed by the Pelhams, after they had contrived to rid themselves of Carteret by threatening to resign, because its supposed policy was to admit to office the heads of opposition, both Whig and Tory, except Carteret and Bath. Chesterfield and Pitt were persuaded to relinquish their opposition (the former becoming lord-lieutenant of Ireland), the privy seal was given to the Tory Lord Gower, and Sir John Hinde Cotton, an undoubted Jacobite, was given a place about the court; while other posts were given to the Dukes of Devonshire and Bedford, Lords Cobham and Hobart, and Bubb Dodington. In 1746 the Pelhams, finding themselves in danger of being once more supplanted by Granville (Carteret), demanded the admission of Pitt to office, and on the king's refusal resigned; but on Granville's failure to form a ministry they returned to office.

Broad-Church Movement, THE, sprang from the strivings of some intellectually eminent members of the Church of England, during the middle of the nineteenth century, to establish a new harmony between Christianity and other aspects of human life, by the free expression of their own feelings, and without any party organization such as that of the evangelical Low-churchmen or that of the Tractarians and other High-churchmen. Their views found their most popular expression in the poems of Tennyson, who typified this movement much as Cowper had typified the evangelical revival. The pioneers of the movement fell into two groups. The rationalizing Aristotelian spirit of eighteenth-century latitudinarianism was influential at Oxford, especially among the "noetics" of Oriel; it showed itself in such scholars as Whateley, Hampden, Lyell, Senior, Arnold, Stanley, Milman, and Colenso; it assisted in the revival of academic learning, in the reform of boarding schools, and in the critical study of logic, economics, geology, history, and Hebrew literature; it inclined towards favouring the co-operation and reunion of Christian denominations as branches of a single church; and the bitter opposition it received from the Low-Church and High-Church parties was counterbalanced by considerable support from the state, from 1830. From Cambridge, on the other hand, and especially from the "apostles" of Trinity, came a small group of important writers imbued with the idealism of Plato and Berkeley: Coleridge, John Simon, Hare, Maurice, Kingsley, and Tennyson; in close sympathy with such tolerant High-churchmen as Hugh Rose, Samuel Wilberforce, and Trench, they inclined to regard all history as the movement of men towards perfection as members of a national and catholic church, with the result that, like the Pre-Raphaelites, they helped to rehabilitate the Middle Ages and the idea of human brotherhood, although they showed no lack of belligerent patriotism; and, having regard to the divine destiny of all mankind, they assisted greatly in the development of evening instruction, women's education, sanitation, and co-operation, from 1848, in their attempt "to christianize socialism."

Broken Men was the name applied by the Scottish government, in the fifteenth century and subsequently, to such persons in the Highlands as had no chief to be responsible for them. The government had so far recognized the tribal institutions that, by an act of council of the reign of James IV, the chiefs were held responsible for the execution of writs against their followers.

Bromley, SIR THOMAS (1530-87), was in 1566 made recorder of London, and in 1569 solicitor-general, in which capacity he took a leading part in the trial of the Duke of Norfolk, 1572; he was subsequently employed in the attempt to extort concessions from the Queen of Scots; and, on the death of Sir Nicholas Bacon, was made lord chancellor, 1579. In 1586 he took an active part in the prosecution of the conspirators in Babington's plot, and was president of the commission for the trial of Mary Stuart, whilst he shared with Burghley and Davison the responsibility of dispatching the warrant. He died shortly afterwards, having never got over the anxiety of the presidency.

Bronze Age, THE. [ARCHÆOLOGY.]

Brooke, HENRY, 8TH LORD COBHAM (d. 1619), son of William, 7th Lord Cobham (q.v.), is chiefly remembered in connexion with the Main Plot of 1603. He was made a knight of the Garter in 1599, and was one of the victims of Essex's plot in 1600. In 1603 Cobham was suspected of complicity in Watson's plot on behalf of the Catholics (the Bye Plot—q.v.), and of being in correspondence with Aremberg to place Arabella Stuart on the throne (the Main Plot). He was arrested in July, and sent to the Tower with Raleigh. After attempting to throw the sole guilt on Raleigh he was tried (November) and sentenced to death. But James I had him returned alive to the Tower, where he languished till 1617. He died on his way back to the Tower after a visit to Bath, 1619.

Brooke, SIR JAMES (1803-68), after serving with credit in the Bengal army, visited Borneo in his yacht in 1838, and assisted the sultan against the revolted Dyak tribe. In return he received a grant of the district of Sarawak from the Sultan of Borneo with the title of Raja. He did much to ameliorate the condition of the natives, to develop the resources of the island, and to suppress piracy, and earned on several occasions the thanks of the British government, to whom he more than once offered to surrender Sarawak. The island of Labuan having been acquired by the British, Brooke was appointed its governor, 1847; but in 1851 serious charges of cruelty towards the Dyaks were brought against him by Joseph Hume. A royal commission investigated the matter, but came to no definite conclusion. Sir James Brooke was, however, deprived of the governorship of Labuan. His later years were spent in England; but he frequently visited Sarawak.

"Parliamentary Debates" (3rd ser.), vol. 118, p. 439 seq. A collection of Sir J. Brooke's "Letters" was issued in 1853.

Brooke, WILLIAM, 7TH LORD COBHAM (d. 1597), was a favourite of Queen Elizabeth, under whom he held the office of lord warden of the Cinque Ports, and later those of constable of the Tower and lord chamberlain. He was employed on diplomatic missions in 1559, 1579 (with Walsingham), and 1588. Suspicion of his complicity in Northumberland's plot of 1571 earned him two years in the Tower (1571-3).

Brougham and Vaux, HENRY PETER, LORD (1778-1868), the eldest son of Henry Brougham, of Brougham Hall, Westmorland, educated at the High School and University of Edinburgh, was admitted to the Scottish bar in 1800. When the Edinburgh Review was established in 1802, Brougham became one of its most active contributors, and exhibited an extraordinary variety and extent of knowledge. In 1807 he resolved to qualify himself for the English bar, and in 1808 he began to practise in the Court of King's Bench, and on the northern circuit. In 1810 he was returned to parliament for the borough of Camelford. His powers of debate were soon recognized, and he became the rival of George Canning, and his most formidable opponent. In the election of 1811 Brougham was beaten at Liverpool by Canning, and was excluded from parliament till 1815, when he was returned for Winchester. In 1820 he undertook, with Denman, the defence of Queen Caroline. During the whole of the trial his popularity was as unbounded as the queen's. On February 11, 1822, he moved a resolution in the House of Commons for the consideration of the public burdens, particularly those pressing on the agricultural interest. This motion was, however, negatived. In the same year he moved a resolution condemnatory of the unconstitutional influence of the Crown in the government, which was also lost. In 1823 he delivered a powerful speech exposing the designs of the Holy Alliance. On April 23 of the same year he exchanged abuse of such an insulting nature with Canning, that the Speaker was compelled to order both into the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, and they only escaped this by retractations. In the same year he was engaged with Birkbeck in founding the first Mechanics' Institute. In 1825 he took a large share in the foundation of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, and also of the London University. In 1828 he delivered his famous six hours' speech on law reform. In 1830 he came forward prominently as the champion of parliamentary reform, and the House of Commons had no sooner met than he announced his intention to bring in a scheme (on November 16) embracing a comprehensive measure of reform. A ministerial crisis, however, supervened. The Duke of Wellington, having been defeated on a government measure, resigned on the 15th, and the formation of a new government under Earl Grey, including Brougham, who with some difficulty was induced to accept the chancellorship, placed in the hands of the ministry the great question of parliamentary reform. He was raised to the peerage on November 23. But though he was no longer a representative of the people, and personally relieved from the charge of the Reform Bill, his best powers were called forth in support of it; and his speech on October 7, 1831, when the bill was read a second time in the House of Lords, was a display of eloquence of the highest order. As lord chancellor, Brougham's success was not very great. He was unacquainted with the details of English equity, jurisprudence, and with the practice of his court, and his manners gave great offence to the distinguished advocates who practised before him. His extraordinary energy, however, atoned for many defects, and he had the distinction of getting through the arrears in his court with unexampled rapidity. In 1834 Brougham resigned with the Whig government. In 1835 they returned to power under Lord Melbourne, but Lord Brougham, who had never acted cordially with the leaders of his party, did not return with them, and Cottenham, greatly to Brougham's anger and chagrin, was made lord chancellor. Released from party ties he now acted independently, and even showed a disposition to court the Tories, and especially the Duke of Wellington. But for the remainder of his long life the part he played in politics was unimportant, though his restless vanity still kept him before the public eye. As a law reformer, and a member of the privy council, he continued to do useful work; and many of his judgments in House of Lords appeals are of great importance. Lord Brougham's powers of mind, his remarkable activity, his ardent love of liberty and justice, his versatility and his eloquence, made him one of the most conspicuous figures in English politics for many years; and had these great qualities not been neutralized by defects almost as striking—an unbounded recklessness, an extraordinary want of self-control, and an eccentricity which sometimes bordered on insanity—he could hardly have failed to rank among the most illustrious of English statesmen.

Lord Brougham's "Autobiography," 1871, which was written during the closing years of his life when his memory was failing, is often untrustworthy. The same must be said of Lord Campbell's "Life" of Brougham, 1844, the work of a not too generous rival. Lord Brougham wrote largely on a great variety of topics, but his writings are now little read. The best of his historical works are the "History of England Under the House of Lancaster," 1852, and "Sketches of the Statesmen of the Time of George III," 1839-43. His "Speeches" were collected in four volumes, 1838. See also A. Aspinall, "Lord Brougham and the Whig Party," 1927. [S. L.]

Broughton, JOHN CAM HOBHOUSE, LORD (1786-1869). [HOBHOUSE.]

Browne, ANTHONY, 1ST VISCOUNT MONTAGUE (1526-92), "a man of great wisdom, prudence, and loyalty," was the eldest son of Sir Anthony Browne, master of the horse to Henry VIII, and as a staunch Roman Catholic was high in favour with Mary, by whom he was created a peer (September 1554). He was lieutenant of the English forces at the siege of St. Quentin, and in 1561, in spite of his vigorous opposition to the Acts of Uniformity and Supremacy, was sent by Elizabeth on a mission to the court of Spain. His religion caused him to be suspected of sympathy with the northern rebels in 1569, but he nevertheless contrived to retain the favour of the queen. He was one of the commissioners at the trial of Mary Queen of Scots in 1587.

Brownists, THE, were a religious sect founded in the reign of Queen Elizabeth by Robert Browne, a clergyman of the Church of England, who began to preach his doctrines about 1580. They were ultra-Puritans, regarded the Church of England as impure, and, assuming the character of separatists, refused to hold any communication with her. They were strong opposers of Episcopacy, and, in consequence, suffered much persecution at the hands of the bishops. In 1593 a statute was passed enacting the penalty of imprisonment against any person above the age of sixteen who should forbear, for the space of a month, to repair to some church until he should make such open submission and declaration of conformity as the act appointed. In consequence of the rigorous enforcement of this act, a large proportion of the Brownists sought an asylum in Holland, whence subsequently, in 1620, many of them sailed from Amsterdam to found a new home in America. The members of the sect who remained in England endured considerable persecution, until the principle of toleration was recognized. During the Civil Wars of Charles I's reign they became merged in the sect of the Independents. The Brownists objected alike to Episcopacy and to the Presbyterian form of church government, and favoured a purely congregational system, without convocation or synod, and without any separate order of priests. Bruce, THE FAMILY OF (or DE BRUS), was of Norman descent. The founder of the English branch came over with William the Conqueror and obtained large grants of land in Yorkshire, where the family quickly assumed a powerful baronial position, being frequently involved in border warfare with the Scots. David I of Scotland made over to Robert de Bruce II the lands of Annandale about 1124, and thus the family obtained its recognition as a power in the south of Scotland. The Scots lordship passed to Robert's younger son, and remained with his descendants; while the English lands passed to his elder son and were eventually partitioned among co-heiresses in 1271. Isabella, second daughter of David, Earl of Huntingdon, the brother of Malcolm IV, married Robert de Brus, Lord of Annandale (d. 1245), and their son became a competitor for the crown of Scotland, 1291. Their grandson was the great Robert Bruce, King of Scotland, 1306-29.

Bruce, EDWARD (d. 1318), was the brother of King Robert Bruce. He commanded the right wing at Bannockburn, and dispersed the English archers. His restless spirit gave much trouble to his brother, who gladly let him go to Ireland, to assist the native rebels against England. On May 25, 1315, he landed from a fleet of 300 sail at Larne, on the coast of Antrim. With some 600 men he took Dundalk, and was joined by a large native force. At Connor in Antrim he defeated Richard de Burgh, the Red Earl of Ulster, and proceeded to besiege Carrickfergus. In Meath Roger Mortimer succumbed to him at Kells, and the flight of another English force before him at Ardsclull led to a rising in Munster and Leinster on Bruce's behalf. In May 1316, the O'Neill resigning his claims, Bruce was crowned King of Ireland. In the meantime, however, want of provisions compelled the Scots to retire into Ulster and leave the Wicklow septs to their fate. The de Burghs and Geraldines also agreed to a truce in face of a common foe; and in August Felim O'Connor and the men of Connaught were defeated by the English at Athenry (q.v.). The capture of Carrickfergus in September and the arrival of King Robert himself with reinforcements at the end of the year turned the tide once more in favour of the Scottish party. The Bruces, followed by 20,000 men, now marched straight on Dublin, and the de Lacys openly joined them. Dublin was not taken, but the country was wasted as far as Limerick; and so completely was this done that the Scots themselves suffered severely, on their retreat, from want, and it was only the supineness of the English which enabled them to regain their old position. In 1317 Robert Bruce's good sense induced him to give up the contest and leave Ireland; all his forces, however, remained with his brother. The Anglo-Irish, still fighting among themselves, were unable to gain any advantage. In 1318, however, Edward Bruce and the de Lacys, joining their forces, marched to Dundalk, but were met at Faughart on October 14 by the now united English, and were routed, Bruce himself being killed. His body was quartered, and the head sent to Edward II.

Bruce, JAMES, 8TH EARL OF ELGIN (1811-63), entered parliament as Conservative member for Southampton in 1841. In 1842 he resigned his seat in the Commons on being appointed governor of Jamaica. In 1846 he was sent to Canada and carried out the conciliatory policy of his father-in-law, Lord Durham (q.v.). He was raised to the peerage with the title of Baron Elgin. From Canada he went to China as special ambassador, and successfully negotiated the Peace of Tientsin after the capture of Canton and the rout of the Celestials. In 1859 he entered Palmerston's cabinet as postmaster-general. In consequence, however, of the refusal of the Chinese to receive his brother, Mr. Bruce, as envoy in accordance with the treaty, he was sent again to sustain British authority, and was once more completely successful (1860). He was shortly afterwards appointed to succeed Lord Canning as governor-general of India, where he died. His son and successor in the title, Victor Alexander, 9th Earl of Elgin, was governor-general of India, 1894-9, and secretary for the colonies, 1905-8.

Bruce, ROBERT, KING OF SCOTLAND.
[ROBERT I.]

Bruce, ROBERT DE (d. 1295), Lord of Annandale, was the son of Robert de Brus and Isabella, daughter of David of Huntingdon. He was one of the Scots commissioners who went to Salisbury to confer about the marriage of Prince Edward and the Maid of Norway. On the dispute for the succession to the Scots crown, after the death of the Maid of Norway (1290), Bruce put in a claim as the descendant, in the nearest degree, of David of Huntingdon. He also declared that in 1240 Alexander II had, in an assembly of the Estates, recognized him as his heir in the event of his dying childless (since that time, however, other male descendants had been born). The only competitor whom Bruce had need to fear was John Baliol, in whose favour Edward finally decided (November 1292). On the resignation of Baliol in 1295, Bruce tried ineffectually to persuade Edward to bestow the kingdom on him. He died shortly afterwards.

Bruce, THOMAS, 2ND EARL OF AILESBUURY, and 3rd Earl of Elgin in Scotland (d. 1741), was present at the death-bed of Charles II. He did not take the oath of allegiance to William III, but on the contrary played a prominent part in the Jacobite conspiracies against the king. He was present at a meeting of Jacobites at the Old King's Head tavern, London, in 1695. He was sent to the Tower for his complicity in the Assassination Plot (q.v.), and, in conjunction with Fenwick, attempted to bribe the witness Porter to leave the country. He always denied, however, that he had been privy to the criminal designs of the plotters. Macaulay remarks that "his denial would be the more creditable if he had not, by taking the oaths to the government against which he was so constantly intriguing, forfeited the right to be considered as a man of conscience and honour."

Brude, SON OF MARLIN, was a powerful Pictish monarch (556-83 or 84) who had his capital at Inverness. In 560 he defeated the Scots of Dalriada, slaying their king, Gabran, and driving them back to Kintyre. This defeat was important, as it led to the mission of St. Columba, by whom Brude was baptized in 565. [PICTS.]

Brunanburh, THE BATTLE OF (937), was fought by Athelstan against the combined forces of Anlaf Guthfrithson (q.v.), the Danish King of Dublin, Anlaf Cuaran his cousin, Constantine of Scotland, and Eugenius of Strathclyde. This powerful combination was thoroughly routed by Athelstan, and in commemoration of the great Saxon victory over the Danish and Celtic league a noble war-song was composed, which is preserved in the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle." The site of the battle has been much discussed, but it is probable that it was fought at Burnswark to the north of the Solway Firth.

Brutus (or BRUTE) was the name assigned to the fabulous hero who was supposed to have given his name to the island of Britain. According to the account given by Geoffrey of Monmouth, and universally believed in the Middle Ages, Brutus was the great-grandson of Æneas. Having been banished from Italy, he retired to Greece, where he became the champion of the oppressed Trojans. After many difficulties, he succeeded in reaching Albion, which at that time was inhabited by giants. Having destroyed these monsters, the Trojans occupied the country, which, in honour of their leader, they called Britain. Brutus died in the twenty-fourth year after his arrival in the island.

Brydges, JOHN, LORD CHANDOS OF SUDELEY (d. 1556), accompanied Henry VIII to France, 1513, when quite a boy. He greatly distinguished himself at the Battle of the Spurs [TEROUENNE], and in 1549 successfully defended Boulogne, of which he was deputy-governor, against the French. He subsequently became lieutenant of the Tower, and had the custody of Lady Jane Grey and the Princess Elizabeth.

Biography by J. R. Robinson, 1893.

Buccaneers (the name is derived from a word used by the Caribbean Indians denoting dried or cured meat) were associations of piratical adventurers which flourished in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The buccaneers were chiefly English and French, and owed their origin to the attempts made by other European nations, in the early part of the sixteenth century, to acquire a share in the rich American trade which the Spaniards attempted to engross. The buccaneers, though in later times they carried on general piracy, directed their chief efforts against the Spaniards, whom they regarded as their natural enemies. In 1625 they took St. Christopher, and in 1630 Tortuga, which they made their head-quarters. In 1670, under Henry Morgan, they captured Panama with immense booty; and in 1683 and 1684 made the expeditions to the South Seas which are described in Dampier's famous "Voyages." In 1670 a treaty, called "The Treaty of America," was concluded between England and Spain for the suppression of the buccaneer associations, but it was quite ineffectual. The wars between England and France, by making the English and French buccaneers enemies, did much to weaken them, and after the Treaty of Ryswick they gradually disappeared. The most noted buccaneer chiefs were Lewis Scot, François Lolanois, Mansvelt, and especially Henry Morgan (q.v.), who was knighted by Charles II and made deputy-governor of Jamaica.

Buch, JEAN DE GRAILLY, CAPTAL DE (d. 1377), was one of the most famous of the English commanders in the French wars of Edward III's reign. He was a native of Aquitaine, and attached himself to the Black Prince, with whom he fought at Poitiers and Navarrete. In 1372 he was taken prisoner by the French, and died in captivity five years later.

Buchan, EARLS OF. [COMYN; STEWART.]

Buchanan, GEORGE (1506-82), studied at Paris and at St. Andrews, and became tutor to the Earl of Cassilis in 1529, and subsequently to a natural son of James V. He bitterly assailed the friars in his "Franciscanus," which subjected him to much persecution from Cardinal Beaton. He found it unsafe to reside in Scotland, and retired to Bordeaux. In 1544 he went to Paris and taught at the college of Cardinal le Moine. Three years later he went to Coimbra in Portugal. Here he was seized as a heretic, and imprisoned in a monastery, where he began his version of the Psalms. On his release he remained for some years in France, but later returned to Scotland as Latin tutor to Queen Mary. He now openly professed himself a Protestant. In 1567 he was made moderator of the general assembly. He took a considerable share in political affairs, being among the most violent opponents of the Queen of Scots after the murder of Darnley. He was present at the Commission of Inquiry at York in 1568 as secretary, and has been charged, though with little justification, with the forgery of the "Casket Letters" (q.v.). In 1571 he printed his tract "Detectio Mariae Reginae," a very bitter attack on Mary. Meanwhile, in 1570 he had become tutor to the young prince James. Soon afterwards he was made director of the chancery and keeper of the privy seal, and sat in parliament for some years. He was a voluminous writer of Latin verse, and is among the first, if not the very first, of non-classical poets. He was the author of two important prose works. The famous treatise, "De Jure Regni apud Scotos," published in 1579, is a political dialogue on the source and origin of kingly power. It is filled with the principles of liberal and constitutional monarchy, and its author has been not inaptly styled "the first Whig." The "Rerum Scoticarum Historia," published in 1582, is still of value as a record of Scots affairs in the sixteenth century.

Buckingham was an ancient borough at the time of the Domesday survey. It had been fortified by Edward the Elder in the early part of the tenth century, and captured by the Danes in 1016. In the pre-Conquest period it possessed its own mint. It was a place of considerable trade in the Middle Ages, and Edward III fixed one of the wool staples there. It received a charter from Mary in 1554, which was surrendered and restored in 1684. The borough formerly returned two members to parliament; but it was deprived of one of its representatives in 1868, and of the second in 1885.

Buckingham, DUKES OF. [STAFFORD; VILLIERS.]

Buckingham, PEERAGE OF. (i) Walter Giffard, lord of Longueville in Normandy, is said to have received the earldom of Buckingham from William II. His son died without issue, 1164. (ii) Thomas of Woodstock, youngest son of Edward I., was created Earl of Buckingham, 1377. He was attainted in 1397; and his son Humphrey, who, though styled Earl of Buckingham, never succeeded to his father's honours, died without issue in 1399. (iii) Humphrey, Earl of Stafford, who seems to have been considered as Earl of Buckingham in right of his mother, Anne, sister of the last earl, was created Duke of Buckingham, 1444. His great-grandson, the 3rd duke, was beheaded, 1521, and his honours forfeited. (iv) George Villiers, the favourite of James I, was created Earl of Buckingham in 1616, marquis in 1618 (his mother, being later in the year created Countess of Buckingham for life, died 1632), and duke in 1623. George Villiers, 2nd duke of this line, died without issue, 1687. (v) John Sheffield, Marquis of Normanby, was created Duke of Buckinghamshire, 1703. His son Edmund, 2nd duke, died without issue, 1735, and the honours became extinct. (vi) In 1746 John Hobart, Baron Hobart of Hickling, Norfolk, was created Earl of Buckinghamshire; and the title remains at the present day with his descendants. (vii) George Grenville, Earl Temple (son of George Grenville, premier 1763-5, and brother of Lord Grenville, premier 1806-7), was created Marquis of the town of Buckingham, county Bucks, 1784. His son was created duke in 1822, under the title of Duke of Buckingham and Chandos. [STAFFORD, SHEFFIELD, VILLIERS.]

Budget, THE, a term first used in England about 1760, denotes the financial statement presented to parliament by the chancellor of the exchequer at the beginning of each financial year, consisting of two statements, (1) as to the surplus or deficit for the past year, (2) an estimate of revenue and expenditure for the coming year, with proposals for an increase or reduction of taxation according to the balance of the estimates. The estimates themselves are divided into two parts—consolidated fund services and supply services—the former an annual charge fixed by statute, the latter debatable. The supply services are debated in the House of Commons sitting as a committee of supply, and are voted by the committee of ways and means (q.v.). The resolutions of both committees are then reported to the House of Commons, and embodied in the Finance Act for the year.

Buenos Ayres, EXPEDITIONS AGAINST (1806-7). In the spring of 1806 Sir Home Popham, who was in command of the naval forces at the Cape of Good Hope, without any authority from the home government sailed from the Cape, taking with him all the naval force, and 1,500 troops. The armament arrived off Buenos Ayres on June 24. No time was wasted, and on the 28th the land forces surprised and captured Buenos Ayres, while a feint was made by the fleet against Monte Video. But the inhabitants secretly organized an insurrection which broke out on August 4, and was assisted from without by the militia of the surrounding districts. The British garrison, after a stout resistance, was overpowered; and the survivors were made prisoners of war, though Sir Home Popham escaped with the squadron, and anchored for a while at the mouth of the river. A fresh force of 5,000 troops was dispatched, under Sir Samuel Auchmuty (q.v.), who, on February 3, 1807, assaulted Monte Video, and carried it by storm after a most stubborn conflict, in which the British loss was 600. In June Auchmuty was joined by General Craufurd with reinforcements, which brought up the total of the British forces to 9,000 men; and General Whitelocke was sent out to take command of the whole force. On July 5 an attack was made, without due preparation or design, on Buenos Ayres. The town had no regular fortifications, and the inhabitants trusted solely to their advantageous position on the roofs and towers. From these points of vantage the attacking troops were met by a destructive fire. On the right, Auchmuty seized the Plaza de Toros, with its large stores of all sorts; but this advantage was more than counterbalanced by the defeat of the British at all other quarters. Next morning the Spanish general offered to restore all British prisoners on condition of the evacuation of Monte Video and all the rest of the region of the La Plata; and Whitelocke agreed. On returning to England he was tried by court-martial, and dismissed the service.

Buller, SIR REDVERS HENRY (1839-1908), British general, entered the army in 1858 and served in China (1860), the Red River Expedition (1870), the Ashanti campaign (1873-4), the Kafir War of 1878-9, the Zulu War (1879), the Boer War of 1881, the Egyptian campaign of 1882, and the Sudan campaign of 1884-5. He was under-secretary for Ireland in 1886, and adjutant-general in 1890; he was promoted lieutenant-general in 1891, and general in 1896. In the Boer War of 1899 he commanded the South African Field Force, and relieved Lady-smith on February 27, 1900, after three unsuccessful attempts. After the war he retired into private life in England.

Biography by L. Butler, 1909.

Bulls, PAPAL, are the letters issued by the popes in their official capacity, addressed to individuals or communities, usually on matters of doctrine. Papal letters may be either BRIEFS or BULLS. The latter are considered the more authoritative and important. They are invariably written in Latin on thick parchment, in angular archaic characters, and sealed with the bullæ or globular seal of lead attached to the document by threads of silk or hemp. The name "bull" does not appear as applied to the document before the thirteenth century. The brief, which first came into general use during the pontificate of Eugenius IV, is written in cursive characters, on paper or thin vellum, and sealed in wax with the seal of the Fisherman (sub annulo Piscatoris). It generally refers to matters of discipline. By an ordinance of the Conqueror, ecclesiastics in England were forbidden to receive letters from the pope, unless they had previously obtained the royal permission. Royal letters, forbidding the introduction of papal bulls without licence, were issued by Edward II in 1307, and by Edward III in 1327 and 1376. To procure or publish them was declared high treason by 13 Eliz. c. 2. [For the various bulls of importance, see under their titles, e.g., CLERICIS LAICOS; and for the whole subject see PAPACY.]

Bulwer, EDWARD GEORGE EARLE LYTTON, 1ST BARON LYTTON (1803-73), first entered parliament as member for St. Ives in 1831. He attached himself to the Whigs, was returned for Lincoln in 1832 and represented that borough till 1841. His famous pamphlet on "The Crisis" appeared in 1834. In 1843 he changed his name to Bulwer-Lytton. In 1852 he re-entered the House of Commons as a Conservative, and on the accession of Lord Derby to power (1858) he became secretary of state for the colonies. During his short period of office, lasting only a year, he called into existence two new colonies, those of British Columbia and Queensland. In 1866 he was raised to the peerage. He was one of the most versatile and accomplished writers of his time, and was the author of a large number of poems, dramas, and miscellaneous works.

Bulwer, WILLIAM HENRY LYTTON EARLE, BARON DALLING AND BULWER (1801-72), was sent as minister to Madrid in 1843, where he remained until, in 1848, he was ordered to leave the kingdom upon presenting to the queen-mother Lord Palmerston's recommendations to adopt a more liberal policy. From 1849 to 1852 he was minister at Washington, where he negotiated the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty (q.v.), and from 1852 to 1855 at Florence. From 1856 till 1865 he was ambassador at Constantinople. In 1871 he was created Baron Dalling and Bulwer.

Bundelkhand. The name of the district between Oudh, Malwa, Berar, and Bengal. It was conquered by Rajput tribes in the fourteenth century, and, though exposed to frequent attacks from the Mohammedans, it always managed to resist them successfully. In the middle of the eighteenth century, however, large portions passed into the possession of the Peshwa, and towards the end of the century the whole province was in Mahratta hands. The Treaty of Bassein (q.v.) ceded a portion of the territory to Great Britain, and soon afterwards the Raja Bahadur was induced to part with his large territories in Bundelkhand, receiving compensation elsewhere. On the extinction of the Peshwa's independence in 1818, all his sovereign rights in Bundelkhand were finally ceded to the British.

Bunker Hill, THE BATTLE OF (June 17, 1775), is noticeable as the first important battle of the War of American Independence. Boston is separated by a narrow channel or arm of the sea from the suburb of Charlestown. On June 12 General Gage had declared martial law, and was in possession of Charlestown and Boston. To secure his position in the former, it was necessary for him to occupy two hills which commanded it—Breed Hill and Bunker Hill. The latter was farther from Charlestown, but was the higher of the two, and dominated Breed Hill and Charlestown. On the night of the 16th a body of American militia were sent to seize it. When on the next morning they were desecured on the top of Breed Hill, which they had occupied by mistake, Gage determined to attack them. Three thousand regulars, under Howe and Pigot, assaulted the position in front, unsupported by any movement from the rear. Twice they were driven back, but in the third attempt they were joined by Clinton, and succeeded in dislodging the defenders, who, however, made good their retreat to Prospect Hill, where they encamped. The loss of the assailants in so fierce an assault was 226 killed and 828 wounded and missing. In the course of the assault, Charlestown had been set on fire by the British troops under Howe, and the exasperation caused by this act far more than counterbalanced any gain resulting to them from the battle, especially as they remained idly watching Washington, who was in the greatest difficulties, and quite unable to offer any serious resistance to vigorous measures.

Burdett, SIR FRANCIS (1770-1844), the son of Sir Robert Burdett, entered parliament in 1796 as member for Boroughbridge. In 1797 he brought forward a motion for parliamentary reform, and in the following year vigorously protested against the attempts of the government to gag the press. Two years later he devoted all his energies to prevent the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and to secure better provision being made for political prisoners. In 1802 he was elected for Middlesex, and was re-elected at the head of the poll on the former election being declared void (1805). At the election of 1806 he issued a celebrated address to the Middlesex electors, and on being re-elected gave a warm support to the administration of Fox and Lord Grenville. On the resignation of that government he stood for Westminster, and was easily elected. In 1810 he was convicted by the House of Commons of having committed a breach of privilege in a certain letter addressed to his constituents. Burdett refused to surrender to the Speaker's warrant, and the people defended his house. The result was a series of riots, in which the people were fired upon, and some of them killed. Burdett was arrested by force. He proceeded to bring actions against the Speaker, and nearly everyone who had a hand in his commitment to the Tower, but was unsuccessful. His imprisonment terminated with the prorogation of parliament, and he resumed his place at the beginning of the session of 1811, when he chiefly occupied himself in opposing the Regency Bill. In 1820, after in vain attempting to induce the House to consider the conduct of the Manchester magistrates at Peterloo, he vented his feelings in a letter to his constituents, for which he was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, with a fine of £2,000. In 1822 he supported Lord John Russell's proposed Reform Bill, and continued one of its warmest advocates till it was carried. After this Sir Francis gradually fell away from the Liberals. He denounced the alliance, which took place shortly afterwards, between the ministry and O'Connell, retired from Brooks's Club, and openly joined the Tories. In 1837 he was returned as Conservative member for North Wilts. Till his death in 1844 he continued to represent that constituency.

Burgess. In the mediæval English borough the burgess was an inhabitant who owned a burgage tenement within the town. Burgage tenure—a variety of free socage—"implied a fixed rent in lieu of all services, and the right to devise one's lands and tenements." The burgess had certain liabilities and duties. With his fellow-burgesses he was expected to elect the town's officers, perform public services himself, keep watch and ward, bear arms in defence of the town, and serve on juries. He also contributed to burghal taxation. Often he was a gildsman as well, that is, a member of the gild merchant, when he must be able to pay scot and lot (q.v.); but the two qualifications were not synonymous, and it has been suggested that the burgess had his origin as a land-owner and agriculturist, while the gildsman, a later arrival, had only to be a trader and fulfil certain non-tenorial conditions, though he need not live in the borough, and had, as gildsman, no part in the civil or military government of the borough. However this may be, in the fourteenth century the tenorial character of burgess-ship was disappearing. It became more mercantile in character. "Payments of scot and lot became the pre-eminent obligation of burgess-ship; and the right to trade or exercise a craft became its pre-eminent privilege. Thus the freemen—who in many cases were identical with the burgesses—were the successors of the brethren of the ancient Gild Merchant" (Gross). Burgesses were also the electors of the municipal magistrates in cases where the corporations had not become close, and were in most cases the holders of the parliamentary franchise. (Sometimes only the members of the governing council were called burgesses.) The privileges of the burgesses were in former times very considerable—e.g., participation in the income of the corporation, exclusive right of trading within the borough, and the like. These privileges have, however, been swept away by the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, and the burgesses are now simply the constituency which elects the borough council. The term burgess, too, is often applied to the representatives of a borough in parliament. By a law of Edward II, the burgesses returned for any town were entitled to two shillings a day for expenses, and the practice of paying members of parliament was occasionally resorted to up to the reign of Charles II. By an act of Henry V it was decreed that a burgess of parliament must be resident in the borough which returned him; but this, however, was not enforced for long. [BOROUGH; ELECTIONS.]

Burgh, HUBERT DE (d. 1243), first appears in history as one of Richard I's ministers. John (after his accession) made him his chamberlain. On the capture of Prince Arthur, in 1202, he was, according to Ralph of Coggeshall, entrusted with the charge of the imprisoned prince at Rouen, and continued a faithful and active servant of John during the remainder of that king's reign. In 1215 he was appointed justiciar, and in the next year bravely defended Dover Castle against the French, who were compelled to raise the siege, and were shortly afterwards defeated by de Burgh in a naval engagement in the Channel. On the death of William Marshall he became regent of the kingdom, the custody of the king's person being entrusted to Peter des Roches. Between these two there was constant rivalry, de Burgh representing the English, des Roches the foreign interest. In 1224 the reckless turbulence of Falkes de Breaute (q.v.) gave de Burgh an opportunity of getting rid of the foreigners. De Breaute was banished, and, on the king attaining his majority in 1227, de Burgh attained supreme power by the exile of his great rival, des Roches. In this year also he was raised to the earldom of Kent; and, in 1228, he was appointed justiciar for life. From this date till 1232 England was entirely in his hands, and was, on the whole, well governed. In 1232 the intrigues of des Roches, who had been permitted to return, and the king's weariness of restraint, occasioned his fall. He was accused of connivance with Twege in his attacks on the Italian clergy, and the emptiness of the treasury was attributed to the mismanagement of the minister. He was driven from office, and for the next two years suffered the cruellest persecution at the hands of the monarch for whom he had done so much. The disgrace of des Roches in 1234 restored him to favour, but he did not resume his office, and the remainder of his life was spent in retirement, broken only by occasional appearances in the political arena, as in 1238, when he supported the king against the powerful baronial confederacy headed by Richard of Cornwall. Hubert's policy was a thoroughly national one. He resisted the encroachments of the pope and the rapacity of the foreigners, as well as the arbitrariness of the king and the turbulence of the barons. His aim was, however, limited to a restoration of the administrative system and policy of Henry II. It is said that an Essex blacksmith, when ordered to put chains on Hubert, replied, "Do what you will with me: rather would I die than put fetters on him. Is not he that faithful and magnanimous Hubert, who hath so often snatched England from the ravages of foreigners and restored England to England?"

Burgh, WALTER HUSSEY (1742–83), was a celebrated Irish barrister and politician. He made a most successful practice at the bar, and was appointed prime serjeant in 1777. As a member of the Irish parliament belonging to the national party of Flood and Grattan, he approved of the volunteers, and for a brilliant speech on a free trade motion of Grattan's, in which he described the condition of Ireland as one of "smothered war," he thought it necessary to resign office (1779). Towards the end of his life he cooled towards the volunteer movement, fearing that it would embroil Great Britain and Ireland, but supported the cause of Irish independence at the risk of all chances of preferment. Just before his death he was appointed chief baron of the exchequer. Hussey Burgh is described as the best everyday speaker of the Irish parliament, though his manner was that of a lawyer. He was a vain and ostentatious man, and died heavily in debt, but his liabilities were paid by a parliamentary grant proposed by Grattan on account of his integrity and patriotism.

Burghhead (anc. TORFNESS), THE BATTLE OF (1040), was fought between Thorfinn, Earl of Orkney and Caithness, and King Duncan (q.v.), who was attempting to seize the territories of the Earls of Orkney on the mainland. It resulted in a victory for Thorfinn.

Burghersh, HENRY DE (1292–1340), was a nephew of Lord Badlesmere, through whose influence he was made Bishop of Lincoln in 1320. He was suspected of complicity with his uncle and the rebel lords in 1322, and his temporalities were seized by the king, but, apparently, were restored two years later. He sided with the queen and Mortimer against Edward II, and for his support he was made treasurer, and, in 1328, chancellor, which office he held till the fall of Mortimer. He was frequently employed by Edward III, and died at Ghent, whither he had gone on diplomatic business.

Burghley, WILLIAM CECIL, LORD (1520–98). [CECIL.]

Burgoyne, JOHN, LIEUT.-GEN. (1722–92), a reputed natural son of Lord Bingley, in 1762 acted as brigadier-general under Lord Buckeburg in Portugal, where he greatly distinguished himself by a most daring and successful raid upon a strong body of troops which was guarding the magazines at Valentia d'Alcantara. In 1774 he was appointed to a command in America. The next year he was summoned home to advise the king on colonial questions, but returned to his command in 1777, when he at once issued an invitation to the natives to join the British flag. He then organized an expedition in order to join Clinton, who was advancing from the south. Before they could meet, however, Burgoyne had encountered such difficulties that he was compelled to surrender to Gates on October 17 at Saratoga. He was allowed to come home on parole, and no sooner had he arrived than the opposition made overtures to him to lay the blame of the disaster on the government. He thus became odious to the ministry, whom he charged with mismanagement in not supplying him with proper resources; and the king meanwhile refused to see him, or to allow him a court-martial, which he demanded. This the ministry also strenuously opposed, knowing that the corruption of the war department would come out if any inquiry were held. In 1779 Burgoyne refused to go back to America, on the ground that his honour did not compel him to do so; and the ministry seized the opportunity to dismiss him from his command. On the formation of Rockingham's ministry in 1782 he was reinstated, and appointed commander-in-chief in Ireland. Burgoyne's previous services lead us to infer that the disaster of Saratoga was not entirely due to himself; and this idea is confirmed by the steady refusal of the government to allow any inquiry into it. In the absence of that inquiry, it is difficult to form a just estimate of Burgoyne's merits.

E. B. de Fonblanque, "Life of Burgoyne," 1875.

Burgoyne, SIR JOHN FOX (1782-1871), the natural son of General Burgoyne, was educated at Eton and Woolwich, and, in 1798, received a commission in the Royal Engineers. In 1800 he sailed for the Mediterranean with Sir Ralph Abercromby, and saw active service throughout the French wars in Sicily, Egypt, Sweden, Portugal, and Spain. He was with Sir John Moore at Corunna; and in most of the great battles and sieges of the Peninsular War he was first or second in command of the Engineers. In 1813 he was sent to New Orleans as commanding Engineer under Sir Edward Pakenham, and, in consequence, was not present at Waterloo, though he returned in time to form one of the army of occupation at Paris in the middle of July 1815. During the long peace he held some important civil appointments. When the Crimean War was on the verge of breaking out he was sent to Constantinople to report on the measures necessary for the defence of the Ottoman empire (1853), and on his return was appointed lieutenant-general on the staff of the army of the East. It was Burgoyne who was most strenuous in dissuading Lord Raglan from attacking Sebastopol on the north. He supported with equal warmth the flank march and attack on the south side. From the first he pointed out the Malakoff as the key of the entire position; and conducted the siege operations before Sebastopol up to the middle or end of March 1855, when he was recalled to England, leaving Sir Harry Jones to complete the work. Soon afterwards he was created a baronet, and subsequently received a field-marshal's baton, and the appointment of constable of the Tower.

Burgundy, RELATIONS WITH. Of the ten Burgundies that history knows, England had important dealings only with the French fief, the duchy of Burgundy, under its last line of Valois dukes. The imperial free county of Burgundy (Franche Comté) also belonged to them. They began with Philip the Bold (le Hardi), whose valour at Poitiers was rewarded by his father John with the grant of the vacant duchy on his taking the hand of its heiress (1363). The acquisition of Flanders, so closely bound to England by economical and political ties, hostility to Louis of Orleans, whose championship of Richard II and absolutism involved his hostility to the Lancastrian monarchs, first brought the house into intimate relations with England. The Burgundians and Armagnacs fought for supremacy under the mad Charles VI, and their feuds gave ample opportunity to English intervention. Both united to withstand Henry V, and met a common defeat at Agincourt (1415). But the murder of John the Fearless (1407-19) on the bridge of Montereau, at the instance of the dauphin and the Armagnacs, led to Burgundy throwing its whole weight on the English side. Paris, the centre of Burgundian influence, welcomed the entry of Henry V and the new duke, Philip the Good (1419-67). Up to 1435 this close alliance enabled the English to retain their hold of North France. But the nationalist revival stirred even Philip, the death of the Duke of Bedford broke his close family tie to the English house, and the mad attempt of Humphrey of Gloucester on Holland and Hainault completed the alienation which led to the Peace of Arras (1435) between Burgundy and France, and even an attack on Calais from our old ally. In the Wars of the Roses, Philip and his son Charles generally sympathized with the Lancastrians. Charles the Bold (1467-77) regarded his descent from John of Gaunt through his Spanish mother as making him a member of the Lancastrian house; and he showed the greatest sympathy with the exiles whom Edward IV's accession had driven to the Netherlands. But he could not afford to quarrel with Edward, and as Louis XI definitely supported Warwick, and reconciled him with Margaret of Anjou, Charles very unwillingly joined the Yorkist cause, and married Edward's sister Margaret. When in 1469 Edward was driven from England by Margaret and Warwick, he found refuge in the Netherlands, but a personal interview only produced personal hostility between him and Charles. Despite Charles's inadequate support, Edward won back his crown; and fear of France caused the renewal of the political alliance. In 1474 a common expedition against France was determined upon, but Charles lingered at Neuss, and came at last without an army; so Edward, in the Treaty of Pecquigny (q.v.), 1475, abandoned Burgundy for France. The marriage of Mary, Charles's daughter, with Maximilian I brought Flanders and England into new relations that passed on to the Austro-Spanish Alliance. But the conquest of Burgundy by Louis on Charles's death (1477) put an end to the independent existence of the house of Burgundy. [T. F. T.]

Burke, EDMUND (1729-97), born in Dublin, was educated at Trinity College, and came to London to study at the Middle Temple in 1750. The study of law was not congenial to him; and he soon deserted it for literature. His first attempts in this field were made in 1756, and consisted in "A Vindication of Natural Society" which was intended as a satire on Bolingbroke's theory of the origin of society, and "A Philosophical Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas on the Sublime and Beautiful," which was warmly praised by such judges as Lessing and Kant. In 1759 the first volume of the "Annual Register" was published, containing a survey by Burke of the chief events of the year. In 1761 he accompanied "Single-speech" Hamilton, who was private secretary to Lord Halifax, to Ireland. The connexion lasted four years, at the end of which time Burke threw up a pension which Hamilton had procured for him, and returned to England. In the same year Rockingham came into office and appointed Burke his secretary. In December 1765, through the influence of Lord Verney, Burke was returned to parliament for Wendenham, and lost no time in making himself known to the House by a speech on the American colonies, which won for him a compliment from Pitt. In 1769 he wrote his remarkable pamphlet, "Observations on . . . the Present State of the Nation." Burke was always on the side of constitutional order and liberty on such questions as the right of a constituency to choose its own representative, the freedom of the press, the legality of general warrants issued by parliament, and the relations of a colony to the mother country. In 1770 he published "Thoughts on the Present Discontents," which, though unsuccessful as a pamphlet, placed its author in the front rank of political philosophers. In 1772 he was offered the direction of a commission which was to examine the details of every department in India; but loyalty to his party made him decline the offer. In April 1774 he made one of the most celebrated of all his great speeches—that on American taxation. In November 1774 he was elected for Bristol, and represented that city for six years. In March 1775 he moved his resolutions in favour of conciliation with America; he urged the government to recognize the old constitutional maxim that taxation without representation is illegal, to return to the old custom of accepting what grants the general assemblies of the colonies should freely contribute, and above all things not to enter upon civil war. Two years later Burke addressed a letter to the sheriffs of Bristol, in which, in the clearest and most independent way, he explained to his constituents the principles which had guided him in his policy towards the colonies. In February 1780 he brought in his resolutions for the amendment of the administration. His first project was directed against the corruption of parliament and the sources of that corruption, and was contained in a plan for the better security of the independence of parliament, and the economical reformation of the civil and other establishments. In the same year Burke retired from the representation of Bristol, finding that his independence was distasteful to the electors. Lord Rockingham's influence, however, obtained for him the seat of Malton in Yorkshire; and on that nobleman succeeding Lord North in 1782, he accepted the paymastership of the forces. On the death of Lord Rockingham in July the ministry became divided against itself; Lord Shelburne succeeded to the premiership; and Burke, Fox, and Sheridan resigned. The combination against him proved too strong for Shelburne, and in April 1783 he made way for a coalition ministry under the nominal lead of the Duke of Portland. Burke returned to the pay office, and immediately committed a grave indiscretion in restoring two clerks who had been suspending for malversation. The most important act of this administration was the introduction of Fox's India Bill, which seems to have been devised and drawn by Burke. Burke and Fox advocated the measure with all their energy and power; but the king saw his opportunity of getting rid of a ministry which he disliked, and successfully used his influence to have the bill thrown out by the peers. This success he followed up by dismissing the ministry and sending for Pitt, who, in January 1784, became prime minister. The India Bill which Pitt introduced was a compromise, of much narrower scope than Fox's bill, and seems to have escaped any violent attack from Burke. He, however, vigorously attacked Pitt's Irish policy, as well as the commercial treaty with France. A more glorious field for the exercise of his powers was now opened for Burke in the prosecution of Warren Hastings (q.v.). In April 1786 Burke, in answer to a challenge from Hastings's friends, laid before parliament his charges. The first charge was thrown out; the second and third were supported by Pitt and carried by so large a majority that in May 1787 Burke brought forward a resolution to impeach Hastings. The management of the prosecution was entrusted by the Commons to Burke, Fox, Sheridan, Windham, and Grey. The trial began in February 1788, and was opened by Burke in a speech peculiarly impassioned and persuasive. Seven years went by before the Lords brought in their verdict of acquittal. In the same year which saw the impeachment of Warren Hastings, politics were thrown into confusion by the illness of the king. Pitt's Regency Bill was vehemently attacked by the opposition, and by no member of it more bitterly than by Burke. The king's unexpected recovery, however, rendered all the preparations of the opposition unnecessary, and gave Pitt a further lease of office. In the following year the outbreak of the French Revolution was the beginning of the last act in Burke's career. For the remainder of his life his thoughts continued to be centred on France. His passionate love of order and reverence for the past prevented him from ever sharing in the generous enthusiasm which the earlier efforts of the French people awakened in Fox, Wordsworth, and Coleridge. He distrusted the Parisians, and foresaw too surely that the popular outbreak would end in something very different from liberty. It was not, however, till February 1790 that Burke, in the House of Commons, openly avowed his horror of the principles that were being worked out in Paris. His avowal was couched in such terms that it occasioned a breach of his long-standing friendship with Fox. In the next month the breach had so far widened that Burke deserted Fox on a motion for the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts which he himself had suggested. At length, in November, appeared the "Reflections on the French Revolution." Its success was astonishing, and it did much to alienate the majority of Englishmen from all sympathy with the Revolution. In the course of the next year Burke finally renounced his connexion with Fox. In August he published his "Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs." He continued in parliament to storm against the murderous atheists in France, and their advocates on this side of the Channel. In 1794 he lost his brother and his only son, and he never recovered from the blow. In the same year he retired from parliament, but he still watched France with unmitigated apprehension. He found time, nevertheless, to give to the world his sound views on the corn trade in his "Thoughts and Details on Scarcity." In 1796 he wrote his "Letter to a Noble Lord"—a scathing answer to some objections raised by the Duke of Bedford to the pension which Pitt had generously bestowed. In the same year appeared the first two "Letters on a Regicide Peace," brilliant specimens of Burke's most gorgeous rhetoric, in which he protested against any peace with the national government of France. His work, however, was ended, and he died at Beaconsfield on July 9, 1797. It is impossible within our limits to give any adequate estimate of Burke's character and genius. We may perhaps be permitted to quote the words of a competent critic (Viscount Morley): "There have been more important statesmen, for he was never tried by a position of supreme responsibility. There have been many more effective orators, for lack of imaginative suppleness prevented him from penetrating to the inner mind of his hearers. . . . There have been many subtler, more original, and more systematic thinkers about the conditions of the social union. But no one that ever lived used the general ideas of the thinker more successfully to judge the particular problems of the statesman. No one has ever come so close to the details of practical politics, and at the same time remembered that these can only be understood and only dealt with by the aid of the broad conceptions of political philosophy."

Burke, THE FAMILY OF, was founded in Ireland by William de Burgo, "the Conqueror," brother of the great justiciar, Hubert de Burgh. It seems probable that he crossed to Ireland with John in 1185 and received a grant of land in Munster, which was afterwards augmented by the speculative grant of the whole or part of Connaught. This grant was confirmed in 1215 to his son Richard, who, after a violent struggle with the O'Connors, succeeded in establishing himself there. His son Walter was in 1264 granted the vacant earldom of Ulster by Henry III.; Richard de Burgh, known as the Red Earl, succeeded his father in 1280 as lord of Ulster and Connaught, and, taking advantage of the weakness of the Fitzgeralds, raised the de Burghs to the position of the most powerful family in Ireland. The Ulster earldom expired with his grandson William, murdered in 1333 by the English of Ulster. His daughter Elizabeth afterwards married Lionel, Duke of Clarence, son of Edward III, whereby the earldom of Ulster became eventually attached to the royal family in the person of Edward IV. The de Burghs of Connaught, scorning to hold their lands of a woman, and fearing that their possessions might pass by marriage into other hands, declared themselves independent of English law, and renounced English customs. They divided Connaught between them, William, ancestor of the Clanrickards, taking Galway with the title of MacWilliam Uachtar (the Upper), and Edmund, ancestor of the Mayos, taking Mayo with the title of MacWilliam Iochtar (the Lower). The 1st Earl of Clanrickard, created in 1543, was Ulick de Burgh or Burke, "the Beheader," so called from his victories over the Geraldines. In 1576 the Burkes, fearing that Connaught was to be colonized as Ulster had been, broke out into open rebellion. Thereupon their territories were utterly laid waste, and the race was nearly extinguished. In 1635 Wentworth's commission of inquiry into defective titles declared the lands of the Burkes to have lapsed to the Crown. Ulick, however, the 5th earl, and 2nd Earl of St. Albans, was created Marquis of Clanrickard in the peerage of Ireland for his services in subduing the rebellion of 1641, and he is the direct ancestor of the present marquis.

Burke (DE BURGH), ULICK, 5TH EARL AND MARQUIS OF CLANRICKARD (1604-57), was so created in 1645. Though a Roman Catholic, he continued faithful to the king all through the rebellion of 1641. His sympathies were largely with the insurgents, but he refused the supreme command they offered him. At court, in 1647, he was able to combine his loyalty with his attachment to the ancient faith, and began to take a prominent part in affairs. When, in 1650, Ormonde left the country, he was made lord deputy, and in 1650 induced the Irish to reject the terms offered them by parliament. He continued to hold out for some time longer, but was finally compelled to surrender to Coote on the usual terms of personal freedom and the restoration of part of his estates. He was succeeded by his cousin as Earl of Clanrickard, the marquisate dying with him as he had no issue. At the Restoration all his estates were at once restored to his heirs. His "Memoirs Concerning the Affairs of Ireland from 1650 to 1653" were published in 1722.

Burmese Wars. (1) FIRST BURMESE WAR (1824-6). The Burmese, who had witnessed a period of expansion and prosperity under Alompra, demanded of Lord Hastings that he should surrender Chittagong, Dacca, and some other places, which they claimed as original dependencies of Arakan. His refusal, and the encroachments of the Burmese in seizing Cachar, a district of Bengal, and a little island on the coast of Chittagong, produced war. In 1824 the British attacked and occupied Rangoon at the mouth of the Irawadi. The Burmese were unable to effect a recapture, and Sir Archibald Campbell advanced up the Irawadi to Prome, where he remained till hostilities were renewed in November 1825. Finally, after the British advance to within forty-five miles of Ava (the capital), and after the conclusion and rupture of a truce by the Burmese, peace was made at Yandaboo in February 1826, by which the Burmese ceded Assam, Arakan, and the coast south of Martaban, and gave up their claims to the lower provinces.

(2) SECOND BURMESE WAR (1852). After the Peace of Yandaboo, however, and especially after a change of dynasty, which occurred in 1837, the British continued to be treated with great insolence by the court of Burma. The successive residents were insulted, and the traders were subject to perpetual extortion. In 1851 Commodore Lambert, in the For, appeared, and to him the British residents in Rangoon complained. In default of redress, Commodore Lambert proceeded to blockade the port of Rangoon. The matter was referred to the government, and, after three applications had been made in vain for redress, Lord Dalhousie (February 12, 1852) determined on war. Two expeditions were sent from Bengal and Madras, and the Bengal column landed in the Rangoon River on April 2. On April 11 the siege of Rangoon began. On the 14th the place was carried by storm. On May 17 Bassein was captured, and on October 9 Prome. On December 20 a proclamation was issued, with the consent of the directors, annexing Pegu. A treaty of peace was drafted, but the commissioners could not come to terms. The war therefore ended without any treaty being concluded.

In 1867 a treaty was concluded by which British vessels were allowed to navigate Burmese waters. In the autumn of 1885 the oppressive conduct of King Thibaw towards British merchants led to a war. A force under General Prendergast entered Mandalay on November 28. Thibaw was deposed, and on January 1, 1886, the whole of Upper Burma was annexed to the British empire. The dacoit bands were gradually exterminated. In 1886 a convention was signed with China, by which the transfer of the country to Great Britain was recognized.

Burned Candlemas was a name bestowed by the Scots in the spring of 1355-6, at which time Edward III completely ravaged East Lothian.

Burnell, ROBERT (d. 1292), was one of Edward I's great ministers. He first appears as clerk to Prince Edward, who was greatly attached to him, and attempted on the death of Boniface of Savoy to secure for him the see of Canterbury. He acted as one of the regents during Edward's absence on crusade, and on his return was made chancellor (1274). This office he held for the remaining eighteen years of his life. In 1275 Burnell was appointed Bishop of Bath and Wells, but in spite of Edward's constant efforts he obtained no higher ecclesiastical preferment. He was a great lawyer, and assisted the king in his legal and constitutional reforms. His influence can be traced in most of Edward's legislation, and it was at his manor-house at Acton Burnell, in Shropshire, that the important statute De Mercatoribus was passed. Able administrator and faithful servant though he was, Burnell's character was marred by licentiousness and greed.

Burnes, SIR ALEXANDER (1805-41), when a young officer in the Bombay army, was selected by Sir John Malcolm, in 1830, to take charge of a mission to Ranjit Singh, which was to make an attempt to establish friendly relations with the chiefs on the banks of the Indus. He was treated indifferently in Sind, but well received by Ranjit, and proceeded to Simla and submitted a report. He was directed to return to Bombay, through Afghanistan, Balkh, and Bokhara, and to explore and report. In 1837 Captain Burnes entered Kabul, where he unsuccessfully attempted to conclude an alliance with Dost Mohammed. In 1839 he accompanied the Afghan expedition, and succeeded in concluding an alliance with Mehrab Khan, ruler of Baluchistan. In 1840 he was created a baronet, and was left in Kabul to succeed Sir W. Macnaghten as envoy. In 1841 he was murdered in the Kabul massacre. [AFGHAN WARS.]

Burnet, GILBERT (1643-1715), Bishop of Salisbury, was born at Edinburgh. He studied at Aberdeen, and visited England, France, and Holland. In 1665 he was ordained and presented to the living of Saltoun. In 1668 he was appointed professor of divinity at Glasgow, and married a relation of the Duke of Hamilton (1671). He incurred the resentment of Lauderdale, by whom he was accused of instigating the opposition to the government, and thought it advisable to leave Scotland and to settle in London. In 1675 he was appointed preacher at the Rolls Chapel. He became very popular as a preacher, and was well known at court. During the Popish Plot he made great efforts to save the victims of that delusion. In 1681 he published the first volume of his "History of the Reformation," and received the thanks of the zealously Protestant Commons for it. In 1683 he accompanied Russell to the scaffold, and was examined by the Commons on the charge of having written his dying speech. On the accession of James, he withdrew to the continent, and after travelling for a year arrived at The Hague, where he soon gained the confidence of William of Orange, and succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation between the prince and his wife. He wrote numerous tracts directed against James, whose bitter enmity he excited. He accompanied William to England as his chaplain, and after the Revolution was rewarded with the bishopric of Salisbury. He was a zealous advocate of the claims of Mary to a share of the throne. In religious politics he took the unpopular latitudinarian side. While most vigorously opposed to granting any rights to Catholics, he was in favour of toleration for Dissenters. Accordingly, he attempted, with his friend Tillotson, to draw up a scheme of reconciliation with the Presbyterians, and he supported Nottingham's Comprehension Bill (q.v.). In politics he was a thoroughgoing Whig. He proposed to insert the name of the Princess Sophia as secured in the Bill of Rights, but the clause was rejected by the Commons. He was therefore regarded by the adherents of the house of Brunswick as the chief supporter of their cause. He also claims to have inserted in the Bill of Rights the clause which forbids the sovereign to marry a papist. In 1693 it was resolved by the Commons that a pastoral letter of his, in which he had spoken of England as being conquered by William, should be burnt by the hangman. On the death of Mary he wrote a warm eulogy on her character. In 1698 he was appointed tutor to the young Duke of Gloucester, the heir to the throne, whose education he carefully superintended. In 1701 his "Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles" was censured in convocation; and the same year an ineffectual attempt was made in the House of Commons to get him removed from his post about the young prince. He violently attacked the Occasional Conformity Bill (q.v.) in 1704. He was a staunch supporter of the union with Scotland, and was chairman of the committee for considering the articles in the Lords. His care for the welfare of the Church was shown by his scheme for the augmentation of small livings, which ultimately ripened into Queen Anne's Bounty (q.v.). In the Sacheverell episode he enunciated the doctrines of the Whigs in a speech against passive obedience. He upbraided Queen Anne with her supposed design of settling the crown on the Pretender, and towards the close of his life vehemently opposed the Tory Peace of Utrecht.

Burn's Hill, THE BATTLE OF (1847), was fought in Kafirland between a British force which was endeavouring to seize Sandilli, the Kafir chief, and the Kafirs; the British were defeated.

Burrard, SIR HARRY (1755-1813), entered the army early in life, and first saw active service in the American War, being present at Camden, and under Lord Cornwallis in South Carolina in 1781. In 1798 he distinguished himself in the unfortunate expedition to Ostend. At Alkmaar (1799) he was posted on the left in command of the brigade of Guards, and rendered good service in supporting Abercromby's attack. In 1807 he went as second in command of the expedition to Copenhagen; and on his return he was made a baronet. In the following year he was sent out with reinforcements to Portugal. He arrived just in time to find that Wellesley had defeated Junot at Vimeiro and was arranging everything for a hot pursuit. Burrard at once forbade any further advance, and recalled the troops to their positions. The results of this prohibition were disastrous, since they prevented Wellesley from totally destroying Junot's army, and rendered necessary the Convention of Cintra (q.v.). A court of inquiry was held, in which Sir Harry was exonerated from all blame; but popular indignation prevented him from ever being employed again. Napier, a not too gentle critic, says that "it is absurd to blame Sir H. Burrard for not adopting one of those prompt and daring conceptions that distinguish great generals only." Wellesley himself acknowledged that Sir Harry Burrard had acted on fair military grounds.

Burrowes, PETER (1753-1841), was an Irish politician. He began life as tutor to one of the Beresfords, and was offered a seat in the Irish parliament, but declined to become a mere placeman. In 1783 he was a delegate to the great Volunteer Convention. He entered the Irish parliament shortly before the Union, and was one of the many barristers who declined to be bought over by Lord Castlereagh. When Lord Cornwallis was sent to Ireland as lord-lieutenant, Burrowes proposed that an appeal should be made to the yeomanry to defeat the Union, but he was dissuaded from the step, much to his subsequent regret. His speeches were among the best that were made on the anti-Union side. In 1811 he appeared as counsel for the arrested delegates of the Catholic Convention, and won his case.

Burton, HENRY (1578-1648), was clerk of the closet to Prince Charles, but after Charles's accession to the throne he was removed, and for accusing Laud of popery was forbidden the court. In 1637 he was accused before the Star Chamber of writing schismatical and libellous books against the hierarchy of the Church, and the scandal of the government. For this he was sentenced to stand in the pillory, lose his ears, pay a fine of £5,000, and be imprisoned for life. The first part of the sentence was carried out, and he remained in prison till 1640, when, on his release by the Long Parliament, the proceedings against him were annulled, and £5,000 compensation given him.

Bury St. Edmunds, in Suffolk, was probably a Roman settlement of some importance. Previous to the ninth century it was known as Beodricesworth. It derived its modern name from St. Edmund, King of the East Angles, who was taken prisoner by the Danes, c. 870, and martyred. Early in the next century his remains were translated from their original resting-place at Hoxne to Beodricesworth, where a monastery had been established about 633 by King Sigebert. The shrine was at first entrusted to the care of a college of clerks or secular priests, but in 1020 these were replaced by monks, and an ample charter of liberties and of endowment was granted to the house by Canute. Thereafter St. Edmund became one of the most celebrated Benedictine foundations in England, and at the Dissolution was found to be possessed of enormous wealth. In 1214 a great meeting of the barons took place at Bury, where they swore solemnly to compel King John to grant a charter. It was one of the centres of the Peasants' Revolt of 1381. Parliaments were on several occasions held here, the most famous being that of 1446, at which Duke Humphrey of Gloucester was arrested.

Busaco, THE BATTLE OF (September 27, 1810), secured Wellington's retreat to the lines which he had prepared on Torres Vedras. He had taken up a strong position on the Busaco range of hills, with a very steep front. On September 29, at dawn, Masséna ordered the British position to be assaulted in the centre, where the ascent was easiest. Picton was in command; and the French assault was so rapid and determined that after driving back the skirmishers they gained the crest of the hill, and threw the third division into confusion. At that moment General Leith, who was on Picton's right, moved up a brigade to his assistance; and the French were driven over the hillside. Meantime Ney, on the French right, had led his men over more difficult ground and attacked Craufurd, who commanded on the extreme left of the allied line. When the French were on the point of carrying the position, Craufurd launched against them a reserve of 1,800 men, and the second assault of the French failed. Masséna, in the evening, hastily began to execute a flanking march round the hills on the left of the allied forces. Wellington perceived the movement only just in time, and ordered a retreat to meet it. The allied troops were in great danger, but the confusion of the French army saved the allies from defeat. As it was, they were worsted in several skirmishes with French scouting parties, and the negligence of Craufurd at the last moment imperilled the safety of the allied army; but at length Wellington had all his forces ensconced behind the lines of Torres Vedras.

Butler, THE CHIEF, was one of the great household officers of the Norman period. The office was bestowed by Henry I on William d'Aubigny (de Albini) and became hereditary in his family. William's son became Earl of Arundel, and, in course of time, the butlership became associated with the earldom and followed its descent. The duties were last executed at the coronation of George IV (1821) by the Duke of Norfolk in his capacity of Earl of Arundel. No coronation banquet has, however, been held since that date, and the office of chief butler has therefore ceased to exist.

In Ireland the family of Butler derived their name from the office, which seems to have been bestowed on them as early as the twelfth century. The duties were last discharged by the Marquess of Ormonde in 1821, but, as in the case of the English butlership, the office has since been extinguished.

"Complete English Peerage" (new edition), ii, Appendix D; J. H. Round, "The King's Sergeants and their Coronation Services," 1911.

Butler, THE FAMILY OF, was founded in Ireland by Theobald Gualtier or Walter (a brother of Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury and chancellor of England), who received grants of land in Leinster from Henry II, together with the hereditary office of Pincerna, or Butler, to the kings of England. The Butler family did not play a very prominent part in Irish history until the beginning of the fourteenth century, when Edmond le Boteler was justiciar (1315-16), and was created Earl of Carrick for his exertions against Edward Bruce and the Scots. The earldom of Carrick did not remain with his heirs, but his son James, who married Eleanor, daughter of Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Essex and first cousin of Edward II, was in 1328 created Earl of Ormonde and raised the family to a position of equality with the Burkes and the Fitzgeralds. The Butlers were powerful chiefly in the Pale, and though they adopted some Irish customs, yet, on the whole, they were faithful to their English origin. They almost alone, in opposition to the Fitzgeralds, supported the house of Lancaster and the English connexion. Kilkenny and part of Tipperary formed their palatinate, and they stood next in power to the Fitzgeralds. The title of Ossory was created in 1527, when Piers Butler consented to resign the title of Ormonde to Thomas Boleyn, Viscount Rochford, but the latter honour was restored to him in 1538. The Butlers (not, however, including the Earl of Ormonde, who was then treasurer of Ireland and in good odour with the queen) joined the Desmonds in the Munster insurrection of 1569. They played an important part in English history during the seventeenth century; they were now Protestants, and, though Irish in sympathy, thoroughly Royalist in their views, and anxious to keep up the English connexion. James Butler (q.v.), the 12th earl, who was created marquis in 1642 and duke in 1661, commanded the Royalist troops for the suppression of the Irish rebellion, and was a strong adherent of the king during the Civil War. After the Restoration he was made viceroy of Ireland. His son Ossory died in the service of William of Orange (1680). James, the 2nd duke (q.v.), was suspected of Jacobite intrigue during the last years of the reign of Queen Anne, and although he signed the proclamation of the accession of George I his immense estates were forfeited (1715). His brother and heir, Charles, was created Baron Butler of Weston, Hunts, in the British peerage, but died without direct heirs. In 1791 John Butler, a descendant of the 1st duke, secured from the Irish parliament an acknowledgment of his right to the Irish peerage of Ormonde. His successor was in 1816 raised to an Irish marquise; and was also made a baron of the United Kingdom.

Butler, JAMES, 4TH EARL OF ORMONDE (d. 1452), was lord-deputy of Ireland in Henry IV's reign. In Henry V's reign he was appointed lord-lieutenant. In 1423 he was superseded; but in 1440 he again became lord-lieutenant, and retained the office till 1446. His governorship was marked by fierce conflicts with the Talbots, between whom and the Butlers there had long been a violent feud; and by a struggle to exclude the native Irish from the Pale (q.v.).

Butler, JAMES, 5TH EARL OF ORMONDE and EARL OF WILTSHIRE (d. 1461), was the eldest son of James, 4th Earl of Ormonde. He was knighted when very young by Henry VI, and in 1449 was created Earl of Wiltshire. In 1451 he became lord deputy of Ireland, and in 1453 lord-lieutenant, which position he maintained until superseded by the Duke of York. He received a grant of tannage and poundage on condition that he guarded the seas for three years in conjunction with other great lords. He was throughout his life a staunch Lancastrian. On the sea he fought against Richard Neville, Earl of Warwick (the "Kingmaker"). At the first battle of St. Albans he distinguished himself, and at Wakefield he commanded one of the wings of the army that defeated and slew the Duke of York. In the same year, however (1461), he was defeated at Towton after taking part in the battle of Mortimer's Cross, and fell a prisoner into the hands of the Yorkists. It is said that he was conveyed to Newcastle and beheaded there on May 1, 1461. Together with his brothers he was attainted in the first parliament of Edward IV; his brother John, however, was afterwards restored in blood and became 6th Earl of Ormonde. As James Butler died without issue the earldom of Wiltshire lapsed in 1461.

Butler, JAMES, 12TH EARL and 1ST DUKE OF ORMONDE (1610-88), was the most powerful nobleman in Ireland in his day. In 1641, when the rebellion broke out, he was made lieutenant-general of the king's forces. In consequence of his victory over Lord Mountgarret at Kilrush in March 1642, he became a marquis. He soon afterwards defeated General Preston, but the position of the king in England being critical, he obeyed the royal orders, and concluded with the rebels the peace called the Cessation (q.v.). Soon afterwards he was made lord-lieutenant, but being unable to hold his own, he honourably chose to give up Dublin to the Puritans rather than to the natives, and surrendered it to Colonel Jones, and in 1647 concluded a regular treaty with the Parliamentary commissioners. On hearing, however, of Charles I's execution, he took out a new commission as lord-lieutenant from Charles II, and soon found himself at the head of all the Irish forces, excepting only O'Neill's troops. However, his attempt to besiege Dublin was frustrated by the battle of Rathmines (August 2, 1649), and soon afterwards he left the kingdom. After the battle of Worcester, he remained with Charles II in exile. On the Restoration he became Baron Butler and Earl of Brecknock in the English peerage, and in 1661 Duke of Ormonde in Ireland. He was again lord-lieutenant from 1661 to 1668, and again from 1677 to 1682. His losses in the king's service were estimated at £900,000. His reputation for loyalty, ability, and integrity stood very high, and he held aloof from the immorality of Charles's court. His latter years were clouded by his fears for James II, and they probably hastened his end. His eldest son, Lord Ossory, had fallen by the hand of an assassin in 1680. This son was nearly as popular as his father, and had greatly distinguished himself in the Netherlands.

Butler, JAMES, 2ND DUKE OF ORMONDE (1665-1745), was grandson of James, 1st Duke of Ormonde. On the death of his grandfather he was elected chancellor of the University of Oxford. On the arrival of William in England, he deserted James II in company with Prince George of Denmark, and was present at the coronation of William and Mary. He was present at the battle of the Boyne, at Steinkirk, and at Landen, where he was taken prisoner (1693). In 1696 he voted for the attainder of Fenwick. In 1700 large grants of land were made him by the Commons. On the outbreak of the War of the Spanish Succession, he was sent with an expedition to Cadiz, together with Sir George Rooke. In 1703 he became lord-lieutenant of Ireland, on the resignation of Rochester, and was reappointed in 1710. His policy of favouring the Catholics and opposing the Irish parliament made him very popular in Ireland. On the dismissal of Marlborough he was appointed to command the troops in Flanders. He was ordered to undertake no offensive operations against the French, in view of the proposed treaty; but he could not refuse to join Eugene in the siege of Quesnoy. On the declaration of an armistice (June 1712), the British troops were ordered to separate from Eugene. After the accession of George I it was resolved to impeach him for acting in concert with Marshal Villars. He fled to France. Bolingbroke ascribed the ruin of the Pretender's cause in 1715 to the flight of Ormonde and the death of Louis XIV. The duke soon started for the coast of Devonshire, hoping to find that county in a state of rebellion. But his agent had betrayed his plans; and there was every appearance of the most profound peace. On his return he quarrelled with Bolingbroke, and induced James Edward to dismiss him. In 1719 Alberoni, the Spanish minister, fitted out a fleet, with 5,000 soldiers under the command of Ormonde, who was to join it at Corunna as "captain-general of the King of Spain." But the ships were scattered by storm. He spent the remainder of his life chiefly in retirement at Avignon. In 1740, on the outbreak of war, Ormonde went once more to Madrid, but could gain no promises of help. In 1744 Charles Edward neglected to summon him to join his intended invasion of England, until all chance of success was over for the year.

Biography by M. de Vissac, 1914.

Butler, SAMUEL (1612-80), is the author of one of the greatest political satires in the English language. The early years of his life are obscure, but he is said to have been at one time employed by Selden as an amanuensis, and to have been recommended by him to the Countess of Kent. He subsequently entered the service of Sir Samuel Luke, a rigid Presbyterian, where he had the opportunity of observing the various traits of bigotry and absurdity which he subsequently wove into "Hudibras." This work was published in three parts; the first in 1663, the second in 1664, and the third in 1678. The work is a satire on the Independents and Presbyterians, and is of considerable historical interest as giving a striking picture of many of their peculiarities. Butler was the author of a satire on the Royal Society, "The Elephant in the Moon"; a collection of "Characters," and some other works. He seems to have gained little or no solid reward from the court, and is said to have died in the extremest poverty in London. In 1721 a cenotaph was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey which provoked from Samuel Wesley a well-known epigram.

An edition of "Hudibras," with copious and useful explanations of allusions, etc., is that of Grey, London, 1744.

Butler, THOMAS, 7TH EARL OF ORMONDE (d. 1515), succeeded his brother, the 6th earl. The act of attainder was finally reversed by the first parliament of Henry VII, and he was summoned to the English parliament as Baron Ormonde of Rochford, in 1495. In 1515 he died, without male issue. Through his daughter, his English barony passed to the Boleyns, who were created Earls of Ormonde as well. But on the death of Sir Thomas Boleyn without male issue, in 1539, the earldom was restored by Henry VIII to the Butlers.

Butler, THOMAS, 10TH EARL OF ORMONDE (1532-1614), became in 1559 lord high treasurer of Ireland, which office he held till his death. He was a staunch Protestant, having been educated at the English court; and his religious views embittered his feud with the Earl of Desmond. In 1573 he was appointed governor of Munster, and the duty was imposed on him of removing Desmond. In January 1580 he advanced into the country of the Fitzgeralds, destroying all before him. It is said that in one year his forces killed 836 malefactors, and 4,000 other people. So relentless was his policy that Munster was a desert when he left it. During the remainder of his life Ormonde continued a firm supporter of the English supremacy.

Butt, ISAAC (1813-79), the son of an Irish Protestant clergyman, educated at Trinity College, Dublin, was made professor of political economy in 1836. In 1838 he was called to the Irish bar and began to take an active part in politics on the Conservative side. He was a strenuous opponent of O'Connell. In 1844 he was made a queen's counsel, and in 1848 defended Smith O'Brien. From 1852 to 1865 he sat in parliament as member for Youghal, but did not distinguish himself. In 1871 he was elected as Home Rule member for Limerick, and assumed the leadership of the new party; and in 1872 he founded the Home Rule League. But he was opposed by the more extreme and violent section of his party, and by the end of his life he had little authority left in the Home Rule ranks.

Buxton, SIR THOMAS FOWELL (1786-1845), established a well-organized system of relief for the poor of Spitalfields in 1816, and soon afterwards examined the state of the prisons. He wrote a pamphlet exposing the horrors of the prison system, which excited great attention. He became M.P. for Weymouth till 1837, when he lost his seat at the dissolution following the death of William IV. In parliament he proved himself an important ally of Mackintosh on the question of the amelioration of the Criminal Code. In 1823 he brought forward a resolution "that slavery, being repugnant to the Christian Religion and the British Constitution, ought to be abolished at the earliest period compatible with the safety of all concerned." It was not, however, till 1831 that the principle of emancipation was conceded, chiefly owing to Buxton's efforts, and in 1833 the government introduced a measure of emancipation. Buxton did not, however, relax his efforts, but laboured to effect the abolition of the system of apprenticeship which was still sanctioned by the law. In 1837 he quitted parliamentary life; and in 1839 he published "The African Slave Trade and its Remedy," in which he proposed the colonization of Africa. An expedition with this object was sent to the Niger, but it proved a complete failure. In 1840 Buxton was created a baronet.

Bye Plot, THE (1603), was set on foot by a Roman Catholic priest named William Watson, and was joined by ardent Catholics like Sir Griffin Markham and Anthony Copley, as well as by Puritans like Lord Grey of Wilton and George Brooke, who were discontented with the policy of James I. Their plan seems to have been to secure the person of the king, compel him to dismiss his ministers and grant toleration to Catholics and Puritans. Many were inveigled into joining on the pretence that the meeting was merely for the presentation of a petition in favour of general toleration. The scheme was badly arranged; no definite plan had been agreed upon; and it proved a complete failure owing to its betrayal by John Gerard, a Jesuit. It is certain that the Bye Plot had no connexion with the Main or Raleigh's Plot, with which, however, Cecil and the other ministers managed to mix it up in popular belief. Watson was executed, Markham reprieved on the scaffold, Grey imprisoned in the Tower, and Copley banished.

Byng, GEORGE, VISCOUNT TORRINGTON (1663-1733), volunteered for naval service at the age of fifteen. In 1681 he left the sea at the request of General Kirke, governor of Tangier, and became under him ensign, and then lieutenant. He was employed to carry assurances of friendship from the English malcontents to William of Orange, to whom he was privately introduced by Admiral Russell. In 1690 he was second in command to Sir George Rooke at the battle of Beachy Head (q.v.). During the next six years he served under Admiral Russell. He was present at the destruction of the Spanish treasure-ships at Vigo Bay. Next year he was made rear-admiral, and served under Sir Cloudisley Shovell. He commanded the squadron which captured the citadel of Gibraltar, and was knighted for his bravery at the battle of Malaga. In 1705 he was elected member for Plymouth. In 1706 he helped to relieve Barcelona, and commanded the vessels detached for the reduction of Carthage and Alicante. In 1707 he served under Shovell at the abortive siege of Toulon. He frustrated the Pretender's expedition to Scotland. He was placed in command of an expedition fitted out for a descent on the French coast, but, owing to the fact that he was badly supplied with provisions and information, could effect little. In 1709 he was placed on the admiralty commission, but was removed shortly before the queen's death. In 1715 he was made a baronet for his vigilance in watching the French coast. In 1717, on the outbreak of hostilities with the northern powers, he shut the Swedish fleet up in the Baltic. In the following year he was made admiral and commander-in-chief. He was sent to counteract the designs of Alberoni against the Italians. In order to relieve Count Daun, who was besieged in Messina, he attacked and utterly destroyed the Spanish fleet off Cape Passaro, with the loss of only one ship (July 31). On his return he was sworn of the privy council, and made rear-admiral and treasurer of the navy. In 1721 he was raised to the peerage as Viscount Torrington, and in 1727 became first lord of the admiralty, a post which he held until his death.

"Memoirs" of Byng, ed. J. K. Laughton, 1889.

Byng, JOHN, ADMIRAL (1704-57), was the fourth son of Viscount Torrington, and served at sea under his father. He was present at the battle of Cape Passaro in 1718, and saw service in the Mediterranean and off Newfoundland. In 1756 he was sent out with a fleet of ten ships of war, poorly manned and in bad condition, with orders to relieve Minorca in case of attack. Only three days afterwards the French fleet attacked the castle of St. Philip in that island. Byng arrived off St. Philip on May 19, and tried in vain to communicate with the governor. On the following day the engagement took place. Rear-Admiral West on the right attacked the enemy with vigour, and drove them back; but Byng held aloof, and the action was indecisive. After a council of war, he sailed off to Gibraltar and left Minorca to its fate. Byng was brought home under arrest, and tried by court-martial. His judges acquitted him of treachery and cowardice, but it was decided that he had not done his utmost to relieve St. Philip, or to defeat the French fleet. He was recommended to mercy. Pitt in vain tried to induce the king to pardon him. Byng was shot at his own request on the quarter-deck of his ship in Portsmouth Harbour; he met his fate with great courage. Voltaire, who had tried to help him by sending him a laudatory letter of the Duke of Richelieu, says that he was slain "pour encourager les autres." It is probably true that Byng had not done as much as he might have done for the relief of Minorca. But there can be no question as to the harshness and injustice of applying the severe penalties prescribed by the twelfth article of the naval code in the case of an officer who was rightly acquitted of treachery and cowardice. Though Byng was perfectly honest and sufficiently brave, it may, however, be conceded that he was wanting in capacity. "He trembled not at danger, but, like many other weak men in high places, he did tremble at responsibility." [MINORCA.]

H. W. Richmond (ed.), "Papers Relating to the Loss of Minorca," 1913 (Navy Records Society).

Byng, JULIAN HEDWORTH GEORGE, 1ST BARON (b. 1862), British general, commanded the South African Light Horse in the Boer War of 1899, and served in Egypt in 1912. In the Great War he commanded the cavalry corps in France (1915) and the Suvla area in the Dardanelles campaign, and on his recall to France captured Vimy Ridge on April 9, 1917, and became the leader of the Third Army. On November 20, 1917, he carried out the tank surprise on the Cambrai front. In 1919 he was raised to the peerage. From 1921 to 1926 he was governor-general of Canada.

Byron, GEORGE GORDON, 6TH BARON BYRON (1788-1824), was one of the founders of English Philhellenism during the War of Greek Independence (1821). He had travelled in Greece in 1809-11 with Hobhouse, incidentally swimming the Hellespont on May 3, 1810. On the outbreak of the Greek revolt he threw himself heart and soul into the cause of the insurgents, and sailed from Genoa to Greece in July 1823. He landed at Missolonghi in January 1824, enlisted a corps of Suliotes, financed the Greeks from his personal fortune and credit, and made an unsuccessful raid northwards with his troops. He died of marsh-fever on April 19, 1824.

Byron, JOHN, 1ST LORD (d. 1652), was one of Charles I's personal attendants, and was by him made lieutenant of the Tower in 1641. As he was strongly attached to the royal cause, the parliament was anxious to get rid of him, and, in 1642, the king consented to appoint Sir John Conyers in his place. On the outbreak of the war, Byron raised a troop for the king, and at the battle of Edgehill was in command of the reserve. He showed great bravery at Roundaway Down and Newbury, and, in 1643, was created a peer, and shortly afterwards governor of Chester, where he sustained a long siege, capitulating only when all his provisions were exhausted. He was subsequently appointed governor to the Duke of York. He took part in the second Civil War, and on the failure of the Royalists returned to his charge of the Duke of York, and died at Paris.

Cabal, THE (1667-73), was the name given to the ministry formed in the reign of Charles II, after the fall of Clarendon. The word "cabal" had been used previously to denote a secret committee or cabinet, and answers to the "junto" of a somewhat later date. [CABINET.] It happened, however, rather curiously that the initials of the statesmen who formed this administration spelt the word "Cabal." These ministers were Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley-Cooper (Lord Shaftesbury), and Lauderdale. "They agreed," says Ranke, "in wishing to strengthen the royal prerogative by moderating the uniformity laws with the help of France, and during the excitement caused by a foreign war; but, otherwise, they were attached to widely different principles. Lauderdale was a Presbyterian; Ashley-Cooper, a philosopher; Buckingham, if he held any opinion at all, an Independent; Arlington, a moderate Catholic; Clifford, a zealous one." At first, in foreign policy, a new departure was taken by the formation of the Triple Alliance (q.v.), which compelled Louis to desist from his schemes of aggression in the Spanish Netherlands. But this line of policy was not long pursued. War with the Dutch and alliance with France followed, with the infamous Treaty of Dover (1670-q.v.). Money was obtained by seizing that which had been deposited for security in the exchequer, while parliament, which might have proved obstructive, was prorogued. The Declaration of Indulgence (q.v.), granting liberty of worship to all sects, was issued in 1672. But the war ended in failure, and the Declaration was received with great suspicion even by the Dissenters. The treasury was empty, and in 1673 parliament had to be summoned to grant supplies. Charles was compelled to withdraw the Declaration, and to assent to the Test Act (q.v.), which, by excluding all Catholics from office, obliged Clifford and Arlington to resign, and put an end to the Cabal ministry.

Cabinet, THE, although familiar by name to everyone as the most powerful body in the executive government of the state, is, properly speaking, unknown to the constitution. Theoretically, the cabinet is only an irregular committee of the privy council. By the theory of the constitution the privy council is the proper body to advise the sovereign; yet the members of the privy council do not attend unless they are specially summoned, and they have only formal business to transact. The cabinet council took its rise in the early seventeenth century, but was then only a small irregular body, consisting of such members of the privy council as the sovereign chose from time to time to consult. After the Restoration, Charles II complained that the unwieldy size of the privy council made it unfit for the secrecy and dispatch which are necessary in great affairs. He preferred to work through a select committee of the council, which deliberated on all matters of business before they were submitted to the larger council. The most notorious of these cabinet councils was the Cabal of 1667-73, which, however, had little in common with the cabinets of later history. It has been said that the only bond of union between its members was that "not one of them was a sound Anglican churchman." This method of government was very unpopular—partly from the character of the ministers Charles selected and the nature of the policy they executed, and partly from the imperfect understanding at the time of the doctrine of ministerial responsibility. In 1679 an attempt was made by Sir William Temple to restore the privy council to its former position. Its numbers were to be reduced from fifty to thirty, of whom fifteen were to be the chief officers of state and the rest made up of ten lords and five commoners. The joint income of the council was not to be less than £300,000, which was thought to be nearly equal to the estimated income of the House of Commons. Charles promised that he would be governed by the advice of the council, but he continued to consult the cabinet as before, and his example was followed by his successor, James II. The Revolution of 1688 so far from checking the development of cabinet government rather accelerated it. Under William III the cabinet assumed more definite duties, and began to be directly associated with the party system. At first the king endeavoured to choose his ministers impartially from both of the great political parties, but the hostility of the Tories to an active foreign policy compelled him to lean increasingly towards the Whigs, and in 1693 he formed a ministry drawn exclusively from that party—the famous Whig junto. In the Act of Settlement of 1701 a last attempt was made to restore the old supremacy of the privy council, and to enforce the responsibility of ministers by means of the old weapon of impeachment, but it was foredoomed to failure. The cabinet system was too firmly rooted to be overthrown, and the financial dependence of the Crown upon parliament, which had been finally ensured by the Revolution Settlement, secured the responsibility of the executive to the legislature far more effectually than could the clumsy expedient of impeachment. The accession of George I marked a further stage in the progress of cabinet government. The king, not understanding English and but little interested in the domestic politics of his adopted country, gradually ceased to attend the meetings of the cabinet. Under his reign, and that of his successor George II, the fabric of constitutional government was consolidated, especially during the long and able rule of Sir Robert Walpole—England's first prime minister in fact if not in name. During the first half of the eighteenth century, however, the cabinet was a Whig machine, run and controlled by the great Whig ring which had been firmly established in power as a result of the Hanoverian succession. The Tories, in consequence of their lingering Jacobite sympathies, were excluded from all share in the government. George III, who succeeded in 1760, when the factors which had determined the policy of his two predecessors were no longer operative, determined to free himself from the domination of the Revolution Whigs and to recover the ground which the Crown had lost since 1688. He aspired to be his own prime minister and to substitute for the rule of a homogeneous cabinet, government by departments whose heads should be individually subservient to himself. In the first part of his project he was successful. With the help of the King's Friends (q.v.) and of the revived Tory party, he drove the Whigs from power, and substituted a Tory regime which outlasted the Revolutionary and Napoleonic wars. But the second object he did not permanently attain. His twelve years of personal government (1770–82), with Lord North as his lieutenant, were attended by disaster at home and abroad, and eventually George was only able to save himself from submission to the hated Whigs by accepting as his prime minister the younger Pitt, in whom he found a master rather than a servant. With Pitt's accession to office in 1783 the cabinet and the premiership may be said to have assumed their modern form. Within the last two centuries cabinet government has been matured and strengthened in three main ways, viz., in regard to political unanimity, unity of responsibility, and concert in action. The principle has been accepted that a cabinet should be formed on some definite basis of political opinion, or, in the rare cases of a coalition, of agreement at least upon certain specified points. That the members of a cabinet should stand or fall together has been the custom of the constitution since 1782; while the principle of solidarity and concerted action, for which Walpole fought with so much determination, secured recognition in the days of William Pitt. In theory the choice of the cabinet belongs to the Crown, but in practice it is in the hands of the prime minister, and even he has no absolute choice in the matter. Between the compulsory list which he must take, and the impossible list which he cannot take, a prime minister's independent choice in the formation of a cabinet is not very large. It extends rather to the division of cabinet offices than to the choice of cabinet ministers. Parliament and the nation have pretty well settled in advance who shall have the first places. The numbers of the cabinet in the later nineteenth century generally varied from twelve to fifteen; including as a rule the following ministers: the first lord of the treasury, the lord chancellor, the chancellor of the exchequer, the president of the council, the lord privy seal, the home, the foreign, and the colonial secretaries, the first lord of the admiralty, the secretaries for India and for war, the president of the board of trade, and the chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Within recent years the numbers included in the cabinet have grown to twenty or more. The secretaries for Scotland and for air, the ministers of health and of labour, the president of the board of education, the minister of agriculture and fisheries, and the first commissioner of works are normally of cabinet rank, while such ministers as the postmaster-general or attorney-general on occasion find a place in the cabinet. The Great War of 1914-18 led to a temporary suspension of cabinet government in the accepted sense of the term. During the premiership of Mr. Lloyd George in 1916 power was concentrated in the War Cabinet—a committee of four which dealt with such questions touching the prosecution of the war as primarily concerned the United Kingdom, without responsibility to the other ministers, who sank to the position of mere heads of departments. Imperial affairs were dealt with by the Imperial War Cabinet, to which were summoned at different times representatives of all the self-governing dominions of the empire. This supersession of the traditional constitutional forms seems, however, to have had few permanent results, and constitutional development in the post-war period has been mainly along the old lines.

Cabot, JOHN (d. 1498), was a naturalized Venetian, probably of Genoese birth, who settled at Bristol in the reign of Henry VI. In 1497, having obtained a patent from the king for the discovery of unknown lands, he set sail from Bristol, with his son, in order to discover the North-West Passage to India. In the course of the voyage they discovered Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and Florida. John Cabot thus deserves the honour of discovering the mainland of America, which he reached June 24, 1497, a year before Columbus.

Cabot, SEBASTIAN (c. 1474-1557), was the son of John Cabot. In 1497 he accompanied his father on his great voyage, in the course of which the adventurers visited Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Labrador, and Florida. In 1512 Ferdinand the Catholic induced Cabot to enter the service of Spain; but on the death of the king, in 1516, he returned to England. His alleged attempt to discover the North-West Passage (1517) has now been disproved (see "Dictionary of National Biography" (1886), viii, 168). In 1526 he sailed on a voyage in the interests of Spain, and discovered St. Salvador and the River Plate, returning to Europe in 1531. In 1548 he again settled in England, and received a pension from Edward VI. In 1553 he did good service to English commerce by being instrumental in establishing the trade with Russia.

J. F. Nicholls, "Life of Sebastian Cabot," 1869. HARRISSE, "John Cabot and Sebastian his Son," 1896, and "Discovery of America," has shown good reason for questioning Sebastian's share in his father's discoveries, and his good faith.

Cade's Rebellion is the name generally given to the rising in south-eastern England in the summer of 1450. Parliament was sitting at Leicester vainly striving to frame measures to check the enormous evils, financial and political, from which the country was suffering, when, early in June, news came that the commons of Kent had risen in arms under a captain who called himself John Mortimer (a cousin of the Duke of York), and whom Thomas Gascoigne, an Oxford theologian of the day, represents as "a descendant of Roger Mortimer, the bastard." His real name seems to have been Jack Cade, and he is described by later writers as an Irishman who had killed a woman of Sussex, fled to France, fought there against the English, come back to England, and wedded the daughter of a squire. He undoubtedly gave proofs of military capacity; and we are told that the primate, in a conference with him, found him "sober in talk and wise in reasoning," if "arrogant in heart and stiff in opinion." At any rate, the rising he led was no wanton one. Misrule at home and failure abroad had brought on men in power a hatred and contempt almost universal. The amiable king was as clay in the hands of his headstrong queen and the friends of the late unpopular Duke of Suffolk. The royal income had dwindled by improvident grants; the exchequer was wellnigh bankrupt; grievous taxes oppressed the commons, whilst their favourite, the Duke of York, was excluded from the government. The lawless murder of the Duke of Suffolk at Dover, on May 2, had been followed by a report that the king's vengeance would fall on the county of Kent. The men of Kent thereupon resolved on an immediate appeal to arms; and in combination with the men of Surrey and Sussex, and headed by Cade, who called himself "Captain of Kent," assembled on June 1, in considerable force, on Blackheath. This was no tumultuous gathering of a mere clownish mob, but an organized enterprise, deliberately carried out by means of the regular local machinery: and men of good birth are known to have taken part in it. In their formal complaint we learn the provocation and aims of the rebellion. Prominent among the first were the heavy taxation, the alienation of Crown property, the general failure of justice, the abuse of purveyance, the appointment of upstarts to high office, the treasonable loss of France, undue interference of great men at elections, and exactions under colour of law; among the second it was urged that the alienated Crown lands should be resumed, the friends of Suffolk discarded, and the king's confidence given to York—in fact, redress of grievances and change of counsellors. Only one clause—that which demanded the abolition of the Statute of Labourers—touched on a social grievance. The king at once mustered an army, and marched to London: and thence, after some delay, moved on Blackheath. Cade fell back before his advance; and Henry, thinking the brunt of the danger over, sent only a small force, under Sir Humphrey and William Stafford, in pursuit of him. Cade faced round at Sevenoaks, and there, on June 18, a fight ensued, in which the king's force was routed, and both the Staffords killed. Cade returned to London, and occupied Southwark. The Londoners resolved, by a vote of the common council, to open their gates to the rebels; and on July 2 Cade led them across the bridge and took formal possession of the city by striking London Stone with his sword. For a time he preserved the show, and something of the reality, of discipline, making his men respect the persons and properties of the citizens, and returning with them every night to Southwark. But he took Lord Saye and Sele, the treasurer, who was in special ill-odour with the country, out of the Tower, and had him arraigned before the lord mayor, but afterwards caused him to be carried off and beheaded in Cheap. Crowmer, Saye's son-in-law and sheriff of Kent, and another were also murdered. Then discipline gave way; robberies became frequent, Cade himself plundering friend and enemy alike. This conduct enraged the Londoners; they turned upon Cade; and under the command of Matthew Gough, a soldier of renown in the French wars, sought, on July 5, to hold the bridge against the rebels. Cade promptly made a furious onslaught upon them; drove them with heavy loss to the drawbridge at the centre, which he set on fire; and killed their leader. The contest lasted through the night; but the Kentish men fell back the next morning. The chancellor (Archbishop Kemp) seized this moment of discouragement to tempt the insurgents with offers of pardon. These were produced by Bishop Waynflete at a conference with Cade, and were gladly accepted. Soon almost every man of the rebels was making for his home. But their captain, probably distrusting his pardon, which had been issued in the name of "John Mortimer," retired under arms to Dartford with a handful of followers. Thence he went to Rochester, whither his booty had been sent by water. A price was now set on his head; and his men quarrelled with him over the plunder. He left them and fled into Sussex. He was heading towards Lewes, when he was caught in a lane near Heathfield, by Iden, the new sheriff of Kent, and, struggling against capture, was cut down and wounded to the death. He died before his captors could get him to London.

Cadiz, EXPEDITIONS AGAINST. (1) The first (1596) was undertaken partly to create a diversion in favour of Henry IV of France, in accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Melun. In June 1596 a combined fleet of English and Dutch, under Lord Howard of Effingham and the Earl of Essex, entered Cadiz harbour, where Sir Francis Drake had burnt the shipping nine years before, and completely defeated the Spanish vessels assembled there for the defence of the city. Essex, with 3,000 men, landed at Puntales, and captured the town, extorting a ransom from the citizens. The expedition returned ten weeks after it had left Plymouth, having done much to lower the prestige of Spain, and to assert the naval superiority of the English. (2) The second (1625) resulted from the rupture of the negotiations for the Spanish marriage, and the restoration of the Palatinate by Spanish aid, and the consequent expedition planned by the Duke of Buckingham to seize a Spanish port and intercept the treasure fleet. An open breach took place in September 1625, when Charles concluded an alliance with Holland (September 8), and a joint expedition was agreed on. Sir Edward Cecil (Lord Wimbledon) was entrusted with the chief command, with Lord Denbigh as rear-admiral and the Earl of Essex as vice-admiral. The combined fleet arrived in Cadiz Bay on October 22; but instead of at once attacking the ships in the harbour and assaulting the city, the next day was spent in capturing the fort of Puntales which guarded the entrance of the harbour. The delay gave the Spaniards time to garrison the before defenceless city, and made a surprise impossible. On the 24th Wimbledon landed his troops, and marched northwards to meet a Spanish force of whose approach he had heard; but the Spaniards retreated, and, after a useless and disorderly march, he returned next morning to his fleet. The fleet, which was to have destroyed the Spanish vessels at the head of the harbour, found them posted in an inaccessible creek, and accomplished nothing. Cadiz was now too strong to attack. On October 27, therefore, the soldiers were re-embarked, the fort of Puntales was abandoned, and the fleet put to sea to intercept the treasure ships. This portion of the enterprise also failed; the ships were unseaworthy, and disease raged among the crews; and in December the fleet returned to England. (3) The third (1702) occurred during the War of the Spanish Succession, and the idea appears to have been suggested by the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt, who was convinced that the Spaniards were to a man in favour of the Archduke Charles, and that Cadiz would form a good basis of operations. Accordingly a joint expedition of English and Dutch troops was fitted out and placed under the command of the Duke of Ormonde; Sir George Rooke, who disapproved of the whole plan, being in command of the fleet of 200 ships. The land forces amounted to 14,000 men. It was first designed to attack Gibraltar, but this idea was given up. For a fortnight the fleet was delayed by storms. Cadiz was strongly fortified and was defended by the veteran general Villadarias. Ormonde first attempted to gain over the governor Brancaccio, and then the inhabitants, but without success. As the town itself was supposed, though utterly without reason, to be impregnable, the allies occupied the port of Santa Maria, which they ruthlessly pillaged, the officers being as unprincipled as the men (July 18). An attempt to take Fort Matagorda proved an utter failure; dysentery, too, broke out among the troops. Accordingly, on September 9, Ormonde, sorely against his will, was constrained to re-embark his troops, and they set off homeward "with a great deal of plunder and infamy." On their way home, however, the expedition partly retrieved its character by the destruction of the Spanish galleons in Vigo Bay.

Cadogan, WILLIAM, 1ST EARL OF (1675-1726), was one of the officers whom Marlborough most trusted. He was made colonel of the 2nd Regiment of Horse in 1703, and general in the following year for his gallant attack on the Schellenberg. In 1705 he was elected member for Woodstock. He fought at Ramillies, and towards the end of 1706 he was taken prisoner, but soon exchanged. In 1707 he was appointed ambassador to the States General. Cadogan led the van at Oudenarde, having been sent on to construct pontoons across the Scheldt, by which the army effected the passage. He also supported General Webb in his gallant fight with the enemy at Wynendael. At the end of the year he was made lieutenant-general. He was again appointed envoy to the States General, but was recalled by the Tory ministry. In Marlborough's last campaign he surprised Bouchain and Cambrai, and broke the barrier which Villars had termed his "non plus ultra." On the disgrace of Marlborough he resigned his appointments. On the accession of George I he was made master of the robes, and envoy to the States General. When the Jacobite insurrection of 1715 broke out, Cadogan was sent to Scotland after the dilatoriness of Argyll had been proved, and soon brought the campaign to a conclusion. He was raised to the peerage in 1716. He signed the defensive alliance between Great Britain, France, and Holland, and subsequently carried out the execution of the Barrier Treaty, and signed the Quadruple Alliance. His influence in Holland was partly owing to his friendship with Marlborough, and partly because he had married a Dutch lady of good family. On the death of the Duke of Marlborough, he was appointed master-general of the ordnance. Later on he supported Carteret in his quarrel with Walpole.

Cadsand, THE BATTLE OF (1337), the first fight of the Hundred Years' War against France, was brought about by the attack of the Count of Flanders on the party of Van Artevelde, who sought aid from England. Sir Walter Manny was sent with a small force, and having effected a landing at Cadsand, an island at the mouth of the Scheldt, inflicted a serious defeat on the troops of the count.

Caen, THE TREATY OF (1091), was made between William Rufus and Robert of Normandy, under the mediation probably of the King of France. Robert renounced his claim to England, and was allowed to retain his capital and the greater part of his duchy; but he recognized the commendations which many of the Norman nobles had made to William Rufus, who thus became a continental neighbour to his brother, "hemming in what was left of Normandy on every side" (Freeman). Cherbourg, Fécamp, and Mont-Saint-Michel were among the places surrendered by Robert. The treaty provided that if either Robert or William should die without an heir the survivor should succeed to his dominions.

Cagliari Affair, THE. In June 1857 some of the passengers on a trading steamer, the Cagliari, seized the ship and attacked the island of Ponza. The ship, after being abandoned by its captors, was taken at sea by a Neapolitan war-vessel, and two English engineers aboard were imprisoned until March 1858, when one became mad, and the other seriously ill. The affair formed the subject of much discussion in parliament, representations from the British government to that of Naples ending in the payment of £3,000 compensation by the latter in June 1858.

Cairns, HUGH McCALMONT, 1ST EARL (1819-85), second son of William Cairns, of co. Down, Ireland, was called to the bar in 1844, and entered parliament as member for Belfast in 1852. In 1858 he was appointed solicitor-general by Lord Derby. On the return of Lord Derby to power in 1866, he was made attorney-general, and subsequently a lord justice of appeal. In 1867 he was elevated to the peerage. He became lord chancellor in 1868, and held that office till the downfall of Disraeli's ministry. In Disraeli's second administration he again held the chancellorship.

Caithness, JOHN, EARL OF (d. 1231), son of Harold, was supposed to have connived at the murder of Bishop Adam. He was in consequence deprived of half his earldom by Alexander II, from whom, however, he bought it back a year later. The earl was burnt to death in his own castle, 1231.

Calais first passed into the possession of the English in the reign of Edward III. It was invested by the English in August 1346, and after the battle of Crecy Edward III appeared in person before the walls with the army that had won the victory. The town endured a siege for nearly a year with heroic bravery, and the governor, Jean de Vienne, finally surrendered on August 4, 1347. According to Jean Le Bel, six of the chief citizens offered their lives to the king in ransom for their fellow-townsmen, but were spared by the intervention of Queen Philippa. The town was unsuccessfully besieged by the Duke of Burgundy in 1436, and remained in English hands as the sole vestige of the English conquests in France at the close of Henry VI's reign. In 1455 Warwick was made captain of Calais, but in 1470 he and Clarence were refused entrance to the city. In July 1475 Edward IV landed at Calais to begin his projected campaign in France. In January 1558 the town was invested and easily captured by Francis, Duke of Guise, owing to the apathy of the English government, which had left the town without men or supplies to withstand a siege. By the peace of Cateau-Cambrésis (q.v.) (1559) the French bound themselves to restore Calais to the English at the end of eight years, on pain of forfeiting a large sum of money; but the engagement was never carried out. It was while lying off Calais on August 7, 1588, that the Spanish Armada was dispersed by the fireships of the English. In 1596 Calais was taken from the French by Philip of Spain, a circumstance which so alarmed England as to occasion the expedition to Cadiz under Lord Howard of Effingham. Calais was restored to France in 1598 by the Treaty of Vervins, and has since remained in the hands of the French.

Calcutta first became an English trading station in 1686, when the small factory established at Hugli was removed to this place. By 1700 Fort William was built, and became the head-quarters of the Bengal servants of the East India Company. In 1707 it was constituted a presidency, and its trade soon became considerable. The city was strongly fortified, and in 1742 the trench called the "Mahratta ditch" was dug round it to protect it from the predatory Mahratta horsemen. In 1756 the town was captured and sacked by Suraj-ud-Dowlah, and the tragedy of the "Black Hole" enacted [BLACK HOLE OF CALCUTTA]. In January 1757 the town was reconquered by Clive, and rebuilt. In 1773 it became the capital of British India as well as of Bengal, by an act of parliament which gave the Fort William government superiority over those of the other presidencies. The governor of Bengal was henceforth called the governor-general, and in 1834 his title was changed to that of governor-general of India. Many magnificent buildings were erected in the European quarter, including the splendid Government House built by Lord Wellesley in 1804. In 1854 the supreme government was separated from the local Bengal government by the creation of a lieutenant-governor of Bengal, who also had his seat at Calcutta, which remained the capital of British India until 1912, when the transfer was made to Delhi (q.v.) and Calcutta became the seat of a governor-in-council. The population of the city, with suburbs, in 1921 was 1,327,547.

Caledonia. The name given generally by the Romans to that part of Britain lying north of the Firths of Forth and Clyde and first laid open by the conquests and explorations of Agricola. The name first occurs in Lucan, vi, 67, and Valerius Flaccus, "Argonaut," i, 7. Tacitus says that the red hair and large limbs of the Caledonians point to a German origin. The Caledonians, according to Ptolemy, extended from the Sinus Lemannonius (probably Loch Long) to the Varar Aestuarium (Beaully Firth). They occupied the tract of wild country called Caledonia Silva, or Forest of Celyddon, and were the most powerful of all the tribes north of the Brigantes. At a later period the name came to include apparently all the barbarian and partially unsubdued natives of the northern mountainous district. In A.D. 201 the Caledonians joined the revolt of the Meatae. Severus conducted a campaign against them about A.D. 208; but they again revolted a year or two afterwards. In the fourth century, and subsequently, the name is used as equivalent to the whole of Northern Britain—modern Scotland, as distinguished from England and Ireland.

Calendar, THE REFORMATION OF THE (1751), was in great part due to the efforts of Lord Chesterfield. The "Old Style," which was now eleven days in error, had long since been abandoned by most civilized nations. Great Britain, however, with Russia and Sweden, still clung to the antiquated system. "It was not," wrote Chesterfield, "very honourable for England to remain in a gross and avowed error, especially in such company." Accordingly, having paved the way to his measure by some letters to the World, Chesterfield drew up the scheme in concert with Lord Macclesfield and Bradley the astronomer-royal. The bill successfully passed both Houses of parliament. It ordained that the year 1752 should begin on January 1, instead of March 7, and that the 3rd of the month of September should be called the 14th, so as to correct the eleven days' error. Further, such changes should be introduced as would make the solar year and the lunar year coincide. In the matter of payments, it was enacted that these should not be altered, and that April 5, July 5, October 10, and January 5 should still continue to be the days on which the dividends of the public funds became due. This change met with a good deal of ignorant opposition. The common opposition election cry was, "Give us back our eleven days." The reform of the calendar has since been discussed by a committee set up by the League of Nations. The committee reported in 1926.

Calvert, GEORGE, 1ST LORD BALTIMORE, (1580-1632), was secretary of state to James I, but was compelled to resign his office in 1624, in consequence of having become a Roman Catholic. He had always taken a great interest in colonization, and obtained in the year of his death the charter of Maryland from Charles I. An expedition was sent out in 1633 under the patronage of Cecil Calvert, 2nd Lord Baltimore (who died in 1676), and the colony of Maryland was successfully planted. The capital was named Baltimore in honour of its patron.

Cambrai, BATTLE OF (November–December 1917), was one of the most important battles in the Great War. It originated in a British determination to attempt a surprise tank attack on the Cambrai section of the western front in preference to an infantry attack handicapped in advance by a devastating artillery bombardment, and in a general allied desire to prevent the withdrawal of German troops from France to the Italian front. This plan was entirely new; but it suffered in execution from lack of reserve forces, and by reason of its being extended over too wide a front. The attack was entrusted to General Byng (q.v.), and involved the 3rd and 4th Army Corps, numbering six divisions, with 381 fighting tanks. Its immediate object was to break the Hindenburg Line and seize Cambrai. The offensive opened on November 20, in a tank advance across the front enemy trenches followed by an infantry attack. But though great progress was made in the first onslaught the tank attack had exhausted itself before the expected result had been achieved, and the expiration of the forty-eight hours' time-limit left Bournon Hill still untaken. Two days later (November 22) the German army under von der Marwitz made a successful counter-attack masked by gas and smoke shells, forcing the British to evacuate completely the Masnières-Bournon salient by December 4. The greatest historical value of the battle is that its mistaken aim provided a lesson which was acted on with success in the allied offensive of the following year.

Cambridge was the site of a Roman station, to which the name Camboritum has been conjecturally attached. After the Anglo-Saxon conquest the name of the town appears as Grantebyrge or Grantabridge. The present form is probably derived from the great bridge over the Cam (Cante-brig). In 1267 it was fortified by Henry III, and afterwards taken by the barons. In 1381 it was attacked by the insurgents, and many of the colleges were pillaged and their charters burned. During the Civil War it was occupied by the Parliamentarians. The town returned two members from Edward I's time till the Redistribution Act of 1885 reduced the number to one.

Cambridge, GEORGE WILLIAM FREDERICK CHARLES, DUKE OF (1819–1904), son of Adolphus Frederick, youngest son of George III, was born at Hanover. He became a colonel in the British army, 1837; a major-general in 1845; and a lieutenant-general in 1854. He was present at the battles of the Alma and Inkerman, as commander of the two brigades of Guards and Highlanders. In 1856 he was appointed commander-in-chief—a position which he filled until 1895—and in 1862 he was advanced to the rank of field-marshal.

Biography by W. Verner and E. D. Parker, 1905.

Cambridge, RICHARD PLANTAGENET, EARL OF (d. 1415), was the second son of Edmund of Langley, Duke of York. He was created Earl of Cambridge by Henry V, but in 1415 was concerned in the conspiracy with Lord Scrope of Masham and others, to dethrone Henry and place the Earl of March on the throne. On the discovery of the plot Cambridge was beheaded. He married, first, Anne Mortimer, sister of the Earl of March, through whom the claims of the house of Mortimer were transferred to the family of York; and, secondly, Maud, daughter of Thomas, Lord Clifford.

Cambuskenneth, THE BATTLE OF. [STIRLING, BATTLE OF.]

Camden, THE BATTLE OF (August 16, 1780), fought during the American War of Independence, arose out of an attempt made by the Americans to save the Carolina provinces from falling into British hands. In the early part of the summer, Washington dispatched von Kalb with 3,000 men to join Gates in the south; and Virginia sent out a large body of militia. The centre of the British force, which was widely extended over South Carolina, lay at Camden, but Cornwallis, on hearing of Gates's advance, concentrated a large body on that place. A skirmish at daybreak of August 16 between the vanguards of the two armies soon developed into a general battle. The British were outnumbered, but a great part of the American force was raw and undisciplined, the steady attack of the regulars was irresistible, and the flight soon became a hopeless rout. The American losses were very heavy both in men and stores. Among the former was von Kalb himself. The victory was the most decisive advantage gained by the British during the war; it placed South Carolina and Georgia almost entirely in their power. [CORNWALLIS.]

Camden, WILLIAM (1551-1623), one of the most celebrated of English antiquaries, was born in London and educated at St. Paul's School and at Oxford. In 1575 he became an usher at Westminster School, and in 1589 received a prebend at Salisbury Cathedral. In 1593 he became headmaster of Westminster, and in 1597 Clarenceux king-of-arms. In 1607 he was commissioned by James I to translate into Latin the account of the trial of the Gunpowder Plot conspirators. In 1622 he founded his professorship of history at Oxford, and died at Chislehurst the next year. Camden's most celebrated work is the "Britannia sive Florentissimorum Regnorum Angliæ, Scotiæ, Hiberniæ, et Insularum Adjacentium, ex Intima Antiquitate Chorographica Descriptio," which first appeared in 1586, and had gone through a fourth edition by 1594. A new and enlarged edition was published in 1607. It is an interesting work, and the care and learning shown in its compilation still make it of great value to scholars. Though many of Camden's antiquarian theories have been dispelled by later research, his work is important as a great storehouse of facts. He also wrote an English antiquarian work of less elaborate character, called "Remaines Concerning Britain," 1605, which has been frequently reprinted. In 1615 he published the first part of his "Annales Rerum Anglicarum Regnante Elizabetha," the second part of which did not appear till after the author's death. It is not a work of special value.

The "Britannia" was translated into English by P. Holland, 1610; and by Bishop Gibson in 1695, which translation was reprinted in 1722 and enlarged in 1753 and 1772. An enlarged translation was published by Gough in 3 vols., 1789. An edition of Camden's "Works" in 6 vols. was published in 1870.

Cameron, SIR EWEN, OF LOCHIEL (1629-1719), "a gracious master, a trusty ally, a terrible enemy," was one of the staunchest adherents of James II in the campaign of 1689. He was in command of the Camerons at Killiecrankie (q.v.), but after the death of Claverhouse he refused to serve under his successor, Cannon, the Irish commander, and retired to Lochaber. In 1692 he took the oaths to William III with the other Highland chiefs.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Cameron, RICHARD (d. July 20, 1680), the founder of the Camerons, was born at Falkland, in Fife, the son of a village tradesman. He entered the ministry and distinguished himself by his violent opposition to the restoration of Episcopacy. In 1677 he fled to Holland, and on his return (1680) he joined his few supporters in issuing the Sanquhar Declaration (q.v.), by which he and his followers practically declared themselves rebels, and announced their intention of offering armed resistance to the government. He was killed in the skirmish of Aird's Moss (q.v.).

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Cameronians, THE, took their name from Richard Cameron, the author of the Sanquhar Declaration. They were sometimes called "Covenanters," from their rigid adherence to the Solemn League and Covenant, and afterwards "McMillanites" (from the name of their first minister after the Revolution) and "Mountain Men." Their creed considered as enemies to righteousness Romanists, Episcopalians, and more especially those moderate Presbyterians who had accepted the Indulgence of Charles II. Besides holding the binding obligation of the Covenant on the three kingdoms, they maintained the Westminster Confession and the Scriptures as the absolute rule of faith and conduct. The sect was not extinguished by the defeat of Aird's Moss, and the death of their leader. They issued a defiance to the royal authority, October 28, 1684, and in return were proscribed and hunted by the royal troops. The Cameronians were most numerous in the wilder parts of south-western Scotland, where, on the accession of William III, their warlike temperament was utilized by the formation of the Cameronian Regiment. The Revolution secured for Scotland a Presbyterian church government; but many of the extreme Cameronians refused to swear allegiance to William III, or to attend the established places of worship. These covenanting non-jurors became the "Reformed Presbyterians," or the "Old Presbyterian Dissenters," and formed a presbytery and subsequently a synod in 1743. They founded numerous churches in England, Ireland, and America.

Cameroons. [WEST AFRICA, BRITISH DOMINIONS IN.]

Campbell, THE FAMILY OF, is, according to tradition, descended in the female line from the ancient kings or chiefs of Argyll, and from one of these, a certain Diarmid, the clan is supposed to derive its name of Scol Diarmid, by which it was known in Erse and Gaelic. In the reign of Malcolm Canmore the name was changed to Campbell by the marriage of the heiress of the house with a person of that name. A Sir Colin Campbell, Lord of Lochow, was among the Scottish knights and barons summoned to the Council of Berwick in 1291. His son, Sir Neil Campbell, was a strong supporter of Robert Bruce, whose sister he married. His son, Sir Colin, received large grants of land in Argyllshire from King Robert and his successor. His grandson, Duncan, was made justiciar of Argyll by James I and raised to the peerage as Lord Campbell (1445). The grandson of this peer, Colin, was made Earl of Argyll in 1457. Archibald, the 8th earl, was created Marquis of Argyll in 1641; but was executed and his honours forfeited in 1661. The earldom was restored to his son, Archibald, the 9th earl, in 1663, who was beheaded in 1685. His son, Archibald, was restored under William III, and created Duke of Argyll in 1701. [ARGYLL, PEERAGE OF.]

Campbell, ARCHIBALD, 5TH EARL OF ARGYLL (d. 1573), although a member of the Congregation, attached himself to the side of the regent, Mary of Guise, and was of great service to her in averting a collision between the Reformers and the French troops in 1559. He was said to have formed a plot to carry off Mary, Queen of Scots, almost on the eve of her marriage with Darnley; and he acted as president at the mock trial of Bothwell for Darnley's murder, in 1567. On the abdication of the queen he was appointed one of the Commission of Regency during Moray's absence, but on her escape, 1568, joined her party, and commanded her troops at the battle of Langside. A year or two later, however, he submitted to the government of Morton and obtained an indemnity.

Campbell, ARCHIBALD, 8TH EARL and also MARQUIS OF ARGYLL (1598–1661), succeeded his father in 1638, and at once joined the Covenanters, whose forces he commanded when they were defeated by Montrose at Inverlochy and Kilsyth. His cruelties towards the Royalists in 1640–1 earned him the bitter hatred of all his opponents, and in 1641 a plot to murder him, known as the "Incident" (q.v.) was formed. The same year he was created a marquis, and in 1651 supported the cause of Charles II, whom he crowned at Scone. Immediately afterwards, however, the marquis was taken prisoner at Worcester, and was supposed to have entered into close relations with Cromwell. In Richard Cromwell's parliament of 1659 he represented Aberdeenshire. As a consequence, he was impeached for high treason immediately after the Restoration. He was executed at Edinburgh, suffering as much for his great power, which was an object of dread to Charles II, as for his treason.

Campbell, ARCHIBALD, 9TH EARL OF ARGYLL (d. 1685), was the son of the preceding. He was restored to his estates and earldom in 1663, which had been forfeited by his father's treason, and joined the Royalist party in Scotland. On the passing of the Scottish Test Act, in 1681, Argyll refused to take the required oath, except with a reservation, stating that he did not thereby debar himself from attempting any amendment in Church or State. For this he was brought to trial, and being found guilty of "leasing-making," was sentenced to death. He managed, however, to escape to Holland, where he remained till 1685, when he joined Monmouth in his attempt to dethrone James. But there seems to have been no sympathy between the two, and Argyll was suspected and distrusted by the English. Argyll landed in Scotland in May 1685, but found himself joined by very few followers except his own clansmen. Divisions were rife in his councils, and after an abortive march on Glasgow, his followers dispersed without striking a blow, and he himself was captured in the disguise of a carter, taken to Edinburgh, and executed on his former sentence of death.

Campbell, SIR COLIN, LORD CLYDE (1792–1863), entered the army at an early age, and first saw service in the Peninsular War. He received his lieutenant-colonelcy in 1832, and in the Chinese War in 1842 went out in command of his regiment, the 98th. In the Sikh War of 1848–9 he obtained considerable distinction, was wounded at Chilianwalla, and largely contributed to the victory of Gujarat. In the Crimean War he was in command of the Highland Brigade, and greatly distinguished himself at the Alma, after which battle he received the personal thanks of Lord Raglan. On the morning of the battle of Balaclava, the Highland Brigade, under Campbell, was entrusted with the defence of the British landing-place, and the repulse of a squadron of Russian cavalry was one of the results of the day's fighting. In July 1857 Campbell was ordered to India to assume command against the mutineers. Leaving England at twenty-four hours' notice, he arrived at Calcutta in August, and hastily collecting what troops he could, he marched on Lucknow, the relief of which city was effected with consummate skill and generalship. One after another the rebel strongholds were reduced, and Sir Colin's talents as a commander-in-chief were hardly more conspicuous than his tact and temper in the difficult position in which he was placed. On the complete suppression of the Mutiny Campbell was raised to the peerage, and received the thanks of both Houses of parliament, with a pension of £2,000 a year. He was created a field-marshal shortly before his death.

Campbell, GEORGE DOUGLAS, 8TH DUKE OF ARGYLL (1823–1900), was, as Marquis of Lorne, prominent in the controversy in the Presbyterian Church of Scotland relating to patronage. In 1852 he accepted office under Lord Aberdeen as lord privy seal, and retained the same office under Lord Palmerston. He was lord privy seal again under Lord Palmerston in 1859, postmaster-general in 1860, and secretary of state for India in Gladstone's cabinet from 1863 to 1874. He joined Gladstone's second administration (1880) as lord privy seal, but retired owing to a difference of opinion with his colleagues on their Irish policy.

Campbell, JOHN, MARQUIS OF LORNE, 2ND DUKE OF ARGYLL, AND DUKE OF GREENWICH (d. 1743), as Lord Lorne, was made commander of a regiment of foot by William III. In 1703 he succeeded to his father's honours and estates, and was sworn of Anne's privy council. In 1705 he was appointed lord high commissioner to the Scottish parliament, in which he zealously advocated the Union. For these services he was created a peer of England and Earl of Greenwich. In 1706 he fought under Marlborough at Ramillies, and commanded in the attack on Menin. He returned to Scotland, where he supported the efforts of the commission for the Union. He fought at Oudenarde and Malplaquet; but was at enmity with Marlborough, his commander-in-chief. At this time he was closely connected with the Tories, and was appointed to the command in Catalonia in 1710. The army was demoralized by the defeat at Almanza, and he could obtain no supplies. He returned to England, and was made commander-in-chief of the land forces in Scotland. He was soon at variance with the ministry; and opposed, in the Upper House, a motion to the effect that the Protestant succession was in danger. As Queen Anne lay dying, Argyll entered the council with the Duke of Somerset, and proposed that the queen should be requested to make the Duke of Shrewsbury lord treasurer. It was done; and it was owing to this vigorous action that Bolingbroke's plans at once fell to the ground. On the accession of George I Argyll was continued in his employments, and on the outbreak of Mar's rebellion, in 1715, Argyll, as commander-in-chief in Scotland, met the rebels at Sheriffmuir, where Mar was defeated. But the conduct of Argyll caused it to be suspected that he was unwilling to drive the Jacobites to extremities. Cadogan was sent to reinforce him. As soon as the duke marched forward, the Jacobites retreated before him; the Pretender fled to France, and the rebellion was crushed. In recognition of his services during the rebellion he was raised to the dignity of Duke of Greenwich (1719). Argyll was a follower of Walpole during the greater part of his long ministry, but in 1739 he distinctly joined the opposition. Walpole, wishing to preserve so powerful a support, kept him in his places, but at length was compelled to dismiss him. On the resignation of Walpole, Argyll was again placed in office; but he was dissatisfied with the arrangement of the ministry, and resigned. Towards the end of his career, he intrigued with the Jacobites. It was only after Sir John Hinde Cotton, a noted Jacobite, had been placed on the board of the admiralty, that the duke condescended to join Pelham's administration. He was a brave soldier and an able orator; but his political career was a series of inconsistencies.

the ducal house of Argyll, was the son of Dr. George Campbell, minister of Cupar. He was educated at the Grammar School at Cupar, and at the University of St. Andrews, and was called to the bar of Lincoln's Inn in 1806. In 1827 he obtained a silk gown, and in 1830-1 he represented Stafford in the House of Commons. In 1832 he was made solicitor-general, and in February 1834 was appointed attorney-general. During his period of office he inaugurated several important law reforms, among which were the act called Lord Campbell's Act for the amendment of the law of libel as it affects newspapers [PRESS, FREEDOM OF THE], and an act limiting the power of arrest in cases of disputed debt. In June 1841 he was raised to the peerage and received the Irish chancellorship, but only for a short time. In 1846 Lord Campbell joined the Whig cabinet as chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. In 1850 he became lord chief justice, and held that office till he was appointed lord chancellor of Great Britain by Lord Palmerston in 1859. Lord Campbell published, in 1845-7, "The Lives of the Lord Chancellors and Keepers of the Great Seal of England," in seven volumes. He also wrote "Lives of the Chief Justices." On the morning of June 23, 1861, he was found dead in his chair.

Campbell-Bannerman, SIR HENRY, G.C.B. (1836-1908), educated at Glasgow University and at Trinity College, Cambridge, entered the House of Commons in 1868, and was financial secretary to the war office, 1871-4 and 1880-2. In 1882 he was appointed secretary to the admiralty; in 1884 chief secretary for Ireland; and in 1886, and again in 1892, war secretary. In 1898 he led the Liberal opposition in succession to Sir William Harcourt, and in 1905, on the resignation of Mr. Balfour, became prime minister. At the general election in 1906 the Liberals obtained a striking victory, and Sir Henry was premier until he resigned a short time previous to his death.

Biography by T. P. O'Connor, 1908.

Camperdown, THE BATTLE OF (October 11, 1797), was fought between the British and the Dutch. In the autumn of 1797 a great Dutch fleet was prepared to co-operate with the French in the invasion of Ireland. On October 6 the Dutch, under De Winter, weighed from the Texel. Admiral Duncan, who had been lying in Yarmouth Roads, crossed the North Sea, and came in sight of the Dutch on the morning of October 11, nine miles from the coast, near Camperdown. At half-past eleven Duncan made the signal for the fleet to engage, and at twelve o'clock determined to pass through the enemy's line in two divisions and engage to leeward. But the weather was so hazy that the signal was not seen by many of the ships, which accordingly engaged in close action as each captain saw an opportunity. The two flag-ships passed through the line followed by a few leading ships, while the others, for the most part, engaged the enemy to windward. The action was fought with the desperate stubbornness which had always been so marked a characteristic of the two nations. De Winter in the Vrigheid, assailed by the British admiral's ship and two others, after a desperate contest, surrendered, when his ship was totally dismasted and had scarcely enough men left to work the guns. One after another the Dutch ships followed his example, and it only remained for the British to secure the prizes before night set in. Nine of the Dutch vessels, with over 6,000 prisoners, were taken. Duncan's victory broke the right wing of the threatened invasion, and reasserted the naval supremacy of Britain.

Camperdown, 1ST VISCOUNT (1731-1804). [DUNCAN, ADAM.]

Campion, EDMUND (1540-81), was born in London and educated at Oxford, where he became a fellow of St. John's College; but, already a Catholic at heart, he betook himself in 1569 to Ireland, to await the re-opening of the University of Dublin. Threatened with arrest he returned to England in time to witness the martyrdom of Dr. Storey. This inspired him to an open repudiation of Protestantism, and in 1571 he went to Cardinal Allen's college at Douai, where he became noted for his learning and virtues. In 1573 he entered the Society of Jesus. His affability and high moral character made him an invaluable asset to the Jesuits, and in June 1580 he undertook a "missionary journey" to England, in company with Robert Parsons. Their zeal and success were such as to cause the parliament of 1581 to pass the harsh statute against anyone harbouring a Jesuit, and active measures were taken for the apprehension of the two missionaries. In July 1581 Campion was taken at Lyford, in Berkshire, and sent to the Tower, where he was tortured in order to extort from him the names of Catholics who had given him shelter. He was then indicted for compassing and imagining the queen's death, and, after what appears to have been a grossly unfair trial, was executed at Tyburn, December 1581.

Camulodunum a town of Celtic and Roman Britain, is now generally allowed to be identical with the modern Colchester. It became the capital of the Trinobantes under Cunobelinus or Cymbeline (q.v.). In 44 it was taken by Aulus Plautius, and later was made a Roman colony. In 60 Boudicca and the Iceni captured and burnt the city and defeated Petillius Cerialis and the ninth legion, but shortly afterwards Suetonius Paulinus retrieved by a complete victory the honour of Rome.

Canada, THE DOMINION OF, was founded in 1867 by the federation of the four provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, to which five provinces have since been added, Manitoba in 1870, British Columbia in 1871, Prince Edward Island in 1873, and Saskatchewan and Alberta both in 1905, while five administrative districts have been formed in the extreme north. The history of Canada is one of growth from small settlements in the east, a migration after new sources of wealth by the hardy races of colonists. There are several well-marked phases of that history. Until 1603 it was one of coastal discovery; then followed a period of French settlements and exploration until the beginning, in 1670, of serious British rivalry. By 1763 Canada was all British. Tenure was precarious until 1815; from 1815 to 1867 saw the growth and development of political feeling and forms, culminating in the creation of the Dominion. Since then it has been the history of a continued development and prosperity. Canada's status, recognized at the Imperial Conference of 1917, was emphasized by her joining the League of Nations and signing the Peace of Versailles, and is defined by the report of the conference of 1926 as one of complete autonomy.

Leif Eric in about the year 1000 is said to have touched the coast, but it was not until 1497 that Cabot made known to the western nations the existence of the island of Newfoundland with the mainland behind it. At first it was used only as the rendezvous of British west-country, Breton, Basque, and Portuguese fishermen, whose rude rule of the sea was the only form of government. In 1534 Jacques Cartier of St. Malo sailed up the Gulf of St. Lawrence, where in 1541 a small settlement was made and abandoned. Verrazano had in 1524 explored and claimed for France the coast of North America from Cape Hatteras to Nova Scotia, but, with the solitary exception of Roberval's settlement in 1541, New France remained unoccupied until the advent of Samuel Champlain. From 1603 until his death in 1635 Champlain worked to occupy the new lands for France. Quebec was founded (1608), and the Huron and Ontario were reached in an attempt to find a way to China. British rivalry, however, followed Hudson's discoveries in 1609 and 1610, and Argall from Virginia destroyed Port Royal, Acadia was granted to Alexander (1621), and Kirke captured Quebec in 1629. Meanwhile the Company of a Hundred Associates, founded by Richelieu in 1627, developed French fishing and the fur trade, and encouraged missionaries, whose intrepidity opened up vast tracts to the white man. Canada was restored to France by the Treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye (1632) by England, who, however, recaptured Acadia in 1645. In 1663 the company was dissolved and Canada reverted to the French Crown to become a royal province. The Company of the West Indies was organized in 1664, but failed to supply New France with sufficient immigrants. Its charter was revoked in 1674. In 1666 La Salle was sent to New France, Acadia was restored by the Treaty of Breda (1667), and the French pushed on to explore the great west. La Salle discovered the Ohio and proclaimed as French the hinterland of the Mississippi—a vast Louisiana—in 1682.

In 1670 Anglo-French rivalry was accentuated by the foundation of the British Hudson's Bay Company (q.v.). The rival factors fought, rival fleets destroyed the factories, and the Indians were induced to participate. The Treaty of Whitehall (1686) provided for a discussion of claims on a basis of neutrality which was immediately violated. British invasions from the American colonies were met by the French claim to the interior, and the strategic line of enveloping forts, the obvious nature of which later precipitated the war which settled the fate of Canada. The first phase of this rivalry was ended by the Peace of Ryswick (1697), which closed the War of the Grand Alliance in Europe and provided for mutual restoration of territories in Canada. The second phase finished with the Treaty of Utrecht (1713), which ended the War of the Spanish Succession, and by which Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Hudson Bay and Straits were ceded to England, France retaining the St. Lawrence shores and Cape Breton Island and fishing rights of Newfoundland. The Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) closed the third phase by restoring to France Cape Breton Island in return for Madras captured by France in the War of the Austrian Succession. Unofficial war, however, continued, and Virginians fought to prevent the French from shutting them off from the west. The Seven Years' War broke out in Europe in 1756, and a systematic attempt was made by Britain to settle the quarrel in America by crushing the French. Quebec was captured in 1759, and the final conquest of Canada was completed the following year. By the Peace of Paris (1763) all New France was ceded to Great Britain, although France retained her rights west of the Mississippi and to fishing off Newfoundland.

From 1763 to 1867 the history of Canada is the record of Britain's attempt to govern a country of scattered settlements of rival cultures, each with a growing desire to govern themselves. Government under proclamation from 1763 to 1774 ensured religious freedom to the French "habitants." The Quebec Act (1774) defined the boundaries of the colony and confirmed the privileges to the Roman Catholics, but government was still a British despotism. In spite of this, however, the invitation to join the revolted American colonists was refused, and the American invasion repulsed by Governor Carleton. The Peace of Versailles (1783) was followed by a large influx of United Empire Loyalists who settled in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and what later became Upper Canada. The self-governing energetic American settler, intensely loyal to the Crown and jealous of his own rights as a citizen, was entirely different from the French settler educated by an exacting priesthood and living under an accepted feudalism. This was recognized in the Constitutional Act of 1791 by the separation of Upper from Lower Canada and by the grant of a certain measure of representative government. War with America broke out again in 1812, but from the Peace of Ghent in 1814 British tenure in Canada has not been challenged. A period of internal political dissension followed, marked by a number of constitutional expedients. In 1791 separate governors, councils, and assemblies had been created for Lower and Upper Canada, but in both friction developed, until by the eighteen-thirties a deadlock was the normal. In Lower Canada British immigration had introduced an alien element, and neither race would be ruled by the other. This culminated in the 1837 rebellion of the Frenchman Papineau. In Upper Canada the Loyalist immigrants formed a close governmental corporation from which other British colonists struggled to obtain political power in vain. In both provinces the assembly struggled to obtain financial control. In 1838 the Canadian constitutions were suspended and Lord Durham appointed high commissioner to report on the state of affairs and to suggest solutions. He reported that he found not a struggle of principle, but "two nations warring within the bosom of a single state." He advocated unification coupled with self-government and a deliberate policy of anglicization. In 1840 the Act of Union was passed; a nominated council and an elected assembly with equal representation to each of the two Canadas were granted with a view to a gradual assumption of self-government, which was recognized in 1842. In 1848 the Maritime Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were granted self-government, and in 1851 Prince Edward Island. In 1886 the legislative council was made elective.

Internal dissension, provincial rivalries, and the need of co-operation for development, expansion westward and competition with the United States, led ultimately to a more complete union. This solution was advocated in 1791, when Dorchester had forwarded the Loyalist Smith's proposal to the colonial secretary, and again in 1841 by G. Brown. In 1864 the Nova Scotia legislature had passed a resolution in favour of union or confederation of the British provinces, and in 1858 Galt of Lower Canada carried the Union policy into the Cartier-Macdonald cabinet. In 1864 a conference, under the lead of Tupper, held at Charlottetown to discuss the union of the three Maritime Provinces, was enlarged to include representatives of Canada and removed to Quebec, where seventy-two resolutions were passed as a basis of discussion on the terms of union, a Canadian parliamentary committee under the chairmanship of Brown having reported in 1861 in favour of federation. Brown visited England and gained imperial approval; the proposal was debated in the Canadian parliament and ultimately carried by three to one. In the end Macdonald and the convention representatives discussed the scheme in detail with the British cabinet in London. The plan was embodied in the British North America Act of 1867, confederating Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick. Newfoundland stood out in 1865, refused again in 1868, and apparently declined for ever to join in 1893, when her own terms were rejected by Canada. Prince Edward Island did not join until 1873, though British Columbia had done so in 1871.

The rest of Canadian history is one of consolidation and expansion. In 1869 the Hudson Bay Territory was bought by Canada, and the consequent Red River revolt crushed. In 1878 by an imperial order in council all British North America was annexed to Canada, save Newfoundland. The Inter-Colonial Railway was opened in 1876, and the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1886. A rebellion in the north-west was crushed in 1885, and the Alaska settlement in 1903 ended the boundary questions with the United States, leaving outstanding only the dispute with Newfoundland over Labrador, which was decided in 1927 in her favour by the Judicial Committee of the privy council. The Canadian constitution is an amalgamation of the British and American systems, representation being proportional to population in the Lower House and being according to states in the Upper.

The Canadian Senate was to consist of 72 members, 24 were from the three provinces of Quebec, Ontario, and the Maritime Provinces jointly, sitting for life, nominated by the governor-general, on an age (thirty years) and property ($4,000) qualification. The House of Commons was to consist of 181 (65 from Quebec, 82 from Ontario, 19 from Nova Scotia, and 15 from New Brunswick), elected for five years by the electors qualified to vote for provincial assemblies, on the same qualifications as for senators. The Senate could amend finance bills, while the governor-general could reserve bills for his majesty's consent, and even the governor-general's consent could be revoked within two years by the home government. Resting on an imperial act, only a similar act can amend the constitution; while in the case of a clash between the Houses additional senators can be created. Members of both Houses receive $4,000 a session. The Senate now consists of 96, 6 each having been added for British Columbia, Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, while the 24 for the Maritime Provinces are elected, 10 each by Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the remaining 4 by Prince Edward Island. The House of Commons now consists of 245 (82 for Ontario, 65 for Quebec, 14 for Nova Scotia, 11 for New Brunswick, 17 for Manitoba, 14 for British Columbia, 4 for Prince Edward Island, 16 for Alberta, 21 for Saskatchewan, and 1 for Yukon. No property qualification is now necessary, and women have voted on an equality with men since 1921. Education is a provincial matter. The executive is vested in the governor-general and a privy council, which, by the custom of the constitution, is identical with the cabinet formed by the leader of the party having a majority in the Lower House. The various provinces are administered by lieutenant-governors, appointed by the governor-general, and have separate chambers of legislature. The Province of Canada proper in the Dominion of Canada consists of the two districts of Ontario and Quebec, each having a provincial government, vested, in the case of Ontario, in a lieutenant-governor, an executive council of 11, which is the ministry, and a legislative assembly of 111 members elected for four years; in the case of Quebec, in a lieutenant-governor, a legislative council of 21, and a legislative assembly of 86 members. Nova Scotia has a legislative council of 21 and an assembly of 43, which acts also for Cape Breton Island; New Brunswick a council of 8, and an assembly of 48; Manitoba a council of 6 and an assembly of 55; British Columbia a council of 7 and an assembly of 48; Prince Edward Island a council of 9 and an assembly of 30; Alberta of 8 and 60; Saskatchewan of 7 and 66; Yukon is governed by a gold commissioner and an elected council of 3. A Supreme Court of Appeal for the Dominion was established in 1875, but in virtue of the royal prerogative the judicial committee of the privy council can consent to hear appeals from its decisions. A direct appeal to that committee may also be made from the inferior Dominion and the provincial courts under certain conditions. The legal system in the older provinces is somewhat complicated, and in Quebec the old laws and customs of French Canada, founded on the jurisprudence of the Parliament of Paris, the edicts of the French kings, and the Civil Law, are still recognized by the courts for certain purposes. The area of the Dominion of Canada is about 3,700,000 square miles, and its population, which is increasing fast, is nearly nine millions, of whom two and a half millions are of French descent.

Canberra, the federal capital of Australia, and the seat of the central government, situated about 200 miles from Sydney and 429 from Melbourne, began its official life on May 9, 1927.

Canning, CHARLES JOHN, EARL (1812-1862), third son of George Canning, was born at Gloucester Lodge, Kensington. He was educated at Eton and Christ Church. In 1836 he was returned for Warwick, and remained a member of the House of Commons for six weeks. On the death of his mother, Viscountess Canning, in 1837, he succeeded to the title in consequence of the deaths of his two elder brothers. In 1841 he took office under Sir Robert Peel, as under-secretary for foreign affairs. In 1846 he became chief commissioner of woods and forests, and began to take a larger share in the business of the House. In 1848 he supported the Jewish Disabilities Bill; in 1850 he supported Lord Derby's resolution condemning Palmerston's foreign policy, and spoke against Lord John Russell's Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. In 1851 Derby offered him the foreign office, but he refused, feeling himself really a Liberal. In 1852 the coalition ministry of Lord Aberdeen came into office, and Canning became postmaster-general. This office he continued to hold under Palmerston. In 1855 he was appointed governor-general of India, in which capacity he had the task of quelling the Mutiny (q.v.). In 1858, on the termination of the Mutiny, he ordered the confiscation of all Oudh, though this was repudiated by the board of control. In the same year he issued the proclamation providing for the sole dominion of the Crown, and putting an end to the rule of the East India Company. The rest of Canning's administration was chiefly remarkable for the judicial reforms in 1860-1, the completion of many railways and canals, and the famine in the North-west Provinces, 1860-1. He died in June 1862, soon after his return to England.

Biography by Sir H. S. Cunningham, 1890.

Canning, GEORGE (1770-1827), was born in London, the son of a poor barrister. His mother, left in needy circumstances, went upon the stage, and afterwards married an actor. George was sent by his uncle, Stratford Canning, a London merchant, the father of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, to Eton, where he had a brilliant career. Whilst at school he founded and contributed largely to a school magazine called The Microcosm. In 1788 he went to Oxford, where he attracted the attention of Pitt, and formed a close friendship with Jenkinson, afterwards Earl of Liverpool, which was of great service to him in later life. He was at this time a Whig, devoted to Fox and Sheridan, and inclined to look favourably on the French Revolution. On leaving Oxford, he at first went to the bar, but in 1794 was induced to enter parliament as member for Newtown, and as a follower of Mr. Pitt. He spoke frequently during his first years in the House of Commons, and always as a supporter of the ministry. In 1796 he became member for Wendover and under-secretary for foreign affairs. In the autumn of 1797 he published, in conjunction with John Hookham Frere, Jenkinson, George Ellis, and Gifford, a satirical paper called The Anti-Jacobin. Some of Canning's contributions have taken a permanent place in literature. In the year 1799 he laboured earnestly with Pitt to effect the union with Ireland, on the basis of giving equal political rights to the Roman Catholics. When this measure failed, owing to the persistent opposition of the king, Canning left the government with his chief. Pitt was succeeded by Addington, who was assailed by Canning with untiring ridicule. "Pitt is to Addington," he said, "as London to Paddington." In 1799 he married the daughter of General John Scott, who brought him a large fortune. In 1804 he returned to office, with Pitt as treasurer of the navy. On the death of Pitt in 1806, Fox came into office, and Canning had to retire. In March 1807 he took office, under the Duke of Portland, as minister for foreign affairs. In this capacity he executed the bold stroke of securing the Danish fleet lest it should fall into the hands of Napoleon (September 1807). He also organized the assistance given by England to Spain against Napoleon, which eventually tended more than anything else to effect the emperor's downfall. He could not agree with Lord Castlereagh, the secretary at war, and after the failure of the disastrous Walcheren expedition, for which Castlereagh had been largely responsible, resigned his office. Castlereagh became aware that Canning had intrigued against him with the Duke of Portland, and challenged him to a duel. They met at Putney, and Canning was wounded in the thigh. Canning's resignation of office was an event which long retarded his advancement. He remained a strong advocate of the emancipation of the Catholics. After the murder of Perceval in May 1812, Canning and Wellesley received the king's commands to form a ministry, but they were unable to come to terms with Grey and Grenville. Lord Liverpool became prime minister instead, and offered Canning the post of foreign secretary, which he refused. In 1814 he went as ambassador to Portugal. Two years later his impatience at being out of office led him to accept the post of president of the board of control in Lord Castlereagh's cabinet. In this ministry he was forced to sanction measures of repression of which he could not approve. He agreed with his colleagues in their dislike of parliamentary reform, but differed from them both with regard to the emancipation of the Catholics and the harsh measures adopted towards the Princess of Wales. During the trial which followed at the accession of George IV, Canning travelled abroad and refused the home office offered him by Liverpool. In November 1820 he came to London, resigned office, and then returned to France. In 1822 the directors of the East India Company appointed him to succeed Lord Hastings as governor-general. He made all preparations for departure, and went down to Liverpool to take leave of his friends, when Lord Castlereagh (the Marquis of Londonderry, and secretary for foreign affairs) suddenly committed suicide. Canning gave up the brilliant prospect of the vicerealty, and succeeded Londonderry. He now showed his resemblance to those British statesmen who, like Chatham and Palmerston, have been able to sympathize with the aspirations of foreign Liberals. He supported constitutional principles against the reactionary efforts of Metternich. He protested against the Congress of Verona, and against the intervention of France in the affairs of Spain. He opposed the policy of the Holy Alliance (q.v.). He was the first to recognize the independence of the Spanish colonies in America, when, as he said, he "called a new world into existence to redress the balance of the old." He protected constitutional government in Portugal, and effected the severance between Portugal and Brazil. He still longed anxiously for the emancipation of the Catholics, but this was temporarily hindered by the agitation of O'Connell, and was not effected until two years after Canning's death. He supported Huskisson in preparing the way for free trade, and laboured to effect the abolition of the slave trade. On the death of Lord Liverpool in February 1827, Canning became prime minister. His last act was to hasten the liberation of Greece by the Treaty of London, July 1827. He died on the following August 8. His death was felt as a shock to the whole of the civilized world, for he was the most prominent opponent of the system of reaction which was endeavouring to stamp out aspirations for liberty wherever they were found.

Canning, STRATFORD, VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE (1786-1880), was a cousin of George Canning. He was born in London, and educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge. His career began with his appointment as a précis-writer at the foreign office under his cousin in 1807. He was present at Copenhagen (1807) as secretary to Merry, and at Constantinople (1808) as secretary to Adair, whose mission was successful in achieving a treaty of peace with the Porte in January 1809. Stratford Canning remained at Constantinople as British minister plenipotentiary pending the arrival of Adair's successor (Adair was transferred to Vienna in 1810). His task—in which he was left without instructions from home—was to destroy French influence at Constantinople, foster British trade in the Levant, and effect a reconciliation between Russia and the Porte. He was successful, and resigned his embassy to Liston just after the conclusion of the Peace of Bukarest (1812). His share in the treaty laid a foundation for British influence in Turkey: it also released the Russian army for service against Napoleon. In 1814 Castlereagh appointed him minister to Switzerland, in which capacity he played a prominent part in the drafting of the Swiss Confederation of 1815. On the death of his wife in 1817 he was recalled and transferred to Washington, where he had to deal with the ill-feeling produced by the British right of search. In 1823 he returned to London. Next year, after a short rest, he went on a special mission to sound the Tsar Alexander I as to a policy of Anglo-Russian co-operation in the Near East. His second mission to Constantinople began in October 1825, and was directed towards achieving the pacification of Greece and a reconciliation between Russia and Turkey. But he could not overcome the obstinacy of Mahmud II, nor the non-pacifist counsels of Prussia and Austria. He became isolated, as the only minister who wished for peace. Thus his influence was not sufficient to secure for the Turks mild terms at Ackerman in October 1826. After the battle of Navarino (October 20, 1827), which arose out of the allied admirals' action under the Treaty of London, Stratford and his French and Russian colleagues were dismissed by the sultan. They re-assembled at Poros in September 1828 to investigate and report on the most satisfactory settlement to be achieved for Greece under the Treaty of London. And here Stratford's Philhellenism and his desire to see Greece safeguarded by a strong natural frontier caused him (against the intentions of the Wellington cabinet) to join his colleagues in offering, by the Poros protocol of December 12, 1828, terms far more comprehensive than Wellington would allow. He was therefore recalled in April 1829 and succeeded by Sir R. Gordon. On his return to England he sat in parliament until 1841, when the second period of his diplomatic career opened, his chief work during the interim being his mission to Constantinople in November 1831 to extend the Greek frontier according to the policy of Palmerston, and his abortive mission to Portugal in 1832 to compose the dispute between Dom Miguel and Dom Pedro. In 1842 he resumed the embassy at Constantinople, where he stayed for the next sixteen years, encouraging the reforms of Sultan Abdul Mejid and improving Anglo-Turkish relations. In 1852 he became Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe while on leave. And on his return to his post he was met by the crisis which terminated in the Crimean War. His influence preserved a moderate tone in the Turkish replies to Menshikov's demands, and it was on his advice that the Porte rejected the Russian ultimatum and entered the war (July 2, 1853) in circumstances which reflect on Stratford the credit of having placed Russia in a morally unjustifiable position. At the close of the war he returned to England, and spent the remaining years of his life in retirement. His periodical essays on eastern politics were published as "The Eastern Question" in 1881.

His policy throughout his career in the East had been to preserve the integrity of Turkey with a view to restraining Russian ambition, and in order also to ameliorate the lot of the subject-populations in Turkey. He did not believe, however, that the Ottoman Empire could be preserved for long. Accordingly he welcomed the formation of Christian states throughout the Balkans capable of sustaining the Ottoman inheritance.

Canon Law. [ECCLESIASTICAL JURISDICTION.]

Cantelupe, ST. THOMAS DE (d. 1282), the nephew of Walter de Cantelupe, was a man greatly respected for his piety and learning. In 1265 he was appointed chancellor by Simon de Montfort, but relinquished the office in the same year, after the battle of Evesham. He is remarkable as being the last Englishman to be canonized before the Reformation.

Cantelupe, WALTER DE (d. 1266), was the son of William de Cantelupe, one of John's constant supporters. In 1231 he was appointed an itinerant justice. In 1236 he became Bishop of Worcester, when he boldly resisted the exactions of the pope and the king. He supported Simon de Montfort in the Barons' War, and was one of the twenty-four councillors appointed to watch the execution of the Provisions of Oxford, and he solemnly absolved the barons before the battle of Lewes. For the part he took in the contest he was suspended by Ottoboni and summoned to Rome, but died before he could set out.

Canterbury (KENT) was probably of small importance before the Roman occupation of Britain. By the Romans it was called Durovernum, a Latinized form of its Celtic name, which means the town of the rapid river. The fact that the Saxons called it the burgh of the Kentish men would show that it was the most important place in the province. Under the Anglo-Saxon kings it became the capital of Kent, and owing to this circumstance the first bishopric, and the metropolitan see, of England. The town was ravaged several times by the Danes, and almost destroyed by them in 1011. In 1067 the Danes burnt down the cathedral. It was rebuilt by Lanfranc and Anselm; but partially destroyed (including the choir) in 1174. It was rebuilt by William of Sens immediately afterwards. Important additions were made in the two following centuries, but it was not till 1495 that the great central tower was completed. Its importance was considerably increased after the canonization of Becket, when it became the principal centre of pilgrimage in England. It was at the time of Domesday Book part of the royal demesne, and was governed by a portreeve, as it had been before the Conquest, till the time of John, when two bailiffs were appointed, the right of electing the bailiffs being granted in 1256 by Henry III. A charter was granted by Henry VI., establishing a mayor and commonalty, and Edward IV. extended the jurisdiction of the city, and formed it into a county. James I. confirmed and enlarged these privileges. The city came under the operation of the Municipal Reform Act of 1835. It returned two members under Edward I. and later, but since the act of 1885 has only one.

Cantii, THE, were a British tribe, occupying the extreme south-east of the island of Britain. From them is derived the modern county name of Kent. They were the most important of the peoples of south-eastern England; and from their proximity to Gaul they seem likewise to have been the most civilized of all the native tribes at the time of Cæsar's invasion.

Canton was first visited by the English about 1634. From 1689 to 1834 the East India Company had a monopoly of the trade with that port. In 1841, during the first China War, Canton surrendered to Sir Hugh Gough, and in the following year, by the Treaty of Nanking, foreigners were granted permission to settle in the town. In 1856, after the affair of the Arrow, war was declared between Great Britain and China, and Canton was bombarded. The bombardment led to an exciting debate in the House of Commons (beginning February 26, 1857), in which men of all parties strongly condemned the action of Palmerston's government; and a motion, proposed by Richard Cobden, was carried against the ministry by a majority of 16. Canton was occupied by the British and French in December 1857, and held, under British and French Commissioners, till October 1861. A British consulate was erected in 1865. Canton became prominent during the anti-foreign disturbances in China in 1926. It was involved in the general strike proclaimed in Shanghai in May of that year, and was the scene of bloodshed in June.

Canute (called Cnut in the English of his own day—a word that Pope Paschal II could not pronounce, and therefore Latinized into Canutus), KING (b. c. 995, s. 1017, d. 1035), was the younger son of Sweyn, King of Denmark, and the first foreign conqueror of all England. Of his childhood little is known save that he is said to have been fostered by Thurkil the Tall, whom he later raised to high honours. His connexion with England began in 1013, when, being still a lad in years, he accompanied his father on the great expedition that forced the English to take Sweyn as their king, and drove Ethelred into exile. Young as he was, his father entrusted him with the command of the fleet and the care of the hostages when starting on his southward march from Gainsborough. But a few months later (February 1014) Sweyn ended his days; and the Danish host, with one voice, chose Canute as his successor. By his father's death he became, for a time, a landless viking, a splendid adventurer; for the English at once restored their native king to the throne, and the Danish crown fell to Sweyn's elder son Harold. Caught unprepared by a sudden march of Ethelred, Canute sailed away from Lindsey, cut off the hands, ears, and noses of the hostages, put the wretches ashore at Sandwich, and went off to Denmark. Next year (1015) he was back again at Sandwich with a powerful fleet and army. Coasting round to Poole Bay, he landed his men, and in a few months was master of Wessex. The first days of 1016 saw him in Mercia also. His burnings and ravagings soon compelled submission; at Easter he was getting ready to lay siege to London, the only part of England that still defied his power. But at this moment the death of Ethelred, and the accession of his vigorous son Edmund to the command of the national cause, gave a new turn to the conflict. Inside London, Edmund was chosen king; outside, Canute; and a fierce and chequered struggle between the rivals began. Edmund rallied the men of Wessex to his standard; there were two Danish sieges of London, both unsuccessful; five minor battles, four of which are given as English victories, one as doubtful; and one last great battle, that of Assandun (Ashington in Essex). This was a terrible, seemingly a crushing, overthrow of Edmund. But while the triumph assured Canute a kingdom in England, it failed to tear Wessex from the indomitable Edmund. On some little island in the Severn in the neighbourhood of Deerhurst (probably not, as usually asserted, at Olney), the rivals came together and agreed on a division of land between them, whereby Northumbria and Danish Mercia were assigned to Canute, while Wessex, and apparently also Essex, East Anglia, and English Mercia with the city of London remained with Edmund. This compact had, however, but a brief trial. On St. Andrew's day (November 30) Edmund died, not without suspicion of foul play; and in 1017 Canute was accepted as ruler of the whole kingdom. His first task was to secure himself against possible rivals. He slew Edwy, the one son of Ethelred who was within his reach; and sent the two little sons of Edmund to the court of Boleslav of Poland, there to be made away with; while by the execution of a number of magnates of doubtful loyalty, of whom the traitor Earl Edric of Mercia was one, he deprived the English cause of all effective leadership. Finally, to safeguard himself from the side of Normandy, Canute put away his Danish concubine Elgiva and married Emma, King Ethelred's widow, a lady many years his senior. He then turned to the settlement of the conquered kingdom; and, as a preliminary, levied in 1018 a danegeld of £82,000 with which he paid off the bulk of the Danish host, retaining only forty ships and their crews to constitute a standing bodyguard (huscarls). According to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, one of his earliest acts was to divide England for administrative purposes into four areas, of which he himself retained Wessex, while he bestowed East Anglia upon his foster-father and virtual lieutenant in the work of government—Thurkil the Tall; Northumbria upon his kinsman Eric; and Mercia, after the death of Edric Streona, upon Leofwine. It is clear, however, that Canute did not intend this quadripartite division of the realm to be final or permanent. The early charters of his reign are witnessed by no fewer than eleven earls, of whom the majority are Danes. The traditional view that Canute pursued from the outset a consciously pro-English policy has been challenged by Dr. L. M. Larson, his latest biographer, but it seems evident that, once the subjugation of the realm was complete, he adopted a definitely conciliatory attitude towards his new subjects. In 1018, at an assembly of magnates held at Oxford, it was agreed that Danes and Englishmen alike should be obedient to the laws of Edgar. The goodwill of the English Church was sedulously cultivated. Canute showed special veneration for English saints—particularly for St. Alphege and St. Edmund, the victims of his own countrymen—and was lavish in his gifts to English monasteries. The penalties imposed by his laws on offenders against ecclesiastical law were no less severe than those for secular offences. As his reign progressed the proportion of Saxons to Danes in his household and in the various administrative offices of the kingdom steadily increased. The earldom of Wessex, which Canute in 1017 had reserved for himself, was bestowed as early as 1020 upon the English Godwin, who came in time to enjoy a position analogous to that held by Thurkil at an earlier date. Godwin accompanied the king on many of his northern expeditions, and at home ranked as the first subject in the realm. The great Dane's idea of government is set forth in the letter which he addressed to the English people from Rome in 1027, promising to rule justly and piously and to mete out justice to all with an even hand. It is not merely, however, as King of England, but as the founder of a great Northern Empire, that Canute deserves to be remembered. Harold's death in 1018 gave him Denmark, together with considerable possessions on the Baltic coast; Norway he conquered between 1028 and 1030, and with it he acquired a claim to the lordship of such of its dependencies as Iceland, Greenland, and the Orkneys. Sweden may be reckoned among his vassal kingdoms, and it is probable also that he exercised some sway over the Viking settlements of the Hebrides and Man, and on the Irish coast. Scotland gave him some trouble early in his reign, when Malcolm seized Lothian; but in 1027 Canute invaded Malcolm's territory, and compelled his submission and homage, although confirming him in possession of his earlier conquests. In this great empire, England, in virtue of her superior culture, held the pre-eminent place. English workmen were installed in Denmark to teach Canute's Danish subjects their handicrafts. English bishops were appointed to Canute sees, and a colony of English monks from Evesham was established at Odense; while so great a part was played by English missionaries in the evangelization of Norway that the Norwegian Church has been called "the daughter of the English Church." Among the princes of Europe Canute was held in high esteem; indeed, in his later days his power rivalled that of the Holy Roman Emperor himself. Through his mother he was connected with the ruling house in Poland; through his wife, Emma, and his sister, Edith, who married Duke Robert, he was allied to the ducal house of Normandy. His Baltic territories marched with those of the Emperor Conrad, whose coronation he attended at Rome in 1027, and whose son Henry (afterwards the Emperor Henry III) married the Danish king's daughter Gunhild. With the papacy no less than with the empire Canute was on friendly terms. During his pilgrimage to Rome he came to an understanding with Pope John XIX whereby, in return for the promise of the regular payment of Peter's pence and of all church dues, he secured better conditions for English pilgrims, the exemption of the English school at Rome from tribute, and the reduction of the payment exacted from the English archbishops for the pallium. That his reign was beneficial to England there can be little doubt. He not only gave peace and good government to the disordered realm of Ethelred, but, as master of both the North Sea and the Baltic, he opened up to his English subjects new avenues of trade and new sources of prosperity. Not without reason did the common folk cherish his memory, and enshrine it in legend and folk-lore.

Cape Breton Island lies east of Nova Scotia, with which it is now incorporated.

It was first discovered by Cabot in 1497, but remained practically uninhabited until about 1714, when it was occupied by the French for fishing purposes. The town of Louisburg was built, and the French established a regular settlement on the island, which formed a convenient basis for hostilities against Nova Scotia. In 1744 an attack was made upon Port Royal, the capital of Nova Scotia, by de Quesnay, the governor of Cape Breton; the British, in retaliation, attacked and took Louisburg, and held Cape Breton until the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748. In 1758 Louisburg was again taken by the British under the command of Admiral Boscawen and General Wolfe, and all its fortifications destroyed. By the Treaty of Paris (1763), Cape Breton was made a British colony, and Sydney, its present capital, was founded in 1820. It was incorporated with Nova Scotia (1820), and has ever since that time remained a part of that province. [CANADA, DOMINION OF.]

Capel, ARTHUR, EARL OF ESSEX (1631-1683), son of Arthur, Lord Capel, was created Earl of Essex in 1661, and became a leading member of the Country party in the reign of Charles II. From 1672 to 1677 he was lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and in 1679 he was appointed first commissioner of the treasury, but resigned before the end of the year. In 1683 he was concerned in the Rye House Plot (q.v.), and was arrested and committed to the Tower. But before his trial could come on, he committed suicide. Macaulay characterizes him as "a man of solid, though not brilliant parts, and of grave and melancholy character."

Capital Punishment, the infliction of the penalty of death for crime, by some properly constituted authority, existed in Saxon times in several forms: hanging, drowning, burning, beheading, stoning, etc. By the thirteenth century it had become the usual punishment for all treasons and felonies, with the exception of petty larceny. It was extended to heretics, and to all statutory felonies except those specially exempted. Its decline was due to the influence of the Church and the spread of Roman law; in particular, to the privilege of benefit of clergy (abolished 1827). Later the sentence of transportation for life to the newly-founded American settlements was substituted for the death sentence (Cromwell adopted a policy of transportation in his Irish campaign). The power of the courts to sentence felons to transportation endured until 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 99). The severity of the criminal law was meanwhile assailed by Goldsmith, Bentham, Mackintosh, and others, until the 180 capital offences existing in 1819 were considerably reduced by Peel. To-day there are only four offences punishable by death (exclusive of military and naval offences): high treason (Acts of 1814, 1842, 1889, and Treason Act of 1351), murder (24 & 25 Vict., c. 100, 1861), piracy with violence (Piracy Act, 1837), and destruction of public arsenals and dockyards (Protection Act, 1772). Since 1838 the penalty has in practice been inflicted for murder and treason (see CASEMENT, ROGER) only. And since 1868 the executions have not been public.

Capitulations, treaties granted by a state conferring the privilege of extra-territorial jurisdiction within that state on the subjects of another state, have existed since the time of Haroun al-Raschid, originating in the principle that the sovereignty of a state covered only its own citizens and that citizenship was not to be extended to foreigners. The first capitulations granted in Europe were those of the Ottoman Empire to France in 1535. England obtained capitulations from the sultan in 1583, and shared with France from that date the protection of Europeans in Turkey. The system is in existence in several other countries. At present Great Britain enjoys capitulations in Abyssinia, China, Egypt, Morocco, and Persia; formerly also in Albania (till 1926), Crete and Greece (till 1914), Siam (till 1925), Tripolitana (till 1911), and Turkey (till 1923). The chief privileges secured by them are liberty of residence, freedom of travel, commerce and religion, and immunity from local jurisdiction.

Caradoc (CARATACUS) (d. c. 54) was a son of Cunobelinus, to whose kingdom he succeeded with his brother Togodumnus. It was on the petition of Bericus, their exiled rival, that Claudius dispatched the expedition of 43 to Britain. Togodumnus was defeated and slain by Aulus Plautius, but Caradoc escaped to South Wales. At the head of the Silures of the west, he carried on a struggle of many years against the Romans under Vespasian and Plautius. After sustaining frequent defeats, he was at length driven out of his own district and compelled to take refuge with the Brigantes, whose queen, Cartimandua (q.v.), delivered him up to Ostorius Scapula (A.D. 51 or 52). He was carried in chains to Rome, where his dignity and noble bearing are said to have induced the Emperor Claudius to order his release. His subsequent history is unknown.

Carausius (d. 293), the Menagian, was a native of Flanders or perhaps of Ireland, and commander of the naval squadron stationed at Boulogne for the defence of the Channel against the Saxon pirates. In this capacity he managed to accumulate great wealth, and in 287 crossed to Britain, where he declared himself emperor. His talents enabled him to keep this position and maintain his power in Britain till 293, when he was murdered by his own officer, Allectus (q.v.).

Cardwell, EDWARD, VISCOUNT (1813–1886), was educated at Winchester, and Balliol College, Oxford, where he was elected fellow. He entered parliament in 1842 as member for Clitheroe. He supported Sir Robert Peel in the financial changes of 1845–6. He was secretary to the treasury, 1845–6, and president of the board of trade in Lord Aberdeen's administration. In 1859 he accepted the office of chief secretary for Ireland under Palmerston, and was chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster from 1861 to 1864, when he became secretary of state for the colonies. In 1868 he became secretary for war under Gladstone. In this capacity his name is associated with a very important reform of the British army. The increased demands of India, the striking success of the Prussian army reserve system in the war with Austria (1866) and the Franco-German War (1870–1), combined to suggest the need of an increased army reserve. Cardwell provided this by shortening the term of service to twelve years—six "with the colours," six in the reserve; and "linked" the existing battalions in pairs, assigning to each pair, as a recruiting-ground, some county or district with which they had usually a traditional connexion. A "military centre," or depot, was formed for each such district, and the militia and volunteers also associated with it. It was during his tenure of office (in 1871) that the purchase of commissions, after the House of Lords had refused to abolish it, was done away with by royal warrant. He completed the competitive system in the army. His reforms, which destroyed the historical associations of the old (numbered) regiments, were violently opposed, but have since been fully justified. In 1874 he resigned with his colleagues, and was made a peer.

Carew, GEORGE, EARL OF TOTNES (1555-1629), son of George Carew, Dean of Windsor, served with credit in Ireland during his youth, and was entrusted by Elizabeth with a high command in the expedition to Cadiz (1596). The following year he accompanied Raleigh in his disastrous attempt on the Azores, and on his return was made president of Munster (1600). His government in Ireland was firm, and in 1601 he totally defeated a Spanish force which had landed at Kinsale. Two years later Sir George became governor of Guernsey, and in 1605 was made a peer by James I, being subsequently appointed master of the ordnance. He was created Earl of Totnes by Charles I as a reward for his military services.

Carew, SIR PETER (d. 1575), of Mohun Ottery, in Devonshire, spent his boyhood at the court of France, and on his return to England entered the service of Henry VIII. On the outbreak of the western rebellion, in 1549, Sir Peter and his brother were sent down to Devonshire with orders to crush the insurgents. They were, however, unable to make head against them until the arrival of reinforcements under Lord Russell and Lord Grey; in fact, the violence of the Carew party was said by Somerset to have widely extended the rebellion. After the defeat of the insurgents, Carew espoused the cause of Mary, whom he proclaimed in Devonshire (1553). Very soon afterwards, however, he joined the anti-Spanish party, and was entrusted with the task of raising Devonshire, while Sir Thomas Wyatt was to raise Kent. His action in the rebellion of 1549 had made him so unpopular with the country people, however, that he was unable to do anything effectual against the government, and was compelled to seek an asylum in France. He was intercepted and sent back—to the Tower, where he remained till 1556. In 1560 he was appointed one of the commissioners to negotiate the Treaty of Leith, and in the same year was entrusted with a mission to reorganize the army in Scotland. A few years later Sir Peter became one of the colonists of Munster, where many cruelties are attributed to him. He joined the expedition of Essex in 1575, but died the same year.

Carey, HENRY, 1ST LORD HUNSDON (1524?-96), cousin of Queen Elizabeth and one of her truest friends and most trusted advisers, was frequently employed on confidential missions, and filled many posts of trust. In 1564 he was sent to France to invest Charles IX with the Order of the Garter, but was usually in attendance on the queen at court. Vehemently opposed to the scheme of a marriage between Mary Stuart and the Duke of Norfolk, Hunsdon was sent to Scotland in 1569 with proposals for the delivery of the Queen of Scots into the hands of Moray, in order to get her out of the way of any movement in her favour on the part of the rebel lords. Later in the same year he was associated with the Earl of Sussex in the command against the insurgents of the north. In the beginning of 1570 he attacked the forces of Leonard Dacres on the banks of the River Chelt, in Cumberland, and completely routed them, doing such good service to the queen that Elizabeth wrote to him. In 1584 he was sent on a special mission to Scotland. During the alarm which held England in the days when the Spanish Armada was threatening, Lord Hunsdon had command of a body-guard of 36,000 men, enrolled especially for the queen's defence. A soldier rather than a statesman, he gave the queen frequent momentary offence by his plain speaking, but he remained till the end one of her most trusted supporters.

Cargill, DONALD, one of the most extreme of the Covenanting clergy, was a chief promoter of the Sanquhar Declaration (q.v.), 1680. For having excommunicated Charles II and the Duke of York, he was, on his capture at Covington Mill, taken to Edinburgh and executed, July 2, 1681. [CAMERONTIANS.]

Carleton, DUDLEY, VISCOUNT DORCHESTER (1573-1632), was ambassador to the republic of Venice from 1610 to 1615, and to the United Provinces from 1615 to 1626. During the second parliament of Charles I he maintained the cause of the king in the House of Commons, and attached himself to the party of Buckingham. In May 1626 he was created Baron Carleton, and on July 25, 1628, Viscount Dorchester. Next year he was appointed secretary of state, and in that capacity advocated peace with France and alliance with the German Protestants. Clarendon says that his knowledge of "foreign employment, and the condition of other princes and nations," was combined with an utter ignorance of English institutions and temper.

Carleton, HENRY BOYLE, 1ST BARON (d. 1725). [BOYLE.]

Carlisle (CUMBERLAND) seems to have been identical with the Roman station of Luguwallium, which is mentioned in the Itinerary of Antoninus, and from which it seems clear that the name has been derived—Caer-Luel. The town was sacked by the Danes in the ninth century, after which it disappears from history, until we find it being rebuilt with a strong castle by William Rufus in 1092. It was held by the Scots during their tenure of Cumberland, and the beginning of the great church of St. Mary's is attributed to David I, King of Scotland. Subsequently it was frequently besieged in the course of the border wars, one of the most celebrated sieges being the unsuccessful one by William the Lion (1173). The place surrendered to Charles Edward in 1745, and the mayor and corporation proclaimed him king. The cathedral, begun in the reign of William Rufus, was partly destroyed by Cromwell in 1648.

Carlisle, THE STATUTE OF (1307), passed by Edward I in full parliament, after he had previously obtained the consent of the barons to it in 1305, was intended to prevent the drain of English gold to Rome by clerical exactions. It forbade the payment of tallages on monastic property, and rendered illegal other imposts by which money was to be sent out of the country. It was accompanied by a petition from the laity against abuses of the papal power in England. Since Edward was unwilling to quarrel with the pope, it was never acted upon, but it is most important as the precedent on which were based the Acts of Provisors and Præmunire and the whole series of anti-papal measures of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

Carmelites, THE, were an order of friars, who received their name from the place of their origin—Mount Carmel in Palestine. They were popularly known, from the colour of their habits, as the White Friars. Their rule, which was based largely on that of St. Basil, was approved by Honorius III in 1224 and finally confirmed by Innocent IV in 1250. The order was introduced into England in 1240 by John Vesey and Richard Grey, crusaders returning from the East; and the first houses were established at Alnwick in Northumberland and Aylesford in Kent. At the time of the Dissolution there were about forty convents of Carmelites in existence in England. [FRIARS.]

Carnatic was the name formerly given to the district in south-eastern India extending along the Coromandel Coast. In the middle of the eighteenth century the country was governed by the Nawab of the Carnatic at Arcot. It was cut up, however, in the south by the Mahratta kingdom of Tanjore, the British and French settlements, and the almost independent districts of the Polygars of Madura, Tinnevely, etc. It was feudally subject to the Viceroy, or Nizam, of the Deccan. In 1743 Anwar-ud-Din was appointed Nawab by the Nizam-ul-Mulk. On his death the succession was disputed between Chanda Sahib, who was assisted by the French, and Mohammed Ali, who was supported by the British. The latter succeeded in establishing their nominee as Nawab over the greater part of the Carnatic; but both he and his son, Omdat-ul-Omrah, who succeeded in 1795, failed to regain their independence. As a result of their correspondence with Tippoo Sultan (q.v.), Lord Wellesley determined on annexing the country. On the death of Omdat-ul-Omrah an arrangement was made (1801) with Azim-ud-Dowlah, his nephew, to the effect that the entire civil and military government of the state should be resigned to the company, and one-fifth of the revenue should be reserved for his support. On his death, in 1825, the title was continued to his infant son, and on the death of the latter, childless, in 1853, the title was extinguished.

Carne, SIR EDWARD (d. 1561), was a graduate of Oxford, where he became doctor of civil law in 1524. He was frequently employed as envoy to various foreign princes by Henry VIII. In 1530 he was sent by the king to Rome to argue against the citation of Henry to appear at the papal court. He frequently represented the English sovereign at Rome under Mary, and in the earlier years of Elizabeth's reign; but was finally detained by Paul IV at Rome, and compelled to become governor of the English hospital there. This was declared to be a gross violation of the privilege of an ambassador; but it is probable that Sir Edward, who disliked the religious changes of Elizabeth's rule, was a willing captive.

Carolina. [AMERICAN COLONIES.]

Caroline of Anspach, QUEEN (1683-1737), wife of King George II, was the daughter of John Frederick, Margrave of Brandenburg-Anspach. In the year 1705 she married Prince George of Hanover, over whom, in spite of his immorality, she maintained the greatest influence during his life. During the quarrels of her husband and his father she retained her influence over the first without forfeiting the esteem of the second. In 1727 she was crowned with her husband. When Walpole was displaced from power, at the commencement of the reign, she espoused his cause, being persuaded of his financial abilities, and attracted by the jointure of £100,000 a year he secured in her favour. She therefore persuaded the king that Compton was unfitted for the post of minister. During her life she continued the firm friend of Walpole, and upheld his policy of peace at home and abroad. She was deeply mortified when he was obliged to relinquish his excise scheme. In 1737 she reprieved Porteous, who was condemned for firing on the crowd at Edinburgh. On the outbreak of the quarrel between Frederick, Prince of Wales, and her husband, she violently espoused the cause of the latter. In consequence, she and her son were on extremely bad terms, and the queen often expressed a wish for the prince's death. Her influence over the king continued unimpaired till the end of her life, and on her death-bed the monarch gave a rather curious testimony of it. The dying queen besought her husband to marry again. "Non," answered the sobbing prince, "j'aurai des maîtresses." "Oh, mon Dieu !" was the reply ; "cela n'empêche pas." Caroline was a woman of considerable intellectual ability. She knew something of philosophy and theology, and affected the character of patroness of literature and poetry. She took creditable pains to get the higher posts in the Church filled by men of learning and character. She was a valuable ally of Walpole, and materially assisted him in carrying out his policy.

The best account of the queen is gained from Hervey's "Memoirs," 1884 ; also biography by W. H. Wilkins, 1901 ; Horace Walpole, "Memoirs," 1798.

Caroline of Brunswick, QUEEN, wife of George IV (1768-1821), was the daughter of Duke Charles William Ferdinand of Brunswick, who died after the battles of Jena and Auerstadt, 1806, and sister of Duke William Frederick, who was killed at the battle of Ligny, 1815. Her mother, Augusta, was daughter of Prince Frederick of Wales, and sister of George III. At the age of twenty-seven the princess was married to George, Prince of Wales, afterwards regent and king. A more unfortunate choice could not have been made. The prince was already married to Mrs. Fitzherbert, and although that marriage was considered void under the Royal Marriage Act, he was averse to contracting any other similar tie. The princess had been badly brought up, was clever, but uneducated and undisciplined, impulsive and indiscreet, with a good heart, but devoid of regulating judgment. The marriage took place on April 8, 1795. A daughter, afterwards Princess Charlotte of Wales, was born on January 7, 1796. Even before this the prince had treated his wife so badly as to call forth a remonstrance from his father. He now wrote, on April 30, 1796, to say that they were to live apart. This repudiation of his wife without any reason except personal dislike, within a year of their marriage, is sufficient to account for any conduct of which she might afterwards have been guilty. Matters remained thus for the next ten years. The princess lived quietly at Blackheath. In the year 1806 rumours were set afloat that the conduct of the princess had been improper. She always had a fancy for children, and before her death had adopted half a dozen. At this time she had with her a child named

William Austin, and scandal said she was his mother. A delicate investigation was ordered, evidence was laboriously collected, and a report laid before the king. The report acquitted the princess of improper conduct, but seemed to fix upon her the charge of indiscretion. Assisted by Perceval and others, she vigorously defended herself, and was entirely acquitted by a minute of council in 1807. Princess Charlotte of Wales was heir to the crown. As a child she had been allowed to see her mother regularly, but as she was growing up the permission began to be refused. Canning and Brougham arrayed themselves on the side of Caroline. She had the whole force of popular opinion with her, for the prince was very much disliked, and the wrongs of the princess were calculated to touch the heart of the multitude. The queen took a strong dislike to her, and about 1813 she was forbidden to attend the royal drawing-room. In August 1814 she left England, with an allowance of £35,000 a year. She went first to Brunswick, and then to Switzerland and Italy. Her conduct was very eccentric and her suite gradually left her, upon which she fell into the hands of an Italian family named Bergami. She went to Jerusalem, and then returned to Italy, living at the Villa d'Este, on the Lake of Como. On January 29, 1820, George IV succeeded to the throne, and his wife assumed the title of queen. Before this a commission had been sent out to Milan to collect evidence of the queen's conduct during her sojourn at the Villa d'Este. The king ordered her name to be omitted from the Liturgy, and forbade royal honours to be paid her at foreign courts. The queen, finding herself thus treated at Rome, determined to come to England. Immediately after her arrival steps for bringing her to trial were taken. On November 6 a Bill of Pains and Penalties, the proceedings in connexion with which are popularly known as the queen's "trial," was passed in the House of Lords by a majority of twenty-eight, but on the third reading the majority was only nine, and it was withdrawn. The result was received with general delight throughout the country. On November 30 the queen went in procession to St. Paul's to return thanks for her deliverance from a great peril and affliction. In the next session of parliament she accepted a pension of £50,000 a year from the government, and from that time her popularity gradually declined. In 1821 George IV determined to be crowned with great pomp in Westminster Hall. The queen claimed, according to ancient precedent, to share the ceremony with him. At an early hour on the morning of the coronation she set out with a coach and six. She had no ticket of admittance, and was repulsed by the officials. As she retreated the jeers of the crowd followed her. This was on July 19, and she died on August 7. However much she may have been deficient in moral dignity, we may feel convinced that there was no foundation for the grave charges brought against her character.

Carr, ROBERT, EARL OF SOMERSET (d. 1645), was descended from the great border family of the Kers of Ferniehurst. As a boy he had served James VI as a page, and a short time after that monarch became King of England, Carr succeeded in attracting his notice and winning his favour. In 1611 his creation as Viscount Rochester made him the first Scotsman who took a seat in the English House of Lords. He became a privy councillor, and though without office and ignorant of business, he soon became the confidential minister of James. About 1613 he formed that connexion with Frances Howard, Countess of Essex, which resulted in her divorce from her husband, the imprisonment and murder of Sir Thomas Overbury (q.v.), her husband's confidant, and ultimately in her marriage with Carr (December 26), who was made Earl of Somerset (November 3) that the lady might not lose in rank. Somerset became the tool of the Howards, his wife's relations, and squandered the immense sums of money which flowed to him on every side. At last a courtiers' intrigue against him endangered a power precarious in its very nature. The circumstances attending Overbury's death were brought to light. The complicity of Somerset was thought to be involved in the ascertained guilt of his wife. He was convicted (1615), but after a long imprisonment was pardoned in 1622. He ended his life in an obscurity only broken by a Star Chamber prosecution in 1630.

Carr, WILLIAM, 1ST VISCOUNT BERESFORD (1768-1854), a natural son of the first Marquis of Waterford, entered the army in 1785, and first saw active service at the siege of Toulon in 1793. In 1799 he went to India and took command of a brigade of Sir David Baird's army, which was on its way to oppose Napoleon in Egypt. In Egypt he remained as commandant of Alexandria till its evacuation, when he returned home, and was sent to Ireland. In 1805 he shared in the conquest of the Cape of Good Hope, whence he was dispatched as brigadier-general with a small force against Buenos Ayres, which he took, only, however, in turn to be compelled to surrender to an overwhelming force. After remaining a prisoner for six months, he managed to escape, and on his return to England was sent in command of an expedition against Madeira, of which, on its capture, he became governor. In 1808, with the rank of major-general, he joined the British armies in Portugal. In the spring of 1809 he was appointed marshal and generalissimo of the Portuguese armies, and proceeded to co-operate with the commander-in-chief.

But in May 1811 he rashly engaged the French at Albuera, and by good fortune, rather than skill of his own, gained a victory. [ALBUERA.] In the campaigns of 1812 and 1813 he was second in command to Wellesley. In 1814 he was raised to the peerage and was immediately charged with an important mission to Brazil. In the year 1815 he was appointed to the command of the Portuguese armies by the King of Portugal, and for some time held that office, until he came into political conflict with the people, when he threw up his appointment, and returned to England in 1822.

Carson, EDWARD HENRY CARSON, BARON (b. 1854), was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and became a Q.C. at the Irish bar in 1889, and an English K.C. in 1894. He was elected Unionist M.P. for Dublin University in 1892, and from 1900 till 1905 he was solicitor-general. His importance as a politician began in 1911 when he strongly resisted the Home Rule Bill and the Parliament Bill. He organized the resistance of Ulster to Home Rule, forming a volunteer corps and establishing the Ulster Unionist Council (1912). He joined the Asquith government of 1915 as attorney-general, until October of that year, and became first lord of the admiralty in the Lloyd George cabinet of December 1916. In July 1917 he entered the war cabinet. He was not in favour of the treaty which constituted the Irish Free State.

Carstares, WILLIAM (1649-1715), was educated at Utrecht, where he became acquainted with William III. He was accused of being implicated in the Rye House Plot (q.v.), and was tortured at Edinburgh. After the Revolution he acquired great influence with William, to whom he acted as a sort of unofficial secretary for Scottish affairs. The king appointed Carstares his chaplain in Scotland. In 1703 he became principal of Edinburgh University, and was one of the active supporters of the Union. Carstares was a man of undoubted ability, and is honourably distinguished among the public men of his age by his firmness and honesty. A volume of his "State Papers and Letters" was published in 1774, and is of considerable value as illustrating Scottish affairs during the Revolution.

Carteret, JOHN, 1ST EARL GRANVILLE (1690-1763), eldest surviving son of George, Lord Carteret, early distinguished himself in the House of Lords by his defence of Whig doctrines and the Revolution settlement. He was sent as ambassador to Sweden in 1719; and to the Congress of Cambrai in 1720. In 1721 he was made secretary of state, and in 1724 lord-lieutenant of Ireland, which office he filled with great success. In 1730 he returned to England and became one of the most formidable opponents of Walpole. On the fall of that minister he became secretary of state (February 1742). He resigned office, however, in 1744 (November 23). He unsuccessfully attempted to form a ministry in company with Lord Bath in 1746. He succeeded to the earldom of Granville in 1744, and was appointed president of the council in 1751. He was a man of brilliant genius, and an accomplished scholar, but was deficient in steadiness of purpose and judgment.

Carthusians, THE, one of the regular monastic orders, were an offshoot of the Benedictines, instituted at Chartreuse near Grenoble, by St. Bruno of Cologne, in 1086. The rule was based upon that of the Benedictines, but was much more rigorous and austere. Its members were vowed to fasting and the solitary life. Each had his separate cell, the monastery being composed of one or more courts round which these dwellings were arranged. The brethren met together only for the more solemn services; the lesser hours being said and meals, in general, taken by each monk separately. The Carthusians came into England about 1180; but they failed to make much way in the country. There were only nine monasteries of the order in England: the Charterhouse (the name, of course, is a corruption of Chartreuse) in London, and those at Witham (or Selwood), Hinton, Beauvale (or Gresley Park), St. Anne's Coventry, Kingston-upon-Hull, Mountgrace, Epworth (or Axholme), and Shene. There were no Carthusian nunneries in England.

Cartimandua was the queen of the Brigantes, from whom Caradoc (q.v.), after his defeat by the Romans (A.D. 51), sought shelter and assistance, and by whom he was treacherously betrayed to his enemies. According to Tacitus, Cartimandua quitted her husband, Venusius, and married his armour-bearer, Vellocatus. Venusius at the head of her outraged people drove her from her territories, and forced her to seek an asylum in the camp of the Romans, who marched into the district and took possession of it.

Cartwright, THOMAS (1535-1603), the leader of the Church of England party in Elizabeth's reign which advocated the abolition of Episcopacy, was educated at Cambridge, whence he was compelled to withdraw during the Marian persecution. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned, and acquired great reputation as a preacher, becoming so active a supporter of a Presbyterian polity and so determined an opponent of Episcopacy that he was prohibited from occupying the pulpit, and expelled from the university. In 1572

he published his "Admonition to the Parliament" (q.v.), and was drawn into a long controversy with Archbishop Whitgift. In 1584 he was imprisoned by order of Bishop Aylmer, but released by the queen. In 1590, after the death of his patron, Leicester, Cartwright was examined by the Court of Star Chamber, and sent to the Fleet Prison, "for setting up a new discipline and a new form of worship," remaining in confinement for nearly two years.

Carucage was a tax on the hides or carucates of the Domesday assessment, and was first imposed over the whole country by Richard I in 1198, when the tax was five shillings. John, in the first year of his reign, fixed it at three shillings. A carucate was originally as much land as could be ploughed by one full plough team of eight oxen in a season, but it afterwards became fixed at one hundred long acres, or one hundred and twenty acres.

Cary, HENRY, 1ST VISCOUNT FALKLAND (d. 1633), was lord deputy of Ireland between 1622 and 1629. His inquiry into defective titles, and transplantation of many native septs in favour of English settlers, were among the causes of the rebellion of 1641. But his comparatively mild government was ill adapted to carry out Charles I's policy, and he was removed to make room for Strafford.

Cary, LUCIUS, 2ND VISCOUNT FALKLAND (1610-43), son of the preceding, was educated at Dublin, and served in the Low Countries. Returning to his seat of Great Tew, in Oxfordshire, he gathered round him there, and at the neighbouring university, a small band of liberal theologians. In 1640 he entered the Long Parliament. A devoted lover of constitutionalism, and an opponent of arbitrary power in any shape, Falkland had no sympathy with the government of Strafford and Charles; but he believed that the royal government might be amended or reformed. He accordingly became the leader of that Parliamentary Royalist party which almost succeeded in preventing the passage of the Grand Remonstrance. He very unwillingly joined the war on the Royalist side, and almost courted the death he met at Newbury. His personal gifts, liberal spirit, and relations to the parties of his time, invest his career with unusual interest.

Casement, ROGER DAVID (1864-1916), a member of the British consular service, was executed at Pentonville on August 3, 1916, for treason, having attempted in Berlin to form a brigade from among Irish prisoners of war and to use them against Great Britain in the Great War. He was captured on his way from Germany to Ireland, where his intention was to have aided a rising at Easter 1916.

Cashel, THE SYNOD OF (1171), was a great assembly of the Irish Church, attended by all the archbishops and bishops. The ecclesiastical disorders, which had formed one at least of the causes which led to the papal grant of the sovereignty of Ireland to Henry II and to the latter's invasion were condemned. Thus the marriage of the clergy was forbidden, the tithe system established, the appropriation of benefices by laymen and levying of coshery on the clergy abolished, and the observance of the degrees of affinity in marriage enforced. In other ways, too, the Roman discipline and the authority of the pope were recognized.

Casket Letters, The, are a celebrated collection of documents, supposed to be the correspondence between Bothwell and Mary Stuart. Bothwell left in Edinburgh Castle a casket containing some papers, for which he sent after his flight from Carberry Hill. His messenger was intercepted whilst returning, and the casket and its contents fell into the hands of the Earl of Morton. On a letter from the queen to Bothwell contained in it, the charge that she was an accomplice of Darnley's murder was founded. The letters were laid before the Scots council of government, and the Scots parliament adjudged the charge proven (December 1567). They were again produced before the English commissioners at Westminster, and compared with other writings of the queen's, with which they corresponded (December 1568). The letters descended from one Scottish regent to another, and finally passed into the hands of the Earl of Gowrie. After his execution (1584) they disappeared. They had, however, been translated into different languages and published. Mary continually asserted them to be forgeries, and demanded first to see the originals, then to be provided with copies. Neither of these requests was granted. An argument in favour of the theory that the letters were forgeries is furnished by the fact that the two most criminatory letters were evidently originally written in Scots, and the copies published were a translation of this Scots original into French. But Mary, until after her flight into England, always used the French language in her letters. Therefore the conclusion is that she could not have written these letters. But the question of the genuineness of non-existent documents is naturally difficult to solve. Amongst English historians, Froude, Burton, and Laing believe the letters genuine; Caird and Hosack take the opposite view. Of foreign writers on the subject, Ranke, Pauli, Mignet, and Gaedeke accept the letters, whilst Schiern, Philippson, Gauthier, and Chantelauze deny their authenticity.

Cassiterides, THE, OR TIN ISLANDS, mentioned by Herodotus, and alluded to by Polybius and other early writers, are often identified with the Scilly Isles; but under the name Cassiterides it is very probable that the adjacent parts of Devon and Cornwall were included if not the British islands generally. Cassivellaunus (CASWALLON), at the time of Cæsar's second invasion of Britain (54 B.C.), was chief of the Catuvellauni (q.v.), a tribe occupying the area north of the Thames; and had shortly before usurped the sovereignty of the Trinobantes and murdered the lawful king. The Roman invasion drove the tribes of the south-east of Britain to form a league, at the head of which Cassivellaunus was placed. For a short time he succeeded in repelling the Romans, but his stronghold (perhaps Verulamium) being captured, and the other tribes deserting him, he submitted to Cæsar. He gave up the country of the Trinobantes to Mandubracius, son of the late king, and contented himself with keeping his own domains. After the departure of Cæsar we hear nothing more of Cassivellaunus.

Castillon, THE BATTLE OF (1453), was the last engagement in the Hundred Years' War between England and France. In 1452 the Gascons rose against the French, and besought aid from England. Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, was sent out, and was at first very successful. In July 1453, hearing that the French were besieging Castillon, a fortress on the Dordogne, he marched with a small force to relieve it, but the French were stronger than he imagined, and he was defeated and slain. With his death all the hopes of the English were at an end.

Castlebar Races (1798). The name given to the engagement fought near Castlebar on August 27, 1798, during the French raid on Ireland. Generals Lake and Hutchinson, with 2,000 Irish militia, a large body of yeomanry, and Lord Roden's fencibles, advanced against General Humbert, who had landed at Killala on the 20th of the month. Humbert had with him 1,017 French troops, and about 1,000 of the Irish rebels. The militia, however, would not stand their ground, and at once ran; and the yeomanry following, Lake's guns were taken, and Roden's horse were unable to save the day. Of Lake's men 53 were killed and 34 wounded; the French loss was heavier, but they took 9 guns and 200 prisoners, and the town of Castlebar fell into the hands of the insurgents, with whom it remained for about a fortnight, till the surrender of Humbert at Ballinamuck, on September 9.

Castlereagh, ROBERT STEWART, VISCOUNT (1769-1822). [STEWART.]

Castles, of which there are remains of nearly 500 in England alone, belong chiefly to the period between the Norman Conquest and the middle of the fourteenth century. It is true that strong places were fortified by Alfred and his successors; but these would rarely be more than a mound and a ditch, with wooden tower and palisade; and Domesday, which mentions 49 castles, gives only one stone castle, viz., Arundel, as existing under the Confessor. They were a Norman product, even when, as at Hereford and Warwick, strong earthworks in place of masonry show that the Norman builder used an existing English fortress. They are identical in type with the great castles of Normandy, and keep pace with them in development. Thus the essential point of the Norman castle is the massive rectangular keep, with walls as much as 20 feet thick, and, as at Rochester, over 100 feet high, with its stairs, chapel, chambers, kitchen, well—making it complete in itself as a last resort. The base court in the castles built immediately after the Norman Conquest (e.g., Oxford, London, Newcastle) was for some years left to the protection of a stockade. When this was replaced by circuit walls, with a strong gatehouse, we have complete the Norman system of fortification by solid works of great passive strength. The "Edwardian" castle (e.g., Carnarvon) exhibits a system, which completely superseded this, of concentric works, with skilful arrangement of parts, so as to include a far larger area. Such a castle as Bamburgh could accommodate a large garrison with stores, horses and cattle, and could be stormed only in detail. The duke in Normandy had exercised the right of holding a garrison in the castles of his barons, and the Norman kings of England jealously maintained the requirement of a royal licence for their erection. Of the 49 in Domesday, 30 were built by the Conqueror himself. In the anarchy of Stephen's days, 375 were built, or, according to Ralph de Diceto, 1,115. Henry II, on his accession, had to besiege and recover for the Crown the "adulterine" castles; and after the revolt of 1173 it became a definite policy of the Crown to keep down their number, and have a voice in the appointment of castellans. One of the first steps of the barons of 1258 was to substitute nineteen of themselves for the alien favourites as guardians of the royal castles, and the last stand of the defeated party was made in de Montfort's castle of Kenilworth from October 1265, to December 1266. After this the castles ceased to be a menace to royal power. The Edwardian castles were chiefly national defences on the coast or the Welsh and Scottish Marches. The number of licences to "crenellate and tenellate" rises to its height in the reigns of Edward II and Edward III; the Commons in 1371 even petition that leave to do this may be given freely for all men's houses and for the walls of boroughs. But these were castellated mansions rather than true castles. In them the keep sinks to a guard-house, the walls are less solid, the windows are adapted to convenience rather than defence. However, under the Stuarts such fortified mansions proved capable of standing a siege. But the last castles are not later than Tudor times, and even the "Peil" towers, for defence against the Scots, fell into ruin after the union of the kingdoms. The castles had been a heavy cost and trouble to the Crown. Bridgnorth alone had cost in repairs £213 during Henry II's reign; the constable of Bridgnorth besides was paid 40 marks salary; and the jurors of 1258 declared it required £20 a year to keep it up in time of peace. The duty of castle guard, at the rate of forty days' service for a knight's fee, commuted often for a mark on the fee, was a burden vexatious both to nobles and gentry. Some castles, like Lancaster and Richmond, were associated with a quasi-royal jurisdiction over the district. In others the lords would be only too ready to arrogate such rights. Many, no doubt, like Bridgnorth, served as centres of tyranny, even when in royal hands. And this tendency probably accounts for the frequent changes made by the Crown in the persons chosen as royal constables, and for the fact that Edward I found it necessary, even after Henry II's determined assertion of royal rights, to make the Quo Warranto inquiry into the jurisdictions claimed by each of his barons. It is only by closely tracing the local history of some one great castle that the justice can be realized of Matthew Paris's description of them as "nests of devils and dens of thieves," or the bitter words of the contemporary English monk of Peterborough on the castles of Stephen's reign:—"They filled the land full of castles, and when they were finished, filled them with devils and evil men; . . . then they tortured men and women for their gold and silver; . . . then plundered they and burned all the towns: . . . they spared neither church nor churchyard; . . . they robbed the monks and the clergy; . . . the earth bare no corn; the land was all ruined by such deeds; and it was said openly that Christ slept and His saints." The castles of England, on many sides, illustrate the national history. Berkeley has its story of royal tragedy, Kenilworth of constitutional struggle, Carlisle of border romance. The names of Montgomery and Balliol and Granville recall the baronial families who brought into England the titles of their Norman castles. And the immense households which the later spirit of chivalry gathered together into Alnwick, or Lancaster, or Warwick, made the castle of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries a local centre of vast social influence, even when the days of its military and constitutional domination had passed away.

Caswallon. [CASSIVELLAUNUS.]

Cateau-Cambrésis, THE TREATY OF (April 2, 1559), was concluded between France, Spain, and England after the accession of Elizabeth. The chief difficulty in bringing about the peace had been the question of Calais, which the French were determined to retain. Finally it was arranged that the French should keep the town for eight years, and then restore it. The French gave up their claims on Milan and Naples; they also agreed to evacuate and raze the fortresses they had built on the Scottish border, and to give substantial bonds for the restitution of Calais. The dauphin and dauphiness were to confirm the treaty, and to agree to recognize Elizabeth's right to the English crown.

The treaty is given in Rymer, "Fœdera," xv, 505.

Catesby, WILLIAM (d. 1485), one of Richard III's councillors, was chancellor of the exchequer in 1483 and Speaker of the House of Commons in 1484, and seems to have owed his rise to Lord Hastings, of whom he was at first a close follower, though he afterwards deserted his cause when Hastings fell under the displeasure of Richard. He was taken at the battle of Bosworth and put to death by the orders of Henry VII. The three principal advisers of Richard III—Catesby, Sir Richard Ratcliff, and Lord Lovel—are held up to opprobrium with him in the well-known contemporary rhyme:—

"The Cat, the Rat, and Lovel our Dog, Rule all England under a Hog."

Cathedral is properly the chief church of the diocese, in which the bishop's seat or throne was established. The ecclesiastical organization on the continent generally followed the lines of the political organization of the Roman Empire. The province usually became the diocese, and the church of the provincial capital became the seat of the bishop. England, however, was mainly evangelized by missionaries who lived together under monastic rules; hence many of the English cathedrals—e.g., Worcester—were originally monastery churches, over which a bishop was set. In other cases the bishop was set over a district, and chose his own cathedral church. Hence the bishops' seats were frequently changed, till after the Norman Conquest they were ordered to be fixed in cities and walled towns. Thus, among others, the older cathedrals of Sherborne, Selsey, and Dorchester gave place to those of Salisbury, Chichester, and Lincoln. [Occasionally two churches jointly shared the distinction of containing the bishop's "cathedra," as in the case of Bath and Wells or Coventry and Lichfield. Such churches are said to be con-cathedral in relation to each other.] English cathedrals were of two classes, according to their origin. The clergy attached to them were in some cases monks, in others secular canons. In the first case the bishop reckoned as abbot of the monastery, in the second case he was the head of his chapter. In both cases, however, the secular and official duties of the bishop tended to sever him from his cathedral, and the chapter took possession of it. The dean became more powerful than the absent bishop, who was gradually driven from his own church, and retained little save a visitatorial power over his chapter. The annals of most mediæval episcopates are full of the quarrels between the bishop and the monks or chapter, leading to constant appeals to Rome and a diminution of the episcopal authority. In the reign of Henry VIII, after the suppression of the monasteries, the monastic cathedrals were remodelled. These "cathedrals of the new foundation" are Canterbury, Carlisle, Durham, Ely, Norwich, Rochester, Winchester, and Worcester. The bishoprics founded by Henry VIII—Bristol, Chester, Gloucester, Oxford, Peterborough, and Westminster—were provided with cathedrals after the same model. Westminster, though it lost its bishop, has retained its dean and its position as a collegiate church. In recent times many new bishoprics have been founded, and the bishop's seat established in old collegiate and parish churches, which have been turned into cathedrals. [At Liverpool (cr. 1880) a fine new cathedral, which is one of the most interesting specimens of modern ecclesiastical architecture, was founded in 1926.] [CHAPTER.]

Catherine of Aragon, QUEEN (1485-1536). [KATHARINE.]

Catherine of Braganza, QUEEN, wife of Charles II (1638-1705), was the daughter of John, King of Portugal. She was married to Charles II in 1662. Her married life seems not to have been happy, owing to her husband's infidelities and the harshness and neglect with which he treated her. She mixed very little in politics, and, though a sincere Roman Catholic, never made any real attempts to get Romanism re-established in England. Notwithstanding this, she was accused by Titus Oates of plotting against the king's life, but the informer's equivocations were detected by Charles, and the charge was dropped. After her husband's death she lived quietly in England till 1692, when she returned to her native country, where she spent the rest of her life.

Biography by L. C. Davidson, 1908.

Catherine of France, QUEEN, wife of Henry V (1401-37), was the daughter of Charles VI. In 1420 she was married to Henry V, in accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Troyes. By him she had only one son, Henry VI, who was born in 1421. Subsequently she took for her second husband Owen Tudor, a poor Welsh gentleman attached to the court. This second marriage was strongly resented in England, and was never acknowledged by Henry VI. By Owen Tudor Catherine had three sons, the eldest of whom, Edmund Tudor, was the father of Henry VII. [TUDOR, FAMILY OF.]

Catherine Howard, QUEEN, fifth wife of Henry VIII (d. 1542), was the daughter of Lord Edmund Howard, the son of the Duke of Norfolk. Educated under the care of the Dowager Duchess of Norfolk, she early developed a taste for levity and frivolity. Henry VIII was captivated by her beauty and vivacity, and married her, July 28, 1540. But the levity which had marked her before her marriage continued afterwards, and there can be little doubt that she was guilty of improper conduct with at least one of her former lovers, Dereham. In November 1541 she was charged with adultery, and sent to the Tower. On December 10 two of her paramours, Dereham and Culpepper, were beheaded. In 1542 a Bill of Attainder against her was passed; and on February 13 of that year she was executed. Immediately afterwards a bill was passed making it high treason for any woman whom the king married or sought in marriage to conceal any questionable circumstances in her past life.

Catherine Parr, QUEEN, sixth wife of Henry VIII (1512-48), daughter of Sir Thomas Parr, was connected by birth with the Nevilles and other great families. She was carefully educated, and married, at an unusually early age, to Edward Borough, who left her a widow, and in her sixteenth year she was married, for the second time, to John Neville, Lord Latimer, with whom she lived happily for several years. During this period she became greatly attached to the doctrines of the Reformers. Lord Latimer died in 1542, and Catherine was besieged by many suitors. She was beautiful, and famed for her accomplishments, and her husband's death had left her in possession of one of the finest properties in the kingdom.

The most favoured of her suitors was Sir Thomas Seymour, who, however, prudently withdrew his pretensions when the king cast his eyes upon the lady. In July 1543 she was married to Henry, and this, unlike the king's previous matrimonial alliances, excited no dissatisfaction among any class of his subjects. In the very difficult position of queen she acted with great prudence. She ministered to the growing bodily infirmities of the king, and endeared herself to his children. But there is no doubt that she was a sincere and, as far as prudence allowed her, an active supporter of the Reformers. In spite of her great caution, Henry conceived a mistrust of her theological learning, and was prevailed upon by Bishop Gardiner to sign articles of impeachment against her, and to order her arrest; but Catherine's skilful management succeeded in averting the danger. It is probable, however, that Henry was meditating a fresh charge of treason against her when he was overtaken by death. Almost immediately after this event Catherine married her former suitor, Sir Thomas Seymour of Sudeley, the lord high admiral. Her husband, however, neglected her, and had obviously fixed his affections on the Princess Elizabeth. The union was unhappy, and on September 7, 1548, she died in child-birth. From some words spoken by Catherine during her last illness, it has been supposed that Seymour poisoned her; but there is no evidence to confirm the suspicion. Catherine was the author of a volume of "Prayers and Meditations," and a tract called "The Lamentations of a Sinner," which is written with a good deal of vigour, and in parts with some genuine eloquence.

Catholic Association, THE, was founded by Daniel O'Connell (q.v.) in 1823. It embraced all classes, and was really representative in character, though not nominally so. It received petitions, appointed committees, ordered a census of the Catholic population, and collected the "Catholic Rent." This was a subscription raised all over Ireland by means of officers called wardens, appointed by the association. O'Connell managed all the money that came in, without accounting for it to anyone. In 1825 parliament attempted to put down the association by means of the Convention Bill, but the association was dissolved itself before the bill came into force. This, however, was merely in appearance; as a matter of fact, it continued to exist, and the Catholic Rent was still raised. In 1829, after the victory won at the Clare election, the Convention Bill having expired, the old association was renewed, and it declared that none but Catholics should in future be elected for Irish constituencies. The members also began to assemble at monster meetings, to which they marched in military array; but a proclamation against these meetings was obeyed by the association. When the Emancipation Act was passed (April 10, 1829) it was accompanied by a measure for suppressing the association. But, its object being fulfilled, the association was dissolved before the bill became law. Sheil and Wyre were the leaders, next to the "Liberator" himself.

B. Ward, "Eve of Catholic Emancipation," 1911.

Catholic Committee, THE, was an association of some of the leading Catholics in Ireland, which was established in the reign of William III, and was intended to watch over Catholic interests. The committee became extremely active during the agitation of the last quarter of the eighteenth century. In 1791 there was a split in the committee, the bishops and the noblemen, like Lord Fingal and Lord Kenmare, separating from the more violent party; the latter pressed for instant emancipation, while the former were willing to wait. The violent party determined on a convention, and on an alliance with the United Irishmen, under Byrne and Keogh. The consequence was the Back Lane Parliament (q.v.). Meanwhile, however, the committee itself, after a hot debate, accepted the Relief Bill of 1793, and the Back Lane Parliament dissolved. But from this time the moderate party lost influence, and in 1798 the committee dissolved itself. In 1810 and 1871 it was reconstituted, and reassembled for a short period. [CATHOLIC EMANCIPATION.]

B. Ward, "Eve of Catholic Emancipation," 1911.

Catholic Emancipation. In the reign of William III various statutes had been passed against the Roman Catholics which forbade them to hold property in land, and subjected their spiritual instructors to the penalties of felony. These acts had ceased to be applied, but they were a blot upon the statute book, and served as a temptation to informers. In 1778 an act, brought in by Sir G. Savile, repealed these penalties with general approval. These acts did not apply to Scotland, but it was contemplated to repeal similar enactments which still disgraced the Scots statute book. This stirred up fanaticism in Edinburgh and Glasgow in 1779; riots took place in the Scottish capital, and the houses of Roman Catholics were attacked. A Protestant Association was established in Scotland, and Lord George Gordon, who was more than half a madman, was chosen as its president. The association spread to England, and a branch was established in London, and in consequence the disturbances known as the Gordon Riots (q.v.) broke out. In 1791 John Mitford brought in a bill for the relief of "Protesting Catholic Dissenters"—that is, Roman Catholics who protested against the pope's temporal authority, and his right to excommunicate kings and absolve subjects from their allegiance, and the right of not keeping faith with heretics. Fox opposed the measure on the ground that relief should be given to all Roman Catholics. Pitt expressed similar sentiments. The bill was altered during its progress, and at last it passed in a form which allowed Roman Catholics who took an oath of allegiance to secure to themselves freedom of education, of holding property, and of practising the profession of the law. It also allowed Catholic peers to approach the king. Roman Catholics were still worse off in Ireland. Their public worship was proscribed; they were excluded from all offices in the learned professions; they were deprived of the guardianship of their children; if they had landed estates they were forbidden to intermarry with Protestants. In 1792 some of the worst of these disabilities were removed by the Irish parliament, and in 1793 this relief was further extended. [BACK LANE PARLIAMENT; CATHOLIC COMMITTEE.] The restraints on worship and education, even the disposition of property, were removed; Catholics were admitted to vote at elections on taking the oath of allegiance and abjuration; they could hold some of the higher civil and military offices, and could enjoy the honours and endowments of the University of Dublin. In the same year a similar bill was passed for the relief of Scottish Roman Catholics. In 1799, when the union with Ireland was in contemplation, Pitt intended to admit Irish Roman Catholics to the parliament of the United Kingdom. But George III was strongly opposed to this step, and would not allow his minister to give any direct pledge. When Pitt attempted, after the Union, to carry out his tempered scheme of relief, the king refused his consent, and Pitt resigned office. After this the question slept, but in 1803 the Catholics obtained a further slight measure of relief on condition of subscribing the oath of 1791. In May 1805 Lord Grenville moved for a committee of the whole House to consider a petition from the Roman Catholics of Ireland; but his motion was negatived by a majority of 129. A similar motion was made by Fox in the House of Commons, but it was lost by a majority of 112. In 1807 an attempt was made by the ministry to admit Roman Catholics in Ireland to the higher staff appointments of the army. This attempt they were obliged by the king to abandon, and as his Majesty went on to require from them a written declaration that they would propose to him no further concession to the Catholics, they were obliged to resign. Their successors, under the Duke of Portland and Spencer Perceval, were opposed to the Roman Catholic claims; still numerous petitions were presented by Irish Roman Catholics, and similar petitions were presented in 1810 in favour of English Roman Catholics. Many Protestants began to petition for the relief of their Catholic brethren, and the feeling in the universities became less strongly opposed to change. After the murder of Perceval the Marquis Wellesley was charged with the formation of a ministry, and made the settlement of the Catholic claims the basis of his programme. He did not, however, succeed. In the same year Canning carried a motion for the consideration of the laws affecting Catholics by a majority of 129. In the Lords a similar motion was lost by a single vote. The Catholic Association (q.v.) had been formed in Ireland in 1823. During Canning's tenure of office it had been dissolved, in the hope that he would be sure to carry out his well-known views. After his death, in 1827, it was reconstructed. In 1828 it secured the return of Daniel O'Connell for the county of Clare. Peel and the Duke of Wellington were convinced that the time for settling the question of the Catholic claims had now arrived. Besides other difficulties, they had to face the strong opposition of the king, George IV, who now expressed as much objection to the measure as his father had done. At last the king was persuaded to allow the ministry to draw up three measures, one to suppress the Catholic Association, one a Relief Bill, and the third to revise the franchise in Ireland. After some delay caused by the king, Peel introduced the measure of Catholic Relief. It admitted Roman Catholics, on taking a new oath instead of the oath of supremacy, to both Houses of Parliament; to all corporate offices; to all judicial offices, except in the ecclesiastical courts; to all civil and political offices, except those of regent, lord chancellor in England and Ireland, and lord-lieutenant of Ireland. Roman Catholics were still restrained in the exercise of Church patronage. The motion to go into committee was agreed to by a majority of 188. The Duke of Wellington said, on the second reading of the bill, in the House of Lords: "I, my Lords, am one of those who have probably passed a longer period of my life engaged in war than most men, and principally, I may say, in civil war, and I must say this, that if I could avoid, by any sacrifice whatever, even one month of civil war in the country to which I am attached, I would sacrifice my life in order to do it." The bill was opposed in the Lords by the Archbishop of Canterbury and several others of the episcopal bench, but it was carried on April 10, 1829, by 213 to 109. The king gave his consent with great reluctance. Sir Robert Peel writes in his memoirs a solemn declaration that he acted throughout in this measure from a deep conviction that it was not only conducive to the general welfare, but that it had become imperatively necessary to avert an imminent and increasing danger from the interests of the Church, and of the institutions connected with the Church.

was the name given to a wild plot formed by a number of desperate men, having for its chief object the murder of Lord Castlereagh and the rest of the government. The originators were Arthur Thistlewood (q.v.), who had once been a subaltern officer, Ings, a butcher, Bryant, a shoemaker, Davidson, a man of colour, Adams, a retired soldier, and Hidon, a cowkeeper. They had arranged to murder the ministers at a dinner at Lord Harrowby's on the night of February 23, to set fire to London in several places, seize the Bank and Mansion House, and proclaim a provisional government. The plot, however, had been betrayed to the police by one of the conspirators, named Edwards, some weeks before. The conspirators were attacked by the police as they were arming themselves in a stable in Cato Street, near the Edgware Road. A scuffle ensued, in which one policeman was stabbed and several of the criminals escaped. Thistlewood was among these, but he was captured next morning. He and four others were executed, and five more were transported for life. A good deal of discussion took place in the House of Commons on the employment of the informer Edwards by the authorities.

Catuvellauni (CATYEUHLANI), THE, were an ancient British tribe which occupied an area to the north of the Thames, comprising probably the present counties of Hertford, Bedford, and Buckingham. Cassivellaunus (q.v.) was chief of this tribe at the date of Cæsar's invasion of Britain.

Caufield, JAMES, 1ST EARL CHARLEMONT (1728-99), was elected by the Irish Volunteers "General of the Patriot Army," in July 1780. In 1781 he opposed Catholic emancipation, and was one of the leaders in the first and second conventions at Dungannon, and president of the Dublin convention. He went over to England with the Regency Bill, and signed the "Round Robin" of 1789. He was also the founder of the Northern Whig Club. On his estates the rebellion of 1798 assumed a peculiarly dangerous form. Froude refers to him as "the most enthusiastic and the most feeble of revolutionary heroes."

Cavaliers. In December 1641 frequent tumults took place round the Houses of Parliament, in the course of which more than one collision occurred between the mob and the officers and courtiers who made Whitehall their headquarters. The two parties assailed each other with nicknames, and the epithet, "Cavalier," was applied by the people to the Royalists. The original meaning of the term, which was to become the designation of a great political party, is difficult to discover. Gardiner says that it "carried with it a flavour of opprobrium as implying a certain looseness and idleness of military life." Forster thinks that it was used as a term of reproach on this occasion "to connect its French origin with the un-English character of the defenders of the queen and her French papist adherents, to whom it was chiefly applied." According to the statement of William Lilly, an eye-witness of these riots, it referred at first rather to the personal appearance of the Royalists than to anything foreign or sinister in their characters. "The courtiers having long hair and locks, and always wearing swords, at last were called by these men 'Cavaliers'; and so all that took part or appeared for his Majesty were termed Cavaliers, few of the vulgar knowing the sense of the word 'Cavalier.'" It thus exactly corresponded to the term Roundhead [ROUND-HEAD]. The earliest uses of the word in the Journal of Sir S. D'Ewes are found under the dates of January 10 and March 4, 1641. The king complained of its use, accusing his opponents of attempting "to render all persons of honour, courage, and reputation odious to the common people under the style of Cavaliers, inasmuch as the highways and villages have not been safe for gentlemen to pass through without violence or affront." The name at first used as a reproach came to be adopted by the Royalists themselves as a title of honour. "A complete Cavalier," wrote Dr. Symonds, in a sermon preached before the royal army, "is a child of honour. He is the only reserve of English gentility and ancient valour, and hath chosen rather to bury himself in the tomb of honour than to see the nobility of his nation vassalaged, the dignity of his country captivated or obscured by any base domestic enemy, or by any foreign fore-conquered foe." The name thus originated continued to be used to describe the Church and King party till the introduction of the epithet "Tory." [TORY.]

Cavendish, SPENCER COMPTON, MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON AND 8TH DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE (1833-1908), eldest son of William, 7th duke, was returned to the House of Commons as one of the members for North Lancashire in the Liberal interest in 1857. In February 1863 he was appointed a lord of the admiralty, and in April under-secretary for war. On the reconstruction of Lord Russell's second administration in 1866 he took office as secretary for war. In 1868 he was returned for the Radnor Boroughs, and accepted the office of postmaster-general in Gladstone's first cabinet. In 1871 he became chief secretary for Ireland. When Gladstone abandoned the leadership of the Liberal party in 1875 Hartington assumed the post, but in 1880 accepted office under his old chief. He became secretary for India, and subsequently (1882) secretary for war, but refused to enter the Home Rule cabinet in 1886, became the leader of the dissentient Liberals, and firmly supported Lord Salisbury. On the retirement of Lord Salisbury in 1902 he became leader of the House of Lords, but resigned in 1903 in consequence of his devotion to the principles of free trade. He succeeded his father as Duke of Devonshire in 1892.

Cavendish, THOMAS (1560-92), a gentleman of Suffolk, fitted out in 1586 an expedition for discovery and privateering, having imbibed a love for sea adventure during a voyage in 1585. A futile attack on Sierra Leone was followed by a descent on the coasts of Chile and Peru, where he met with more success, capturing some of the Spanish treasure-ships, notably the Santa Anna from the Manilas. He returned to Plymouth in September 1588, by the Moluccas, Java, and the Cape of Good Hope, with the honour of being the second Englishman who had circumnavigated the globe, and was knighted by the queen. He died on his way home from Brazil whilst engaged in another voyage of discovery.

Cavendish, WILLIAM, DUKE OF NEWCASTLE (1592-1676), son of Sir Charles Cavendish and Catherine, Lady Ogle, was created successively Viscount Mansfield (1620), Earl of Newcastle (1628), Marquis of Newcastle (1643), and Duke of Newcastle (1664). He took up arms for the king during the Civil War, and seized Newcastle, thus securing for Charles the communication he needed with the continent. At the close of 1642 he marched into Yorkshire, recovered York, defeating after a six months' campaign the army of Lord Fairfax, and forcing him to take refuge in Hull. But the siege of Hull was unsuccessful (September 2-October 27), and in the next campaign the advance of the Scots, and their junction with Fairfax, forced him to shut himself up in York. The city was relieved by Prince Rupert, who, against the advice of Newcastle, gave battle at Marston Moor (July 2, 1644). After this defeat the marquis took ship at Scarborough, and retired to the continent, where he lived until the Restoration. At Paris he married, in 1645, Margaret Lucas, celebrated for her learning and eccentricity, and author of a life of her husband. She estimates the losses sustained by the duke in consequence of his loyalty and his services to the king at £940,000. As compensation for these losses he was made Duke of Newcastle. Clarendon describes the duke as "a very fine gentleman," "active and full of courage," "amorous in poetry and music," but "the substantial part, and fatigue of a general, he did not in any degree understand, nor could submit to."

Cavendish, WILLIAM, 4TH EARL, AND 1ST DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE (1640-1707), sat in parliament as member for Derby in 1661.

He was sworn of the privy council in 1679, but at the end of the year he petitioned for his dismissal. He was a zealous Protestant and opponent of the court party. In 1685 he was insulted in a gambling house by Colonel Thomas Colepeper. Indignant at meeting this man at court, contrary to the king's promise, he publicly insulted him, after his challenge had been declined. He was tried before the King's Bench, pleaded guilty, and was fined the enormous sum of £30,000. He was imprisoned, but hearing that he was about to appeal from the judgment of the King's Bench, James allowed him to go free, on giving a bond for the amount of the fine. He eagerly joined the Revolution scheme, and was one of those who signed the invitation to William of Orange. When William landed in England, Devonshire appeared in arms at Derby, and proceeded to Nottingham, which became the head-quarters of the northern insurrection. A meeting of peers was held at his house to discuss the settlement of the crown. Soon after the Revolution he was made lord high steward, and knight of the Garter. On the departure of William to Ireland, Devonshire was created one of the Council of Nine, and vigorously superintended the fitting-out of the fleet. In 1690 he accompanied the king to Holland. He was accused, apparently falsely, by Preston of dealings with St. Germain, but the king declined to listen to the confession of the informer. He was created Duke of Devonshire and Marquis of Hartington in 1694. On William's departure for the Netherlands he was appointed one of the lords justices. We subsequently find him declaring against the bill on the Irish land-grants. He also opposed the second Partition Treaty, on which his opinion had not been asked. He was present at the death of William III. He was created lord steward in the reign of Queen Anne. He accompanied her to Cambridge in 1705, and was created an LL.D. He died, professing repentance, at Devonshire House, Piccadilly.

Cawnpore, MASSACRE OF (1857). On June 4 the Cawnpore regiments mutinied, plundered the treasury, and set off to Delhi. On the 6th they were brought back by Nana Sahib (q.v.), and invested the Residency. Not fewer than 1,000 persons had taken refuge there, and they prolonged the defence from June 6 to June 24, till the ammunition and provisions were all gone. Then Nana Sahib offered to transmit them safely to Allahabad on condition of surrender. The offer was accepted, and on the 27th the survivors, men, women, and children, were marched down to the boats which had been prepared for them, in number about 450. They had no sooner embarked than a murderous fire was opened on them from both banks; some got off in their boats; but their crews had deserted them, and one by one they were again captured. A considerable number were at once shot, and otherwise put to death, but some 200 women and children were reserved for massacre later. After Havelock's victory at the Pandoo bridge, July 15, it was decided that they should be put to death. They were all brutally destroyed the following day; some by shot, some by sword-cuts; the bodies were cast into a well, and there is no doubt that many were thrown in while still alive. Caxton, WILLIAM (1422 ?-91), the first English printer, was born near Hadlow, in Kent, and apprenticed to a rich London mercer in 1438. He left England in 1441 to transact business in connexion with his trade in the Low Countries, and finally took up his residence at Bruges, where he remained until 1470. He joined there the gild of Merchant Adventurers, who had a depot in the city. In 1465 Caxton was formally promoted to the office of governor of the gild, but he seems to have exercised the functions of governor from 1462 onwards. Soon afterwards he, together with another English envoy, was entrusted by Edward IV with the task of renewing an expiring commercial treaty between England and Burgundy. In 1470 Caxton used his influence at Bruges in behalf of Edward IV, who was taking refuge there from the Lancastrians, and in the next year the Duchess of Burgundy offered him a post at her court. By the duchess's command he completed, in 1471, a translation into English of a popular French collection of romances concerning the Trojan War. He seems to have learned the art of printing at Cologne, and in 1474 he formed a connexion with Colard Mansion, who had set up a press in Bruges about a year earlier. Together they printed Caxton's translation—"The Recuyell of the Historyes of Troye"—and 1474 has been the year assigned as the date of the production of this, the first English-printed book. The experiment proved eminently successful, and another of Caxton's translations—"The Game and Playe of the Chess"—issued from the same press in 1475. In 1476 Caxton arrived in England with new type, and set up a press near the western entrance to Westminster Abbey. During the following fifteen years he printed many works—chivalric romances, religious works, and translations. His patrons included Edward IV, Richard III, and Henry VII, and the chief noblemen and many merchants of the day. Caxton was buried in St. Margaret's churchyard, outside Westminster Abbey.

Cayman Islands, a group of three West Indian islands, forming since 1863 a dependency to Jamaica, were discovered by Columbus, who called them "Las Tortugas" (turtles). They were never occupied by Spain, but colonized by the British from Jamaica. They are administered by a commissioner and a local assembly whose laws are subject to the assent of the governor of Jamaica (q.v.).

Ceadwalla, KING OF WESSEX (685-89), was a descendant of Ceawlin (q.v.). His name, which is the same as the Welsh Cadwallon, is generally considered to bespeak a British origin, and in support of this view it may be mentioned that his brother was called Mul, i.e., half-breed, or a man of mixed descent. He first appears in history as a free lance and adventurer, and in 685 we find him invading and subduing Sussex. He was, however, subsequently expelled. Returning to Wessex, he claimed the throne, and forced his kinsman Centwine to retire into a monastery. In 686 he conquered Sussex a second time, and then the Isle of Wight and the Meon valley; and he twice ravaged Kent. In 688 he abdicated, and went on a pilgrimage to Rome, where he was baptized by the pope, and received the name of Peter. He died in April 689. [WESSEX.]

Ceawlin, KING OF WESSEX, succeeded to the throne in the latter half of the sixth century. He is said to have been the son of Cynric. Under his leadership the West Saxons enlarged their boundaries and the Britons were driven back. In 568 he defeated Ethelbert of Kent at Wibbandun (? Wimbledon), and three years later gained a great victory over the Britons at Bedford, which brought the important towns of Aylesbury, Lenborough, Bensington, and Eynsham under his dominion. In 577 he won a victory at Dereham, near Bath, in which three British kings fell, and as a result of this success he obtained possession of Bath, Gloucester, and Cirencester (or perhaps Worcester). In 584, attempting to extend his conquests still further westwards, he suffered a check at Fethanlea, the site of which is unknown, but after this he is said to have made an alliance with the Britons against Ethelbert, by whom he was defeated at Wodnesbeorh (? Wanborough, about three miles from Swindon) and driven out of his kingdom (? 592). In 593 he died. Ceawlin is reckoned as the second Bretwalda in the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," Aella of Sussex being the first and Ethelbert of Kent the third. [WESSEX.]

Cecil, EDWARD, VISCOUNT WIMBLEDON (1572-1638), was an admiral who is chiefly known to history as having in 1625 commanded a disastrous expedition against Cadiz, which was to form part of a general attack on Spain, planned by Charles I and Buckingham. The appointment proved very unfortunate. Cecil failed to destroy the shipping in the harbour of Cadiz, and was soon compelled to re-embark, owing to the disorderly behaviour of his crews. After having allowed the Plate fleet from the West Indies to escape him, he returned to England. On the return voyage pestilence, due to bad food, broke out, but Buckingham's influence saved Cecil from punishment.

Biography by C. Dalton, 1885.

Cecil, ROBERT, EARL OF SALISBURY (1563-1612), the son of William, Lord Burghley, by his second wife, was appointed a secretary of state in 1596, after a distinguished parliamentary career, in spite of the intrigues of the Earl of Essex to procure that office for Sir Thomas Bodley. On the death of his father he managed to obtain a large share of the queen's confidence, and so roused the enmity of Essex as to cause him to attempt his removal from court: Cecil was subsequently a chief instrument in the earl's disgrace and fall. During the last few years of Elizabeth's life, Cecil was engaged in a secret correspondence with James VI, and on her death was the first to proclaim the new king, by whom he was confirmed in all his offices. Cecil, who was the bitter enemy of Spain, found himself at variance with James on that point, but nevertheless managed to become so indispensable a minister that he was created in 1604 Viscount Cranborne, and in the following year Earl of Salisbury. In 1608, on the death of Thomas, Earl of Dorset, he became lord treasurer, and acquired immense power, being practically the king's only minister. He died in 1612, as it was said, "of too much business." The four years of his government were marked by vigorous administration, and by disputes on the question of the prerogative of the Crown in taxation, the chief example of which was the issue of the "Book of Rates." [JAMES I.] Salisbury was a man of wisdom and experience, who kept up the traditions of Elizabeth's government in the court of James.

Biography by Algernon Cecil, 1915.

Cecil, ROBERT ARTHUR TALBOT GASCOYNE, 3RD MARQUIS OF SALISBURY (1830-1903), was educated at Eton and Christ Church; was elected to a fellowship at All Souls College; and was returned to parliament for Stamford as Conservative member in 1853. He represented that borough till 1868, when he succeeded to the marquissate. In Lord Derby's third administration he was, in July 1866, appointed secretary of state for India, but resigned on account of certain parts of the Reform Bill in the following year. In 1869 he was elected chancellor of the University of Oxford in succession to Lord Derby. In 1874 he again took office as secretary of state for India. During his tenure of office he introduced and carried the University Commission Bill for the reform of the colleges of the two universities. In 1878 he became secretary of state for foreign affairs, and in that capacity accompanied Beaconsfield to the conference at Berlin. He retired from office with his chief (1880); and on the death of the latter became leader of the Conservative party in the House of Lords. In 1885 he became premier and foreign secretary, and was again prime minister in 1886, taking in addition (January 1887) the foreign secretary's portfolio. In 1895 he once more became premier and foreign secretary. He resigned office in 1902.

Cecil, THOMAS, 1ST EARL OF EXETER (1542-1623), the eldest son of Lord Burghley, was one of the leaders of Elizabeth's troops against the northern rebels in 1569, and he took part in the Scottish expedition in favour of the Regent Moray. He subsequently did good service in the Low Countries, in reward for which he was made governor of the Brille, 1585. He was created Earl of Exeter by James I in 1605.

Cecil, WILLIAM, LORD BURGHLEY (1520-1598), born at Bourn in Lincolnshire, was the son of Richard Cecil, master of the robes to Henry VIII, who educated him for the law. Having married the sister of Sir John Cheke, he became intimate with the Protector Somerset, his friendship being increased by his second marriage with the daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, the tutor of Edward VI. In 1547 he accompanied the Protector on his expedition to Scotland, and in the following year became secretary of state. On the fall of the Protector, he was imprisoned for a short time, but speedily restored to favour, and throughout the reign of Edward VI continued to perform the duties of secretary of state. Though no favourer of Northumberland's scheme for altering the succession, he was at length induced to sign "the device" as a witness; and at this most critical period of his career managed to avoid the displeasure of Mary; he conformed to the Catholic religion, and became very friendly with Pole. Before Mary's death, Cecil entered into correspondence with the Princess Elizabeth, on whose accession he found himself at once in high favour at court; he was immediately appointed secretary of state, and for forty years enjoyed the entire confidence of the queen, to whom he was "the oracle she consulted on every emergency, and whose answers she generally obeyed." During almost the whole of Elizabeth's reign, Sir William Cecil may be said to have practically directed the affairs of the nation; though on one or two occasions, disgusted at the treatment he received from his bitter enemies, the courtiers, chief of whom was Leicester, he was on the point of retiring altogether from public life. In 1560 he went to Scotland, as commissioner, to end the war, and on his return counteracted the progress which the Spanish ambassador, De Quadra, had made in his absence, by strongly advocating an alliance with the Huguenot leaders. In spite of his anti-Spanish policy, Cecil was no favourite with the people; and the court party, headed by Leicester, whose marriage with the queen he strenuously opposed, strove hard to work his ruin. The perfection to which he brought his system of espionage, by which every plot against the queen was known to her ministers almost as soon as it was hatched, undoubtedly, on more than one occasion, saved Elizabeth from assassination and the country from an internal war, though it provoked against Cecil the wrath of men like Arundel and Norfolk, whose aims he thwarted. His great scheme was the formation of a Protestant confederacy, to consist of England, Sweden, Denmark, the German princes, the Scots Protestants, and the Calvinists in France and Flanders, against the Catholic powers; his great stumbling-block was the Queen of Scots, whose execution he did not cease to advise as absolutely necessary for the safety of the queen and of the realm. More than once was the assassin's dagger directed against Cecil himself, and in 1572 the plot of Berney and Mather might have been successful but for the minister's spies. The great blot on his character and on his administration is the persecution of the Catholics for practising the rites and ceremonies of their religion, to which Cecil, and even Elizabeth herself, had not scrupled to conform in the time of their need. To his economical spirit may be ascribed that unprepared state of the arsenals and the navy which so materially increased the danger to be apprehended from the Armada. The history of Cecil, who in 1571 had been created Lord Burghley, from the accession of Elizabeth to his death, August 4, 1598, is the history of England, so closely is his name identified with the whole current of the foreign and domestic policy of the reign. He can hardly, perhaps, claim to be called a great man; but he was an adroit, skilful, and sensible statesman, of tried judgment, untiring perseverance and application, and boundless industry in mastering details.

Celts in the British Isles. The Celts form one among that large group of peoples which is commonly called the Aryan group, and which includes nearly all the present inhabitants of Europe with several considerable peoples of the East. The name Celt was that by which the people were first known to the Greeks, whereas the Romans always knew them under the name of Galli, or Gauls; both these words probably mean the same thing, namely the warriors, or, according to Professor Rhys, the kilt-wearing, or clothed people. Another name by which the Celts of South Britain were known is Cymry—the name still used by the Welsh to designate themselves—and which possibly reappears in the Cimbri spoken of by the Roman historians. There can be no doubt that the Celts at one time formed the most powerful confederacy of nations in Europe. Gradually the Celtic peoples were driven back from their more easterly possessions by the Romans, and the kindred races in the south, and in the north by the Teutonic peoples ; so that at the time when the light of history first shines on them with any clearness we find them in possession only of the three most western lands of Europe—namely, the Iberian Peninsula, Gaul, and the British Isles.

It must not be supposed that the inhabitants of these lands, though they consisted fundamentally of the same race, formed in any sense a single nationality, or spoke an identical language. In the British Islands some dialects of Celtic are still spoken and others are but recently extinct. These we can classify. They are the Welsh, or Cymric (Cymraeg), the Cornish, the Manx (dialect spoken in the Isle of Man), the Irish (Erse or Gaidhelic), and the Highland Scottish, or Scottish Gaelic. To these we must add the only other living Celtic tongue, the Breton of Brittany, otherwise called Armoric. These six dialects divide themselves into two classes, the Gaidhelic (Goidelic) and the British or Cymric. The first includes Irish, Manx, and Scottish Gaelic ; the second comprises the Welsh, Cornish, and Armoric. It is quite possible that this division was in force as long ago as the date of the first Roman invasion, so that the inhabitants of the British Islands then consisted of two great nationalities, the Britons in the lower part of Britain, and the Gaels in the highlands of Scotland and in Ireland. There can be little doubt that of the two the nationality of the Britons was more nearly allied to that of the Gauls.

Many of our geographical names serve to remind us of these two main divisions of the Celtic race. The word Gaidhel (which is, of course, etymologically allied to Gaul) is preserved in the words Gael and Gaelic, now used only for the Scottish Gaels, though in the native Irish the same word (Gaedhil) is applied to that nationality and language ; it is preserved again in Galway in Ireland, and in Galloway in Scotland, and in many lesser local names. The word Cymry, which is still the name by which the Welsh call themselves, has been for us Latinized into Cambria, and remains again in Cumberland (Cumbria), which once included a much larger area than it now includes. Britain, Briton, are names which have been bestowed from without—namely, by the Greeks and Romans—while Wales, Cornwall, have likewise been bestowed from without by the Teutonic invaders of Britain. All the Celtic nationalities were, as we know, an immigrant people into Europe, and it is not to be supposed that when they made their way into these islands they found them empty of inhabitants, or that no traces of these earlier races continued to exist after the Celts had been long settled there. Some of the tribes which Cæsar counted among the Celtic inhabitants of Britain may have belonged to this earlier stock, in particular the Silures, who inhabited the south of Wales and Monmouthshire, near Caerleon (Isca Silurum), and a part at least of the tribes of Devonshire and Cornwall have been designated as representing these more primitive inhabitants of the British Isles, who were, it is generally believed, allied to the original inhabitants of Spain, the Iberians, and to the Basques, their modern representatives. It would seem that the Gaelic branch preceded the Cymric in the course of invasion, and that the latter as they advanced drove the Gaels towards the north and west. At the time of Cæsar's invasion the Cymric Celts may be said to have composed the body of the population south of the Firths of Forth and of Clyde ; and as the names Britannia, Briton, were by the Romans bestowed only on the country and the people in the southern part of the island, the word Briton may be used synonymously with Cymric-Celt. In fact, the Cymric people came in after-times to designate themselves as Brythons. When first known to the Romans, therefore, the Britons are to be looked upon as one nation, with a certain admixture of more primitive elements, and with the addition of one intrusive nationality, the Belgæ (q.v.), who had made a settlement in the south of the island. The Belgæ were likewise Celtic by blood, but were not closely allied to the native inhabitants of Britain. These Belgæ seem to have been more civilized than the rest of the inhabitants, and to have offered the most formidable resistance to the Roman arms. The exact districts over which they extended cannot be ascertained. The centre of their possessions probably lay somewhere near the borders of Sussex and Hampshire.

With the exception, then, of some primitive tribes and the intrusive Belgæ, the Britons from the Channel to the Firths of Forth and Clyde were, at the time of Cæsar's invasion, essentially one people belonging to the Cymric branch of the Celtic family [BRITONS]. North of the firths the land was inhabited by a people who were to the classic writers first known as Caledonians, but afterwards by the Romans known as Picts. This name, it is well known, means simply the painted or stained (Picti), and was bestowed upon all those who had not adopted the Roman civilization, but adhered to their national system of staining themselves with woad. Concerning the nationality of the Picts there is considerable dispute. Tacitus says that they were of German origin. This assertion was formerly very generally accepted, and still is by some scholars. It is more probable that they were of a Celtic stock. Skene, who undertook an exhaustive examination of the question, arrived at the conclusion that they belonged, not to the Cymric but to the Gaelic branch of the Celtic family [PICTS]. In Ireland again the inhabitants were probably to be divided into several nationalities. There was, in the first place, undoubtedly a substratum of the same primitive stock of which we have noticed traces in England. Irish tradition tells us of four nationalities who, at different times, held rule in the island, namely, the Nemidians, the Firbolgs, the Tuatha da Danann, and the Milesians, or Scots. Should we set aside what seems purely mythical in the tradition, and with that the Nemidians, of whom nothing can be made, it is not unlikely that the three names which remain do really represent three peoples, out of which the Irish nation is composed. The Firbolgs, who are described as a dark and slavish race, perhaps represent the oldest inhabitants of Iberian stock, while the Tuatha da Danann and the Milesians may have been two different branches of the Gaelic race, having somewhat different appearances and national characteristics. The Milesians, who eventually obtained the supremacy, seem to be identical with the Scots, who gave its name first to Ireland, and later on to Scotland. [Scots.]

Such is the general ethnology of the Celtic people of Great Britain and Ireland. What we know of their social life and religion at the time of the Roman conquest is gained almost solely from the testimony of Roman historians, and therefore applies chiefly to the inhabitants of South Britain, who were the only people to come in contact with the invader. We have some other sources of information in the Welsh and Irish traditions, and in all that is most ancient of what has been preserved of their ancient laws, especially of the Brehon Laws of the Irish [BREHON]. This last source of information shows us that the Celts, where untouched by Roman civilization, adhered to a form of social organization which was, at one time, pretty general among the Aryan peoples. The distinctive features in their state of society were that each tribe, or, more strictly speaking, each village, constituted a state in itself, a political unit whose tie of union with any other village was only of a very loose character. At the same time, the tie which united together the inhabitants of any single village was remarkably close, most of the land, for example, being held, not individually, but in common, by the whole body. This form of society is commonly distinguished by students as the Village Community (see Sir H. S. Maine, "Village Communities of the East and West"). The religion of the inhabitants of Britain must have been the same as that of the Gauls, if, as Cæsar tells us, the special home or college of the Gaulish priests, the Druids, was in this island [DRUIDS]. Of their creed we do not know much. There are, however, good reasons for believing that it very closely resembled the religion of the Teutonic neighbours of the Celts, of which some traces have come down to us. As with the German races, and as with the Romans themselves, the highest divinity was probably a god of the sky and of the thunder. Beside him stood a sun-god whom the Gauls, when they became Latinized, identified completely with Apollo, and who perhaps corresponded to the Freyr or Frô of the Teutonic peoples. His original Gaulish name may have been Granus. To form with these a trilogy we have a god of war, probably similar to the Teutonic Zio or Tiw, and called by the Roman writers Mars. The chief goddess of the Gauls is called by Cæsar Minerva, but we have proof that they worshipped a mother goddess who, like the Roman Lucina, presided over births, and whose image, holding on her lap a child, is frequently dug up in France, and always taken by the peasantry for an image of the Virgin and Child. To this pantheon of nature-gods was joined a lower form of nature-worship, especially an adoration of trees and streams. As to the Teutons, the oak was to the Gauls an especially sacred tree. The Celtic worship of streams was more peculiar, and the traces of it still survive in the special reverence paid to wells in Brittany, in the more Celtic parts of Great Britain, and in Ireland.

Census, THE, a numbering of the population of Great Britain and Ireland, was appointed to be taken every tenth year by Act 41, George III, c. 15 (1801). The first census was accordingly taken in 1801. At each recurrence of the census it has been rendered more comprehensive, and at the present time elicits a vast amount of valuable and accurate information. It is taken simultaneously throughout the kingdom by special officers. The official figures since 1801 are as follows:—

1811	18,609,116	1891	38,104,975
1821	21,272,187	1901	41,976,827
1831	24,392,485	1911	45,370,530
1841	27,036,450	(exclusive of forces abroad)
1851	27,724,056	1921	42,767,530
1861	29,321,288	(Great Britain only)
1871	31,145,379

The first Imperial Census of Great Britain and Ireland, the colonies and dependencies, was taken in 1871, when the population was 234,762,593. In 1881 it was 315,885,000. In 1926 the estimated population was 450,094,000.

Central India. The official name for the group of feudatory native states in the centre of India, comprising the dominions of Holkar and Sindhia, and the states of Bhopal and Dhar. [HOLKAR, etc.]

Central Provinces and Berar, a province of British India, was formed by the amalgamation (1903) of the Central Provinces and the Hyderabad Assigned Districts. It comprises the five districts of Jabalpur, Narmada, Nagpur, Chhatigarh and Berar, which cover a total area of 113,281 sq. miles, and are divided into 22 districts, Nagpur being the capital. The population in 1926 was 13,912,760. The original Central Provinces were formed in 1861.

Cenwalh, King of the West Saxons (648-672), was the son and successor of Cynegils. He tried to effect in Wessex a relapse into paganism, but his expulsion by Penda, whose sister he had repudiated, led to his seeking refuge in East Anglia, where he was converted to Christianity. After having recovered his kingdom he won two great victories over the Britons at Bradford-on-Avon (652) and the Pens (658) and extended his dominions beyond the Parret. In 661, however, Wulfhere of Mercia invaded Wessex, laying everything waste as far as the shores of the Channel, and ceding the Isle of Wight and the land of the Meonwaras to the King of Sussex. When Cenwalh died Wessex relapsed into anarchy.

Cenwulf, King of the Mercians (796-821), was descended from Cenwalh, the brother of Penda. His reign was a very prosperous one, and he retained for Mercia that supremacy which had been won by Offa. He completed the conquest of Kent, which he granted out to his brother Cuthred; while to conciliate the Church, he suppressed the archbishopric of Lichfield, which Offa had founded. He was victorious over the Welsh, and his army is said to have penetrated as far as Snowdon.

Ceolnoth, Archbishop of Canterbury (833-70), made his episcopate important in many ways. In 838 he assisted at the Council of Kingston, when a treaty of peace and alliance was agreed upon between the church of Canterbury and the two West-Saxon kings, Ecgbert and his son Ethelwulf. This treaty laid the foundation of those amicable relations which we find existing ever after between the descendants of Cerdic and the successors of Augustine. Twice during Ceolnoth's life Canterbury was attacked and plundered by the Danes, but the church and the monastery of St. Augustine were spared, probably by the payment of a heavy ransom on the part of the archbishop, who also contributed towards raising a fleet against the Danes.

Ceolwulf, King of the Northumbrians (d. 764), succeeded on the death of Osric in 729 (?). In 731 he was seized by his enemies, and confined in a cloister, but was afterwards released by his friends and reseat on the throne. He was a patron of learning, and to him Bæda dedicated his "Ecclesiastical History." After reigning eight years he abdicated in 737 and spent the remaining years of his life as a monk at Lindisfarne.

Bæda, "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle."

Ceorl is a word which occurs in the laws of the kings before the Norman Conquest in the following senses:—(1) man—vir, maritus; (2) peasant, rusticus; (3) the ordinary non-noble freeman. In this, its ordinary constitutional sense, we find (a) ceorl opposed to eorl, as simple to gentle; (b) the ceorlisc man opposed to gesithcundman and thegen, and in the Northumbrian ecclesiastical law to landgæng cyninges-thegen; (c) ceorl used as equivalent to twyhyndeman in the West-Saxon and Mercian laws, and in opposition to the sixhyndeman and twelfhyndeman. The ceorl, or small freeman, rather than the laet or wealh, constituted the real basis of the early English state. His normal holding was the "hide," which was no fixed acreage of land, but simply that amount necessary for the maintenance of an average free household. With the gradual feudalization of Anglo-Saxon society the position of the ceorl underwent important modifications. If he possessed no land, his position in a territorial constitution became extremely precarious. Though still a member of the local courts and of the host, though still fully "law-worthy," and though his wergild was still paid to the kindred, the landless ceorl was compelled, by a law of Athelstan, to choose a lord to answer for his good behaviour. The right of selecting his own master alone distinguished him from the predial serf. In a later stage, even the small land-owning ceorl was practically obliged to commend himself for safety's sake to some great proprietor; and the "liber homo qui ire potest cum terra quo voluerit" of Domesday represents this large class of voluntary dependents. Many grades of ceorls thus spring up according to their relations to their "hlaford." But while the less prosperous ceorls thus lost their independence, the disappearance of the blood nobility of the eorl helped the more thriving of their class to attain that higher status which no longer depended on birth alone. The ceorl with five hides of land, with house and church, a special relation to the Crown, and a special jurisdiction over his property, became "of thegn right worthy." Yet, on the whole, the growth of thegnhood depressed the "ceorlisc man." Its first principle was dependence; and, as on the continent, freedom withered away before feudalism. The very name ceorl is not found in Domesday, and its equivalents, bordarius, cotarius, cotsetus, socmannus, villanus, indicate that the process which degraded him to the "unfree villein" had almost become complete. The lawyers of the twelfth century finished the process. The bad meaning attached to the word "churl" is an indication of the disrepute into which this once honourable title had fallen.

Cerdic, according to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, was King of the West Saxons at the end of the fifth century, being ninth in descent from Woden. The Chronicle relates that he came to Britain in company with his son Cynric in 495, landing at the place which is called Cerdies-ora. His early wars were not attended with great success; but in 508, having made an alliance with Aesc and Aella, he totally defeated the Britons. In 514, reinforcements having arrived, he continued his conquests, and in 519 "Cerdic and Cynric obtained the kingdom of the West-Saxons" in consequence of a victory at Cerdiesford. In 530 they conquered the Isle of Wight, and made a terrible slaughter of the Britons at Whitgarabyrig. Four years later Cerdic died. From Cerdic all our kings, with the exception of Canute, Hardicanute, the two Harolds and William the Conqueror, are said to be descended. The story as given in the Chronicle has, however, been very generally discredited as a result of recent research, and the modern view is that Wessex was settled by bands operating from the Thames valley and not from the coast. Cerdic and Cynric are regarded by many modern authorities as purely legendary characters. [WESSEX, KINGDOM OF.]

Cerones, THE, were an ancient Celtic tribe occupying the west coast of Inverness and part of Argyll.

Cessation, THE, was the name given, during the Ulster rebellion of 1641 and the following years, to a truce for one year concluded on September 15, 1643, between the Marquis of Ormonde and the confederate Irish at Drogheda. The English parliament impeached Ormonde on account of it, and the Scots refused to recognize it. The native Irish party, headed by the legate, were also opposed to it. It had a very bad effect on the Royalists in England; and the king's object of getting help from Ireland in troops and money was only very partially gained.

Ceylon, or the island of dusky leaves, a British island off the south-east of India, was known to the Chinese as the Island of Jewels and to the Greeks as the Land of Hyacinth and Ruby. It has had a chequered history. Buddhism, introduced in the fourth century, flourished for about six hundred years under a ruling priesthood, in spite of invasions from India. First visiting the island in 1505, the Portuguese set up a military occupation and introduced Christianity. They were expelled by the Dutch (1656), who were in turn (1795-6) driven out by the British and their territory annexed to the Presidency of Madras. An unsuccessful attempt to conquer the mountainous interior from the King of Kandy in 1803 was followed by a complete British occupation in 1815, when the king was deposed and the subsequent rebellion of the natives crushed. The 1831 constitutional commission was followed by the grant of a charter (1833) under which the judicial system was revised, trial by jury adopted, appointments thrown open to Cingalese competition, and three natives nominated members of the legislative council. Insurrections organized by the Buddhist priests were crushed in 1835 and 1848. The main lines of the constitution (governor, executive, and legislative councils), together with Roman-Dutch law, have remained unchanged, though modifications have been made. The executive council of five officials (1833) was enlarged in 1919 to seven, of which three were unofficial members. In 1920 representative government was granted, the majority of the legislative council being made elective (23 out of 37), while in 1923 this was enlarged to 34 out of 49. An interesting feature of the constitution is the representation of small groups. Twenty-one are elected to represent territorial divisions irrespective of race or religion, while there are three European representatives, three Moslem, two Indian, two to represent the Burgher communities, and one the Tamils of Colombo. Nominated members represent the Chamber of Commerce and the Low Country Products Association. The legislature, however, does not control the executive, which in 1922 exercised the discretionary power granted to the governor to enact a bill (re officials' salaries) in spite of the popular house's veto. The constitution, for which dyarchy on the Indian model was refused by the imperial government, is due to be revised in 1928 with a view to the further extension of the grant of self-government. The Maldivé Archipelago, a group of about a hundred and fifty islands, inhabited by Moslem fishermen and cocoa planters, is a dependency of Ceylon to which an annual tribute is paid by the sultan.

Chalgrove Field, THE BATTLE OF (June 18, 1643), was fought between the Royalist cavalry, under Prince Rupert, who had pushed forward from Oxford on a raid, and a body of Parliamentary troops, under Hampden. The encounter, which was more of the nature of a skirmish than a battle, is memorable as the one in which John Hampden received his death-wound. Chalgrove is a small village situated ten miles south-east of Oxford, between the Thames and the Chiltern Hills.

Chaloner, SIR THOMAS (1521-65), a statesman, a soldier, and a man of letters, whilst quite a boy entered the service of the Emperor Charles V, whom he accompanied on the expedition to Algiers, 1541, barely escaping with his life. Soon afterwards he returned to England, and was present at the battle of Pinkie, 1547, where he greatly distinguished himself. He was clerk to the council of Henry VIII, and a faithful servant of Edward VI, but his religion debarred him from the favour of Mary, although it did not exclude him from her service. Under Elizabeth he acquired considerable renown as an able diplomatist, and was sent as ambassador to the Low Countries and Spain, remaining at Madrid for two or three years before his death. Sir Thomas was the author of a treatise, "De Republica Anglorum Instauranda" (London, 1579), and some other tracts.

Châlons, THE BATTLE OF (1273), began with a tournament, to which Edward I was challenged by the Count of Châlons-sur-Marne when on his way back to England from the Crusade. Feeling on both sides ran so high that the encounter developed into a pitched battle, in the course of which Edward unhorsed his opponent, and serious losses were inflicted on the French.

Châlus, a castle in the Limousin, belonging to a vassal of the Viscount of Limoges, was besieged by Richard I in 1199. It was before the walls of this fortress that the king received his death-wound.

Chamber, THE. Chamber means bedroom. The king's chamber or camera was, therefore, the king's bedroom, where the king slept and stored his clothes, money, and jewels. With the help of his chamber servants, the chamberlains, he transacted his confidential, notably his financial, business. Thus, chamber came to mean an office and a treasury as well as a room. After the Norman Conquest, which gave to the king a large revenue from taxation, the chamber became the king's financial office. By Henry I's reign there was growing out of it the exchequer, the first public office to emerge from the royal household. But even then the king's chamber or camera curie retained some of its old functions. In the thirteenth century, however, the king's wardrobe [WARDROBES] began to encroach upon the chamber as household office of finance. Yet in the fourteenth century the chamber regained some of its lost power. Edward II tried to use it to withstand an unfriendly baronage. He ordered the keepers of certain lands under his control to account to the chamber instead of to the exchequer in order to increase the chamber's resources. This practice began with the confiscated lands of the Templars, and was extended to the forfeitures of the rebels or "contrarians" in 1321-2. To administer these lands, the chamber added to its staff. It also received the custody of the king's secret seal, set up by Edward II when the barons gained control of the privy seal. The greatest chamber development took place while the younger Hugh Despenser was king's chamberlain, but the reservation of lands was arrested after 1322, and the system destroyed by the revolution of 1326. Soon after Edward III came of age, he revived the custom of reserving lands to the chamber, and a special seal, the griffin seal, was devised for the business connected with the chamber estate. This policy prevailed from 1332 to 1356. Clerks of the chamber, especially William Kilsby, played an important part in the early campaigns of the Hundred Years' War. So many-sided was the work of the chamber, that we are in some danger of regarding the chamber as not one institution, but several. The chamber lands, however, proved so unprofitable that in 1355-6 they were exchanged for a definite quarterly allowance from the exchequer. With the abolition of the estate, the griffin seal and the special staff disappeared. The chamber remained important as the mouthpiece of royal wishes and as the king's privy purse, but it was no longer a tool for despotism. Richard II, when attempting to make himself an autocrat, found no place for the chamber, although chamber officers were among his intimate advisers. During his reign, the growth of a signet office out of the chamber, under the secretary, took the control of the secret seal, now called the signet, away from the chamber. For the greater part of the fifteenth century the chamber was of little administrative importance, but with the strong Tudor monarchy there came a chamber revival. Later in the Tudor period, the chamber was virtually absorbed by the exchequer, when some chamber methods were added to exchequer routine. Then the chamber remained only as a branch of the royal household. Some activities of the modern lord chamberlain's office, notably the licensing of plays, bring into modern history a shadowy survival of the former jurisdiction of the king's chamber.

Chamberlain, THE LORD GREAT, had his origin in the Norman period. He was the officer in charge of the king's chamber, and, as such, was originally the chief financial minister of the royal household. In time, however, these duties passed into the hands of deputies, and the functions which remained to the lord great chamberlain were mainly of a ceremonial character. In the twelfth century the office became hereditary in the family of de Vere, with whose descendants it still remains. The lord great chamberlain at the present time has charge of the palace of Westminster, and is, in particular, intimately associated with the House of Lords, in which he has an office. He presides over the arrangements for the opening of parliament and assists at the introduction of peers into the House of Lords at their creation. He also discharges certain ceremonial services at coronations, and takes an active part in investing the king with the royal insignia. He must be carefully distinguished from the Lord Chamberlain, who is the chief officer of the royal household, a peer, privy councillor, and member of the government. To him falls the administration of various household departments, including the bedchamber, privy chamber, and presence chamber, the wardrobe, guardroom, and chapels royal; as well as the supervision of state ceremonies. The duty of licensing plays was assigned to him by 10 George II, c. 28, which apparently arises from the fact that the players attached to the royal household were originally subject to his jurisdiction.

Chamberlain, THE RIGHT HON. JOSEPH (1836-1914), after an active municipal career in Birmingham, became M.P. for that city in 1876. In the second Gladstone administration he was president of the board of trade, with a seat in the cabinet. In the third he was president of the local government board, but resigned (March 1886) on the Home Rule question. In 1887 he went to Canada as British commissioner in the fisheries dispute. In 1895 he became colonial secretary in Lord Salisbury's cabinet. In 1903 he resigned his position in the cabinet, in order to advocate untrammelled a new fiscal policy of tariff reform (q.v.). He suffered in 1906 a severe illness, which necessitated his withdrawal from public life. He died in 1914.

Chamberlain, SIR JOSEPH AUSTEN (b. 1863), eldest son of the preceding, was educated at Rugby and Cambridge. In 1892 he was elected as a Liberal Unionist for East Worcestershire. He was civil lord of the admiralty, 1895-1900; financial secretary to the treasury, 1900-2; postmaster-general and member of the cabinet, 1902-3; chancellor of the exchequer, 1903-6; secretary of state for India in the Asquith coalition of 1915; and a member of the war cabinet in April 1918. He became again chancellor of the exchequer in 1918, and leader of the House of Commons in 1921. He lost the confidence of his party, however, by his advocacy of the Irish treaty of December 1921, and accordingly was not included in the last cabinet of Bonar Law. But he returned to office as foreign secretary in the second Baldwin administration of 1924, and, after successfully carrying the principle of a Guarantee Pact as against the Geneva Protocol (q.v.), he played a great part in the negotiations which led to the Locarno Treaties (q.v.) of December 1925. For this last achievement he received the Order of the Garter.

Champion of England, THE, is an office peculiar to England. It is popularly supposed to have been instituted by William the Conqueror, and to have been held in the first instance by Robert or Roger Marmion; but the earliest authenticated reference is found under Henry I. Of the actual exercise of the office the earliest record dates from the accession of Richard II. The functions of the champion relate to the coronation. When this was carried out with full ceremonial his duty was to ride in complete armour into Westminster Hall during the coronation banquet, and there publicly to challenge to single combat any who should dispute the king's title. This ceremony has, however, not been observed since the coronation of George IV. The office is hereditary in the family of Dymoke, by whom it was exercised as early as the reign of Richard II.

Chancellor, RICHARD (d. 1556), was the founder of the English-Russian Company. Whilst on a voyage of discovery, to find the north-east passage to India, under the direction of Willoughby and Cabot, in 1553, he doubled the North Cape (a feat never before accomplished by the English), and reached Archangel. Thence he journeyed to Moscow, and established the first trading relations between England and Russia. On his return to England he established a company to trade with Muscovy. It was incorporated by Queen Mary.

Chancery. The Court of Chancery and its equitable jurisdiction have occupied in England a unique position, and exercised a paramount influence on the development of the English legal system, especially on the laws relating to land. But the Chancery and the office of chancellor existed for more than three centuries before it became a court of jurisdiction at all. The office was at first purely ministerial. The cancellarius of Rome, the officer who sat behind the screen (cancelli) was merely a secretary; and the chancellor of the Norman kings, under whom this official first comes into notice, was simply the chief of the royal clerks who superintended them in drawing up writs, and kept the seal. As a clerk he was an ecclesiastic; and as an ecclesiastic nearest to the royal person, he was the king's chaplain, and "keeper of the king's conscience." Becket, when chancellor, is described as secundus a rege; he had fifty clerks under him; he held pleas with the constable and judges of the curia regis. This came to him only by way of delegation from the council, when to the king in council, as the fountain of justice, there came appeals from the lower royal courts, and petitions in cases where these courts would not or could not do justice. By the ordinance 22 Edward III all petitions that were "of grace" were to be referred to the chancellor. Henceforth petitions are addressed to the chancellor directly. Of these early petitions most seek redress in circumstances where ordinary justice might miscarry; as against a partial sheriff, an encroaching lord, or the keepers of a jail. So far the chancellor was exercising only the natural authority of a king's representative; since these were cases of trespass (vi et armis), in which cases the curia regis always interfered; and till modern times a bill in Chancery preserved the formal statement of a conspiracy to commit a trespass, as the ground on which the court was asked to interfere. The theory of trespass was soon enlarged, and the desire to avoid the procedures by compurgation or by ordeal of battle would cause many petitions for a hearing in the Chancery. The court was charged, too, with the preservation of royal rights, and the decision of technical points touching writs, patents, and grants issued by its clerks. Under Richard II it was to supervise the justices of the peace; under Henry VI to try admiralty cases, and so on. But all this would not have created in the Chancery its distinctive jurisdiction, nor have thrown it into rivalry and even hostility with the common law courts. Many great lawyers have treated this as a necessity inherent in the nature of law, and one paralleled in the actual system of Roman law. But the anomaly peculiar to England is that the equity, which is more or less truly said to soften and correct while it follows the law, is administered by a separate tribunal; so that the law itself has been thrown into an attitude of jealousy towards the equity which was to supplement and expand it, and "a man might lose his suit on one side of Westminster Hall and win it on the other." This anomaly may be historically traced to the common lawyers' own resistance to progress. They took up too early the view that their system was complete; for every wrong there existed a remedy, and the remedy must be by a form of writ. Cases, therefore, that could not be brought under the existing forms of writ would fail to obtain a hearing in the courts. The statute 13 Edward I, c. 24, therefore ordered that the Chancery should draw up new forms of writ "for like cases falling under like law and requiring like remedy." But the judges were now disinclined to allow their system to expand. In their jealousy of the Chancery clerks, they construed the statute as narrowly as possible, were loath to allow that any new case was a "like case," and declined to admit new forms of defence at all. It followed that new grounds of action and defence were left to the Chancery Court, which, in the next century, rapidly began to extend its action. The earliest recorded equity suit before the chancellor is a married woman's petition on an ante-nuptial agreement for a settlement, in the reign of Edward III.

The hostility shown by the Commons in parliament to this jurisdiction was due to the vagueness in the summons of the subpoena "to answer on certain matters," to the searching mode of inquiry pursued, perhaps also to the generous hearing ostentatiously offered to the poor. But their hostility embodied also the jealousy against investigation into land titles, and interference with the sacred franc-tenevements, and the jealousy of a jurisdiction so closely connected, by its principles and its administrators, with the Church. It is to be noticed that, except from 1371 to 1386, all the chancellors down to Sir Thomas More were ecclesiastics. The device itself of "a use," or grant, of lands to A to hold to the use of others, had originated with the Church, which had then protected the use by spiritual sanction. On the other hand, this and other modes of acquiring rights in land for the Church had been checked by successive Mortmain Acts: those of Henry III, Edward I, and Richard II. The similar attempts made by the Commons to check this growing Chancery jurisdiction failed; the first recorded enforcement of a use by the chancellor is in Henry V's reign; in that of Henry VI uses were firmly established; till by the Wars of the Roses most of the land of England was held subject to uses. By this condition of things the legal was divorced from the actual ownership of land; the feoffee to uses merely served as a screen to cestui qui use; this latter, being "he that had the use," enjoyed the profits unburdened with the liabilities. The machinery of a use made it easy to evade in every direction the rigour of the feudal land-law; so that land could thus be conveyed by mere word of mouth, could be conveyed freely or devised by will, or charged in any way for the benefit of others; the chancellor recognized and enforced all such dispositions. So far, it was a boon to society that the land system should thus have escaped from the feudal trammels; but it had now become an intolerable evil that the ownership of land should be just what the feudal law had guarded against, viz., secret, uncertain, and easy of transfer. Attempts had been made to remedy this; a statute of Henry VII, following a similar act of 50 Edward IV, had set a precedent for regarding the beneficiary as the real owner in the case of debts secured on the land. So, 1 Richard III, c. 1, allowed the beneficiary's conveyance to be valid without assent of the feoffees, and by 4 Henry VII, c. 15, the lord could claim wardship over the heir to lands held through a use. But the final blow at the system of uses was dealt by Henry VIII. In 1534 he carried the act which made uses forfeitable for treason, and two years later introduced the great Statute of Uses, 27 Henry VIII, c. 10, to put an end to the system once for all. But the narrow conservatism of the common lawyers, disguising itself as philosophical strictness of interpretation, was able to defeat the great legislative design. In the end the whole effect of the statute has been said to consist "in adding four words to every conveyance." For, following servilely the wording of the statute, the judges managed to exclude from its scope uses where the use was founded on a leasehold interest, where the use implied some active duties, or where a further use was raised upon the first use. It was held also not to apply to copyhold lands at all, nor where a use was held by a corporate body. Here, then, were a number of cases of obligation unrecognized by the common law, and left to be enforced by the Chancery courts, which had thus by Coke's time recovered under the name of "trusts" all that hold over transactions in land which the statute was to have transferred to the law courts. In the reign of Elizabeth the first collection of Chancery precedents was made and published, and by the time of the Stuarts the jurisdiction of the court was well settled to give relief in the same main subjects as it does now, viz., trust, fraud, accident, extremity. Its chief developments since that time have been in the direction of "implied trusts," and especially in the protection of mortgagors' "equity of redemption," the settled property of married women, and the estates of minors. The doctrine of "specific performance" has been its own creation. The court's main instrument besides imprisonment has been the adjudication of costs, and its strongest arm the injunction. The benefits conferred on English society by the Court of Chancery have been immense. Much of its semi-criminal jurisdiction has been renounced since the seventeenth century; but the year-books and petitions enable us to judge of the value of a strong court armed with the directest authority of the Crown, and deciding on enlightened principles with a prompt and elastic procedure in the ages whose supreme and chronic grievance was lack of governance. It must be admitted that this equity was not always ideal justice; the very completeness of the inquiries necessitated the long delays of a Chancery suit, just as the very elasticity of the procedure introduced a certain confusion and prolixity into the pleadings. Too much was left to the masters in Chancery and done in "secret chamber-work"; and above all, misled by the half truth that equity follows the law, there were hardships against which the chancellors had not, in the face of the judges, the courage to grant relief. But there were others which they boldly followed up, as in resisting, on grounds of "public policy," the creation of perpetuities, or in acting on the maxims, "He that seeks equity must do equity"; "Equity looks to the intent rather than the form"; "Equity considers as done that which ought to be done." But the greatest triumph has been the influence exerted by equity on the common law, which adopted the rules of equity as to the construction of deeds, the admissibility of "set-off," the power to change the venue and grant a new trial, the repudiation of penalties in a contract. So, too, the right to make a will of land, denied at law, was granted by Chancery, and had to be adopted by statute (32 Henry VIII). Finally, the Married Women's Property Act of 1883 is a practical monument of the victory of the Chancery and Roman law view as to the status of a married woman over the barbarous code in which her personality was merged in that of her husband. The lay chancellors who succeeded Sir Thomas More down to Lord Nottingham, i.e., from 1532 to 1673, contrasted unfavourably with the clerical founders of the great edifice. The Reformation interrupted the traditions of the office, and broke up the study of civil law; in the want of precedents the chancellors relied too much on intuition and common sense (as Lord Shaftesbury, in a more settled time, 1672, essayed to do, to his own discomfiture). This explains Selden's famous reproach, half-jesting, no doubt, "Equity is a roguish thing. . . . 'Tis all one as if we should make the standard for the measure of a foot the chancellor's foot. One chancellor has a long foot; another, a short foot; a third, an indifferent foot." The Tudor chancellors certainly seem to have deferred to the personal leanings of the sovereign. But no such reproach could be made of this or the last century, when equity became as much "a laboured connected system, governed by established rules, and bound down by precedents, as the common law" (Lord Eldon). Still the abuses of the court were numerous, and some of them had reached a monstrous pitch. Venality was the old canker of the court, and the memory of Bacon's offence was revived by similar charges against Lord Clarendon, by the impeachment of Lord Somers (1700) for corruption, by the flagitious sale of Church patronage by Sir N. Wright, till the accumulated popular indignation burst upon Lord Macclesfield, who was dismissed and heavily fined in 1725 for misuse of the "suits' fund" and open sale of offices. But even had every official had clean hands, the abuses of delay and prolixity would have remained an intolerable burden. The Restoration gave these abuses a fresh lease of life; the use of English was not enacted till 1730, nor registries till Anne's reign, and then only for Yorkshire and Middlesex. Meantime, the abolition of the ancient Courts of Wards and of Requests increased the business, which accumulated with the wonderful growth of wealth and population in George III's reign, and with the proverbial dilatoriness of Lord Eldon, who held the seal almost continuously from 1801 to 1827. Even the new office of vice-chancellor of England, established in 1813, failed to relieve the congestion of causes, because an appeal lay against him to the chancellor. A successful commission was at last appointed in 1825, whose labours were not wholly thwarted either by the apathy of Eldon or the presence of a number of Chancery lawyers; for the energy of Brougham, Campbell, and Westbury in time carried out these reforms, and that which was a necessary preliminary to them, the simplification and amendment of the law of real property. Queen Victoria's reign and preceding ones did more for these objects than all the previous centuries put together; additional vice-chancellors and clerks have been appointed, a court of appeal established, the common law side of the court and its bankruptcy business transferred elsewhere, the suits' fund rearranged, and the procedure gradually simplified, while the court has been empowered (1858) to impose damages, try matters of fact by a jury, and take a judge as assessor without application to a common law court. When, about the same period (1854), common law courts were given the powers of an equity court as to examination of parties, discovery of documents, injunctions, etc., it became clear that the two ancient rivals were approximating to each other, and would soon be prepared to be reconciled or even amalgamated. The bill (1860) for this purpose was cut down by the influence of the Chancery lords; but in 1873 the Judicature Act was passed, which followed the advice of Lords Brougham, Westbury, and St. Leonards, and harmonized, without attempting completely to fuse, the two systems.

In IRELAND, there was a lord chancellor presiding over a separate court of equity, the growth of which has followed very closely the development of the English equity system. The earliest chancellor was Stephen Ridel, appointed in 1189. In SCOTLAND, the functions of the Chancellor's court in the thirteenth century were probably not very different from those of the same office in England. But as the civil law formed the basis of the Scottish legal system, the chancellor became the chief administrator of law, not of an equitable system. In 1553, when the Court of Session was established, he became the chief judge of this court. In Scotland till the Reformation he was generally a churchman; and afterwards became a mere officer of state. On the union with England his separate functions were merged in those of the English lord chancellor. [A. L. S.]

Chanda Sahib (d. 1752) married the daughter of Dost Ali, deputy of the Carnatic, and became chief minister. He was made use of by Dupleix as a pretender to the throne of Arcot against the British candidate Mohammed Ali. In alliance with Mirzapha Jung, the French candidate to the throne of Hyderabad on the death of the Nizam-ul-Mulk (1748), he overran the Carnatic, and obtained investiture from Dupleix and Mirzapha Jung. Clive's defence of Arcot and the death of Mirzapha broke the confederacy; and Chanda Sahib surrendered to Monackjee, the Tanjorine general, who was in alliance with Mohammed Ali and the British. The general took a solemn oath to convey him to a French settlement, but immediately afterwards caused him to be assassinated, at the instigation of Mohammed Ali.

Chandos, Sir John (d. 1370), was one of the most famous of the English generals during the French wars of Edward III's reign. In 1362 he was appointed constable of Guienne, and in 1364 was sent over to Brittany to assist de Montfort, where he took du Guesclin prisoner. In 1369 he was made seneschal of Poitou, and in the next year fell in a skirmish.

Channel Islands, THE, comprise the bailiwicks of Jersey and Guernsey, the latter of which includes Sark, Herm, and Alderney, together with some small outlying islets. They are interesting as being the last portion of the dukedom of Normandy remaining to England, which has possessed them ever since the Norman Conquest. In 550 they were granted to Childebert, a Saxon bishop, who soon afterwards converted most of the inhabitants to Christianity. The Channel Islands came into the possession of William, Duke of Normandy, in 933, by the grant of Charles IV, and remained attached to the English crown when Philip II conquered the rest of Normandy from King John. After the loss of Normandy by John, the Channel Islands were attacked by the French in the reign of Edward I, and again in that of Edward III, when du Guesclin, the constable of France, almost succeeded in reducing them. In the reign of Henry IV, they did fall into the hands of the French for a short time, but were retaken shortly afterwards by Sir Henry Harleston. Under Edward IV, Sark was also lost for a time. Towards the close of the sixteenth century the Channel Islands were governed by Sir Walter Raleigh. During the Parliamentary wars Jersey espoused warmly the side of the king, for which the government was put in commission by Cromwell. In 1779 the French made an ineffectual attempt to land, and in December 1780 sent another expedition, under the Baron de Rullecourt, who succeeded in taking St. Helier in Jersey, although he was subsequently defeated and slain by the British troops. At the Reformation the islands adopted a Protestantism of the Genevan type, but were eventually reconciled to Anglicanism by Bishop Andrewes, and are part of the diocese of Winchester. Though under governors appointed by the Crown, they have constitutions of their own. Jersey and Guernsey (with its dependencies) have each a lieutenant-governor and also a bailiff, who presides over the States of Deliberation, and is nominated by the Crown. The States of Deliberation of Jersey and Guernsey respectively are composed of certain officials—the rectors of parishes, the judges of the courts, and elected representatives. In Guernsey the election is very indirect; in Jersey the representation is more of a popular character. The courts of justice are presided over by the bailiff, and by elective judges. This constitution has existed with but little alteration since the time of John. Guernsey is divided into ten parishes, and Jersey into twelve, some of which are included in municipal corporations. The official language of the courts (whose procedure is based on the Norman) and of the legislature is still French. The king's writ runs in the Channel Islands.

Chapter, THE, is the body of clergy attached to a cathedral. Originally, this body was the assembly of the priests of the diocese round their bishop. It was the bishop's household or general council, and contained within it the bishop's officials for the administration of the diocese, and the clergy who had the care of the services of the cathedral itself. The chapter in the bishop's council soon fell into disuse, and the name was applied almost entirely to the clergy of the cathedral church itself, who soon gained a position almost independent of their bishop. Chapters in England were of two kinds—monastic and secular [CATHEDRAL]. The monastic chapters were like monasteries, over which the bishop ranked as abbot, though the resident prior was the real head. These monks were in England Benedictines, except in the case of Carlisle, where they were Augustinians. In the secular chapters the dean rises into prominence in the eleventh century. The work of his diocese, the necessity of constant journeys, and the increase of secular business undertaken by the bishop left the cathedrals without a head, and the chapters everywhere began to manage their business without their bishop. The theory that the chapter elected the bishops gave them at times a position of some importance, both towards the king and the pope. Chapters frequently appealed to Rome against their bishops, and often were successful in obtaining privileges from the pope. The separation of the chapter from the bishop became more and more definite, till the bishop was left with no powers save those of visitor over his chapter. The chief officers of the secular chapter were: the dean, who was head of the body; the precentor, who superintended the services; the chancellor, who was head of the educational and literary work of the cathedral church; and the treasurer, who had the care of all the treasures of the church and was guardian of the fabric. Besides those there were the archdeacons, who were the sole survivors of the diocesan organization of the chapter. Its other members were canons, as bound by the rule, or prebendaries, if they held an endowment besides their share of the corporate fund. This last body was generally non-resident, and their duties were performed by vicars, who are now called vicars-choral or minor canons. Under Henry VIII the monasteries attached to the cathedrals were suppressed, and their chapters were refounded as secular chapters under a dean. After the same model the cathedrals of the new bishoprics founded by Henry VIII were arranged. Hence came the two classes—Cathedrals of the Old Foundation and Cathedrals of the New Foundation. [CATHEDRAL.] An act of 1838 reformed cathedral chapters by diminishing the number of canons, reducing their incomes, and bringing all chapters to greater uniformity. Chapters at present generally consist of a dean and four canons, though some of the richer cathedrals have six canons. The conversion of parish churches into cathedrals as a result of the new creations which began in the nineteenth century has produced a third type of chapter in which the bishop is ordinarily ex-officio dean and the full complement of residentiary canons is rarely present.

Charlemont, JAMES CAULFIELD, 1ST EARL OF (1728-99). [CAULFIELD.]

Charles I, KING (b. November 19, 1600, s. March 25, 1625, d. January 30, 1649), second son of James I and of Anne, daughter of Frederick II, King of Denmark, was born at Dunfermline. He was a handsome and athletic youth, with reserved and diffident manners. James's brilliant favourite, Buckingham, gained complete ascendancy over him, and in 1623 the two young men went to Madrid, with the object of bringing back with them, as Charles's bride, the Infanta. Buckingham, who had expected that he would readily prevail on the Spaniards to effect the restoration of the Palatinate, soon discovered his mistake; but the prince, unwilling to return home foiled in his object, refused to leave the country, making promises that it was impossible for him to perform, and allowing the Spaniards to suppose that he would become a Catholic. At last, finding that if he married the Infanta he would not be allowed to take her to England until his promises were performed, he returned, along with Buckingham, to England. In opposition to pledges given to parliament, Charles gained the hand of Henrietta Maria, sister of Louis XIII of France, by consenting that the laws against English Catholics should not be enforced. Shortly before the marriage was consummated, James died, and Charles ascended the throne. Thus, he began his reign under ill auspices. He had made to parliament and to the King of France promises incompatible with one another; and he was under the guidance of a man whose temerity and self-confidence were about to involve his country in a series of military disasters. Charles dissolved his two first parliaments because they refused to support the policy of the duke. To war with Spain was added war with France. Money was raised by means of a forced loan, and persons refusing to lend were imprisoned. In 1628 a third parliament met. Charles was obliged to agree to the Petition of Right (q.v.). Soon after the prorogation of parliament, Buckingham was murdered by Felton; and the king for the future himself directed the policy of his government. Though Buckingham was removed, there was small hope of good understanding between Charles and the nation. Charles had no desire to make alterations in government. He, indeed, prided himself, when involved in any dispute with a subject, on having the law on his side; but he was content to rest his case on legal subterfuge, or to obtain his end by the appointment of subservient judges. Moreover, while he claimed the right to nominate ministers at will, and to pursue whatever policy seemed good to himself, he failed to perceive that the authority of his predecessors had remained unquestioned only when they had ruled in accordance with national desires and aspirations. Charles had no sympathy for the holders of Calvin's creed, who formed the majority of thoughtful and earnest men at that time. Within the Church had grown up a small party, the so-called Arminians (q.v.), holding doctrines akin to those of the Church of Rome. Each party desired to suppress the other, and Charles, who favoured the Arminians, was incapable of holding the balance evenly between the two. Parliament met again in 1629, only to be angrily dissolved, because the Commons refused to give the king a grant of tonnage and poundage until he should consent to pursue the Church policy approved by them.

For eleven years Charles ruled without parliament. His government became intensely unpopular. Peace was made with both France and Spain; but it was difficult to provide for the ordinary expenses out of the fixed revenue, and hence old rights of the Crown were once more enforced, and money raised by means which brought little into the exchequer, while they irritated large numbers of persons. The system culminated in the imposition of ship-money, when Charles, being desirous of having a fleet in the Channel, imposed what was really a heavy tax on the country (October 1634). North of the Humber, the Council of the North, under the presidency of Lord Wentworth, in the south the Court of Star Chamber, punished by fines and imprisonment persons who refused to submit to demands of which the legality was questionable. At the same time, under the direction of Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, an ecclesiastical policy was pursued which ran directly contrary to the current of popular feeling, and rendered both the bishops and the Court of High Commission objects of general odium. The attempt to impose a church service, similar to the English, in Presbyterian Scotland led to the rising in arms of the Scots. Charles summoned Wentworth, now created Earl of Strafford, to his side from Ireland, and called a parliament (1640), which he dissolved in three weeks, because it refused to support him in carrying on war against the Scots. The advance of a Scottish army into the kingdom compelled him in the autumn of the same year to summon another—the celebrated Long Parliament (q.v.).

Charles was for the time unable to resist the demands of the popular representatives. He gave his consent to whatever bills were offered to him, and passed a bill of attainder against his faithful servant Strafford, to whom he had promised that not a hair of his head should be injured. [WENTWORTH; LONG PARLIAMENT.] In 1641 he proceeded to Scotland, with the object of forming a Royalist party there, and on his return to London went in person to the House of Commons, to arrest five members, whom he accused of high treason (January 3, 1642). [FIVE MEMBERS.] The attempt having failed, he left London, to prepare for war; and on August 22 the royal standard was unfurled at Nottingham. A considerable army soon gathered round him. Men who thought that the concessions already made were sufficient to prevent abuse of the royal authority, as well as all lovers of the existing form of church service, took his side. At Edgehill (October 23, 1642) his cavalry, composed of country gentlemen, readily proved its superiority to the Parliamentary horse. But want of subordination prevented his officers acting in union, and deprived him of victory. Charles could not maintain discipline himself, nor did he depute authority to those who possessed the art. High commands were given to the wrong men, and officers were allowed to act independently of one another. Hence, the royal strategy broke down, while the gallantry of individuals was spent in vain against the disciplined troops that Cromwell brought into the field. The passing of the Self-Denying Ordinance (q.v.) placed all the forces of the Parliament under the control of the Independents. Led by Fairfax and Cromwell, the remodelled army destroyed at Naseby (June 14, 1645) the last army which Charles was able to bring into the field. The king now authorized Glamorgan to conclude a secret treaty with the Irish Catholics, promising to allow them the free exercise of their religion if they would place 20,000 men at his service (August 12). In May 1646, to avoid being made a prisoner by the Parliament's officers, Charles took refuge with the Scottish army near Newark. The Scots, however, were not ready to take the part of the king while he refused to allow the establishment of a Presbyterian Church in England; and on the withdrawal of their army into Scotland in January 1647, they surrendered him into the power of the English parliament.

The Parliament demanded of Charles that he should abandon his right to appoint either ministers of state or officers of the militia, and that he should consent to the establishment of the Presbyterian Church in England. On the other hand, the Independents were willing that Episcopacy should be maintained, if toleration were granted to Dissenters. Charles expected to be able to play one party off against the other, and by such means to recover the whole of his former prerogatives. During the war, he had negotiated at once with Presbyterians, Independents, and Irish Catholics; and, in spite of the distrust that his conduct excited, he still pursued the same course. From Hampton Court, where he was under the charge of the army, he fled to the Isle of Wight, and put himself under the protection of Colonel Hammond, the governor of Carisbrooke Castle. Here he concluded a secret treaty with the Scots, promising to establish the Presbyterian Church in England for three years if they would send an army into England to restore him to his throne. The Civil War again revived; zealots rose in arms, while the Scots, led by the Duke of Hamilton, crossed the border. Fairfax suppressed the Royalists, while Cromwell crushed the invaders at Warrington, in Lancashire (August 1648). The army returned to London, demanding that Charles should pay with his life for the blood that he had caused to be shed. The Commons, forcibly purged of the more moderate Presbyterians [PRIDE'S PURGE], voted that it was treason for the King of England to levy war against the parliament and the kingdom, and passed an ordinance for instituting a High Court of Justice, composed of men of their own party. As the House of Lords refused to take part in the proceedings, they further resolved that whatever was enacted by the Commons should have the force of law without the consent of the king or the House of Peers. The trial was held publicly in Westminster Hall. One hundred and thirty-five judges had been named on the ordinance; but only about eighty, amongst whom were Cromwell and Ireton, attended the sittings of the court. Bradshaw, Cromwell's cousin, presided. Charles was accused of having endeavoured to overturn the liberties of the people, and of being a tyrant, traitor, and murderer. He refused persistently to answer to the charge, on the ground that the court had no lawful authority derived from the people of England by which to try him. Sentence of death was pronounced against him; and on January 30, 1649, he was executed on a scaffold raised in front of the Banqueting House at Whitehall, in presence of a vast crowd, which, had the decision rested with it, would eagerly have delivered him from death. [REBELLION, THE GREAT; COMMONWEALTH, THE; LONG PARLIAMENT.]

Internal affairs during the reign of Charles I are best studied in the "Calendars of State Papers" (Domestic Series). The "Hardwicke Papers" contain materials relating to the French and Spanish matches, the expedition to the Isle of Rhé, and the Scottish troubles of 1637-41. The "Memorials and Letters" published by Sir Daniel Dalrymple; "The Court and Times of Charles I," by Thomas Birch; Halliwell's "Letters of the Kings of England"; "The Letters of Charles I to Henrietta Maria," edited for the Camden Society by John Bruce; "The Arrest of the Five Members," by John Forster—are works which throw light on the character of the king and the motives of his actions. A Royalist account of the years 1644 and 1645, and of the negotiations carried on in the Isle of Wight in 1648, is to be found in Sir Edward Walker's "Historical Discourses"; and of the king's personal history during the last two years of his life, in Sir Thomas Herbert's "Memoirs." For modern accounts see G. M. Trevelyan, "England Under the Stuarts," 1904; biographies by W. H. D. Adams, 1889, G. B. Chancellor, 1886, and A. Fea, 1904; "Charles I in Captivity," ed. G. S. Stevenson, 1927.

[B. M. G.]

Charles II, KING (b. May 29, 1630, s. May 8, 1660, d. February 6, 1685), was the eldest son of Charles I and Henrietta Maria. In his ninth year he was created Prince of Wales, and when the Civil War broke out he accompanied his father at the battle of Edgehill. In 1644 he was the nominal head of the royal forces in the west of England; but on the decline of the royal cause he was obliged to retire to Scilly, to Jersey, and eventually to France. When matters appeared to be drawing to extremity with the king, several of the ships of the Parliament went over to the prince, who made some attempts to blockade the Thames, and even landed near Deal, but was soon obliged to withdraw to Holland, whence, in the hope of saving his father's life, he dispatched to the intending regicides a paper signed and sealed, but otherwise blank, for them to insert their own conditions. On the death of his father in January 1649, Charles assumed the title of king, and in February he was proclaimed King of Scotland at Edinburgh. In 1650 he came over to Scotland, and, having taken the Covenant, was crowned at Scone on January 1, 1651. Charles exhibited courage and wisdom in opposing Cromwell's troops before Edinburgh, but his cause was hopeless from the first, owing to the discord among his supporters. He suddenly determined to leave Scotland and march into England, and succeeded in getting as far as Worcester, where (September 3, 1651) he received so severe a defeat that his cause seemed utterly ruined. Charles escaped from the battle, and after an adventurous flight of forty-four days, through the western counties and along the south coast—during the early part of which he owed his safety entirely to the fidelity of a labouring family—he succeeded in finding a ship near Brighton, which landed him safely in France. For the next nine years he led a wandering life in France, Germany, and the Low Countries, sometimes received and sometimes repulsed, according as the various sovereigns or their ministers threw off or yielded to their dread of Cromwell. He was accompanied by a few faithful adherents; but his little court was also beset by intriguing turbulent men and spies, who betrayed his counsels and caused the numerous attempted risings of his friends both in England and Scotland. At length, on the death of Cromwell, it became obvious to most persons in England that the only hope of establishing a settled form of government and of saving the country from a military despotism lay in restoring the monarchy; and, chiefly through the instrumentality of General Monk, Charles was invited to return to England. He at once complied, and entered London in triumph on May 29, 1660, having previously signed the Declaration of Breda (q.v.). During the first years of his reign, when the king was largely under the guidance of Clarendon, matters went smoothly. The parliament was ardently Royalist, and supported the English Church by passing stringent laws against Catholics and Dissenters; but the failure of the Dutch War in 1665, the maladministration of the government, and the misappropriation of the public money, led to the downfall of Clarendon (1667). In 1668 (January) Sir William Temple concluded the Triple Alliance between England, France, and Sweden. But the "Cabal" ministry (q.v.) speedily reversed this policy for one of alliance with the French king and hostility to Holland. Finally, the infamous Treaty of Dover (q.v.) was signed (1670); Charles became a pensionary of Louis, and war was declared against Holland. The attempt of the king to obtain toleration for the Catholics by issuing a Declaration of Indulgence caused the passing of the Test Act (1673) by parliament, and the consequent fall of the Cabal administration. With this began the great struggle between the king and the opposition, headed by Shaftesbury, during which Charles showed the greatest prudence. He yielded to the storm caused by the pretended Popish Plot (q.v.), but steadily refused to alter the succession by excluding his brother James. The violence and cruelty of the Whig leaders, together with the discovery of the Rye House Plot (q.v.), turned the tide in the king's favour. He gained a complete victory over his opponents, and was able for the last three years of his life to reign without parliament and free from all opposition. In 1662 Charles married Catherine of Braganza, daughter of John of Portugal, but had no children by her. His private life was characterized by great profligacy, and he had a large number of mistresses, and no fewer than twelve illegitimate children, among whom were James, Duke of Monmouth; Henry Fitzroy (son of the Duchess of Cleveland), ancestor of the Dukes of Grafton; Charles Beauclerc (son of Nell Gwyn), ancestor of the Dukes of St. Albans; and Charles Lennox (son of the Duchess of Portsmouth), ancestor of the Dukes of Richmond. Charles, in spite of his licentiousness and his extreme selfishness, was possessed of much talent. The natural champion of the principle of hereditary right at a time when hereditary right was exposed to attack, Charles's position was one of considerable difficulty. He played his part dexterously, and with considerable ability, and it cannot be denied that he showed much capacity for governing.

Clarendon, "Life" (ed. 1857), and Burnet, "History of His Own Time" (ed. A. H. A. 1900), both of which must be read with caution; Barillon's "Letters," and Temple's "Works" (and especially the "Memoir from the Peace"), contain much information on the diplomatic history. Charles Edward, THE YOUNG PRETENDER (1720-88). [STUART.]

Charlotte Augusta, PRINCESS (1796-1817), was the daughter of George IV and Caroline of Brunswick. Owing to the disunion of her parents her earlier years were passed in retirement, away from the court, under the care of Lady Elgin, Lady Clifford, and the Bishop of Exeter. She early gave proofs of a noble character and intellectual qualities above the average. She was destined by her father to marry William, Prince of Orange; but her own affections had been fixed on Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, who became, in 1830, King of the Belgians. Yielding to her father's desire, the princess agreed to marry the Prince of Orange, and the betrothal was arranged between them, when the princess broke off the match, partly in anger at her father's conduct to her mother, partly because of her own repugnance to himself. In 1816 she was married to Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, and in the following year (November) died in giving birth to a son, who did not survive her.

Biography by P. Fitzgerald, 1899.

Charmouth is a village on the Dorsetshire coast, about two miles from Lyme Regis. In 836-7 Ecgbert was defeated here by the Danes, and in 843 his son Ethelwulf met with a like disaster at the same place. Some historians have supposed that the two battles of Charmouth are the result of an erroneous duplicate entry in the Chronicle.

Charnock, ROBERT (d. 1696), a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, became a Roman Catholic, and supported James II in his illegal ejection of the Protestant fellows of his college by means of the Court of High Commission. After the Revolution he became one of the most active of the Jacobite conspirators, and was among the chief organizers of the Assassination Plot (1696) (q.v.). He was arrested, and his trial began on March 11. The new act for regulating procedure in cases of high treason was not to come into force until the 25th. It allowed the prisoner to examine his witnesses on oath, compel their attendance at court, and have the service of counsel. The prisoners, Charnock, King, and Keyes, claimed, not without reason, to have their trial postponed till that date. Their request was, however, refused, and they were all executed. Charnock left behind him a paper in which he justified the plot, on the ground that William was a usurper, and by an appeal to the laws of human society.

Charter, THE GREAT. [MAGNA CARTA.]

Charter Schools (IRELAND). In 1733 an association, with the primate, Archbishop Boulter, and the lord chancellor, at its head, was formed to provide Protestant education gratis for the Catholic poor. Before that time, in spite of a statute of Henry VIII, Protestants had to rely on private enterprise entirely as far as education was concerned. In 1733 a charter was granted to the association, but only on condition that the endowment was not to exceed £2,000 a year. On October 24, 1733, the corporation began its work; day-schools and boarding-schools were established. They were really industrial schools. After five years' schooling, children were bound out as apprentices at the expense of the society (girls got a small portion on marrying), and the whole cost of education for one child came, in the day-schools, to only £9 per annum. The boarding-schools increased from four to fifty, and George II granted £1,000 from his privy purse in their support. The day-schools soon came to an end, but the boarding-schools were supported by parliamentary grants after 1745, when a special tax was devoted to this object. Altogether, by 1767, £112,000 had been devoted to the Charter schools. In 1750 parents were forbidden to take back their children, when once they had entered, and thus to prevent their becoming Protestants. Soon afterwards the society was allowed to take up all children between five and twelve found loitering about, and put them into their schools. However, by 1757, whether it was on account of the determination of the Catholics not to be enticed into changing their children's religion, or for other reasons, it became clear that the Charter schools were a failure. Howard, in 1758, investigated this school system, and brought to light great abuses; a parliamentary committee appointed in consequence found children who had been at school for twelve years unable to spell. Still, for twenty-five years after the Union they continued to exist, and vast sums were spent on the education of some 2,000 children. Froude calls the Charter schools "the best-conceived educational institutions which existed in the world," while Lecky says of them that they "excited in Ireland an intensity of bitterness hardly equalled by any portion of the penal code." Of one thing there can be no doubt: they completely failed in their object—the conversion of the Irish peasantry to Protestantism.

Chartism (1838-53) was a working-class movement which aimed at making the government representative of and responsible to the whole people, by the enactment of a bill drafted by Lovett and Place in 1838 and called the "People's Charter." Its "Six Points" were (1) manhood suffrage, (2) secret ballot, (3) equal electoral districts, (4) annual parliaments, (5) no property qualification, (6) payment of M.P.s; (1), (2), and (4) had been demanded in the Radical agitation of 1819; all except (4) were granted by 1918. This programme originated with the London Working Men's Association founded in 1836 by Radicals who had just succeeded in getting the newspaper-tax reduced to one penny; it was linked on to the tumultuous Lancashire and Yorkshire agitation against the New Poor Law by Feargus O'Connor (q.v.), who had founded the Leeds Northern Star in 1837; and it was embodied in the "National Petition" drawn up by Attwood's well-organized Birmingham Political Union (q.v.) and propagated by its "missionaries." A "National Convention" representing these three divergent elements, and composed of delegates elected at public meetings, met intermittently at London and Birmingham during 1839, but was so heterogeneous that it failed to agree on any practical measures, and it dissolved when Lovett, the "moral force" leader, was imprisoned for seditious libel in printing one of its resolutions, while military preparations prevented serious disorder in the north, and a rising of "physical force" Chartists in South Wales was suppressed. After this failure, a National Charter Association was founded in the north in 1840 with a regular penny-a-week subscription and a class-organization on Methodist lines, in order to move Chartist amendments at meetings of the rival Anti-Corn Law League, and Lovett outlined an educational policy in "Chartism" which he wrote in prison; but a united movement was made impossible by O'Connor's feud with Lovett and O'Brien, the "schoolmasters of Chartism," and with the Birmingham men who were less class-conscious. A second convention met in 1842, and a monster petition was presented to parliament; its rejection was followed by a general "turn-out" or "plug plot" in the north, as a demonstration of working-class solidarity. Thenceforward Chartism declined, and it became impotent after April 10, 1848, when the Duke of Wellington had a quarter of a million special constables sworn in in London to prevent the Kennington Common meeting from leading to an imitation of the continental revolutions. Political Chartism was succeeded by economic self-help exemplified by the co-operative stores (Holyoake and the Rochdale pioneers were Chartists) and the "new model" trade unions; it gave an incentive to the temperance movement and to evening classes, and led to the successful agitation of Collet the Chartist against the "taxes on knowledge"; and it stimulated the paternalism of Disraeli ("Sybil, or the Two Nations," 1845), Carlyle ("Chartism," 1839), and Broad-Churchmen such as Maurice and Kingsley, who promoted Christian Socialism in 1850 ("Alton Locke," 1850).

Chartley Manor, in Staffordshire, was at one time the place of Mary, Queen of Scots' imprisonment. In 1585-6 she was at her own request removed here from the care of Sir Amyas Paulet at Tutbury. Chartley was well known to Walsingham's spy Gifford, and this afforded the latter exceptional facilities for copying the treasonable correspondence of the captive queen.

Chatham was a village of small importance till the establishment of a dockyard and naval arsenal in the time of Queen Elizabeth, when preparations were being made to resist the Spanish Armada. The dockyards were improved under Charles I and the Commonwealth, and the fortifications strengthened after the attack of the Dutch in 1667. These were enlarged and strengthened between 1757 and 1808, and during the nineteenth century Chatham was rendered one of the most important dockyards and naval fortresses in the world. It became a parliamentary borough by the Reform Act of 1832.

Chatsworth, in North Derbyshire, the property of the Cavendish family, was in 1570, 1573, 1577, 1578, and 1581 the prison of Mary Queen of Scots. It was subsequently garrisoned by the Roundheads in 1643, and by the Cavaliers two years later.

Cheke, SIR JOHN (1514-57), is well known as the tutor of King Edward VI, whose education he undertook in conjunction with Sir Anthony Cooke. In reward for his services he was made provost of King's College, Cambridge, and a privy councillor. On the accession of Mary, Cheke was imprisoned for the sympathy which he had shown for the cause of Lady Jane Grey, from whom he had accepted the office of secretary of state. On his release he went abroad and settled at Strasburg, but, having gone to visit Sir John Mason at Brussels, was captured on the way, and sent to England, where he was confined in the Tower. Cheke, who was a zealous Protestant, and "one of the most godly men of those days," was kept in confinement until hard usage wrung from him a renunciation of his real convictions. He was then released, but is said to have died of shame at his recantation. He was a voluminous and able writer, and did much for the literature of England. Besides being the tutor of King Edward VI, he was the tutor of William Cecil, Lord Burghley. He was one of the earliest and greatest of English Greek scholars of the Renaissance; and in particular set himself to reform the corrupt pronunciation of his time. His fame was still living at Cambridge in Milton's days, and the poet refers to him in Sonnet XI:

"Thy Age, like ours, O soul of Sir John Cheke, Hated not learning worse than toad or asp,
When thou taught'st Cambridge and King Edward Greek."

Sir C. R. Markham, "Edward VI," 1907.

Chelt, BATTLE OF THE. [GELT.]

Chester was a Roman military station, as its Celtic name, "Cacrlon Vawr," attests. It became the head-quarters of the 20th legion, Valeria Victrix. It is called Deva in the Roman geographical writings, and would seem to have been also a trading-centre of importance. About 613 it was conquered and destroyed by Ethelfrith of Bernicia. In 894 it was captured by the Danes, who were, however, forced to surrender it to the English; and in 973 it was the scene of Edgar's triumph, when, according to the tradition, he was rowed on the Dee by six subject kings. It was a place of considerable importance as being the frontier town of the Welsh Marches. The Conqueror established an earldom of Chester, and Hugh Lupus, his nephew, became its palatine. He built the castle and refounded as a Benedictine abbey the church of St. Werburgh, which was of Anglo-Saxon origin. In 1237 the earldom escheated to the Crown, and was granted by Henry III to his elder son Edward, afterwards Edward I. It has ever since been a royal appanage. In 1301 Edward, Prince of Wales, received the homage of the Welsh princes at Chester, and here the captive Richard II was lodged on his way to London in 1399. The city suffered severely in the plagues of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and especially in 1602-5. In 1642 Charles I arrived in Chester. The citizens were warmly Royalist. From July 1643 until 1646 the city was continuously besieged or blockaded by the Parliamentarian forces, and at last honourably surrendered in February of the latter year. Great riots occurred on the occasion of the visit of the Duke of Monmouth in the year 1683. Chester was created a bishopric by Henry VIII in 1541, and its fine abbey church of St. Werburgh became the cathedral.

Cheyne Chase. [OTTERBURN.]

Cheyne, SIR THOMAS (d. 1558), treasurer of the household to Henry VIII, was appointed one of the Council of Executors by the king's will, 1547. Having served in the Scottish expedition of 1547, he was made warden of the Cinque Ports, and in 1549 he was sent on behalf of the council to the Emperor Charles V. In 1553 he is found in strong opposition to Northumberland's scheme of altering the succession in favour of Lady Jane Grey; and in Wyatt's rebellion [WYATT, SIR THOMAS], 1554, he did good service for the queen in Kent.

Chichele, HENRY (1362 ?–1443), is said to have owed his education to William of Wykeham, and certainly was a student on Wykeham's foundations at Winchester and Oxford. He was frequently employed on diplomatic business by Henry IV, and in 1408 was made Bishop of St. Davids. In 1409 he was one of the English delegates to the Council of Pisa, and in 1414 was raised to the see of Canterbury. He joined Henry V in France in 1418 and again in 1420, and crowned Queen Catherine. Chichele has been greatly blamed for inciting Henry V to go to war against France, and it was generally believed that the French war was encouraged by the clergy, to divert popular attention from the wealth, luxury, and corruption of the Church. But this view rests on no historical basis, though it is not improbable that Chichele and the other bishops did lend their sanction to the king's ambition. Chichele is also accused of being a persecutor, but it would seem that his aversion to the Lollards was political rather than religious; for that sect was regarded as hostile to the dynasty and a foe to all social order as well as to the Church. During Henry VI's reign Chichele seems to have confined himself almost entirely to his clerical duties. In 1437 he founded All Souls College at Oxford, and was meditating the resignation of his see when he was removed by death. Chichele resisted the pretensions of Martin V, who was desirous of getting the Statutes of Provisors and Præmunire repealed, and when the papal party retaliated by accusing him of avarice, the barons, the bishops, and the University of Oxford came forward to bear testimony to the merits of the archbishop. Nevertheless he suffered many humiliations at the hands of the pope, and his prestige was seriously lowered by the bestowal of the cardinalate upon Beaufort and Kemp, and by the former's acceptance in 1426 of the legatine commission.

Chichester, SUSSEX, a cathedral town, is built on the site of a Roman settlement, and is generally identified with the Regnum mentioned in the "Itinerary" of Antoninus. It appears to have been a place of some trade. The town is said to have been destroyed by Ella, and restored by his son, Cissa, from whom tradition says it received its modern name. The see was originally at Selsey, and was removed to Chichester as a result of the recommendations of the council of 1075. The cathedral was built upon the site of the nunnery of St. Peter. Begun in 1091, it suffered more than once from fire, and its different parts show many periods—Norman, Early English, Decorated, and Perpendicular. The building suffered much at the hands of the Parliamentary troops which were quartered in it. The earliest extant charter to the borough is that granted by Stephen, conferring to the burgesses the rights they had possessed in the time of his grandfather. In 1604 the city was incorporated under a mayor and aldermen. Since 1295, when it first returned a member, Chichester has been regularly represented in parliament. The town was Royalist in the Civil War, but in December 1642 was surrendered to the Parliamentarians after an eight days' siege. It was recaptured by the Royalists in the following December, but had again to surrender to Waller a month later after a siege of seventeen days. Among Waller's prisoners of war at Arundel was the famous Chillingworth, who died at Chichester, and lies buried in the cathedral.

A. Ballard, "History of Chichester," 1898.

Chichester, ARTHUR, LORD CHICHESTER OF BELFAST (1563–1625), was lord-deputy of Ireland from 1604 to 1614, when he became lord treasurer of Ireland. It was under his government that the Plantation of Ulster was carried out. One result of the colonization of Ulster was the possibility of summoning an Irish parliament in which the representatives of the native Irish should be in a permanent minority. This parliament met in 1613, for the first time in twenty-seven years, and at once broke into open discord. The subjects in dispute were referred to the king, and in February 1614 Chichester was commanded to return to England to give an account of the state of the country. On his return to Ireland in the same year instructions were given him to recur to the policy of driving the Irish by persecution into the Protestant Church. Chichester, however, obtained their practical modification, and some approach was made to an understanding between the Irish Roman Catholics and the government. In August 1614 the king ordered the dissolution of the parliament, and three months later Chichester was recalled. Though no reason was publicly given for his recall, there are grounds for believing that the real motive lay in his opposition to any new attempt to persecute the Roman Catholics. He was, however, treated with every show of honour, and was made lord treasurer of Ireland, a post more dignified than influential.

Chief Justice. [JUSTICE.]

Childers, HUGH CULLING EARDLEY (1827–1896), was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and went to Australia in 1850, where he became inspector of schools in Melbourne in 1851. Later he was made secretary to the education department and emigration agent at the port of Melbourne, and in 1852 became auditor-general and a member of the legislative council. The following year he was collector of customs and a member of the executive council. He was the first vice-chancellor of Melbourne University. In 1857 he returned to England as agent-general for Victoria. He was elected member of parliament for Pontefract in 1860, and was a member of the royal commission on penal servitude in 1863. In 1865 he was financial secretary to the treasury, and was appointed first lord of the admiralty and privy councillor in 1868. He resigned office in 1871. In 1872 he became chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, and secretary of state for war in 1880, and produced a successful scheme of army reform in the following year. He was appointed chancellor of the exchequer in 1882, and in the following year formulated a great scheme for reducing the national debt (q.v.). In 1886 he became home secretary, and supported Gladstone's Home Rule Bill. The state of his health precluded him, however, from becoming a candidate at the general election of 1892.

Chilianwalla, THE BATTLE OF (January 13, 1849), was fought during the second Sikh War. Lord Gough attacked the position of Shere Singh at three in the afternoon, with the result that when darkness put an end to the struggle Lord Gough found himself master of unknown ground in the dark, and uncertain as to the whereabouts of the enemy, after a victory which was the nearest possible approach to a defeat. He was compelled, therefore, to withdraw to the village of Chilianwalla. [SIKH WARS.] On February 21 he retrieved his reputation by the decisive victory of Gujarat.

Chillingworth, WILLIAM (1602-44), was educated at Oxford, and obtained a fellowship at Trinity College. By the efforts of a Jesuit, John Fisher, he was converted to the Roman Catholic communion. His conspicuous abilities made him an important convert and the Jesuits determined to find him employment. In 1630 he went to the college of Douai, where he was urged to write an account of the motives which led him to make his religious change. He undertook the task, but felt it his duty to weigh afresh the arguments in favour of the Protestant religion, and Laud, then Bishop of London, began a series of letters to Chillingworth, for whom he had acted as godfather. The result was that in 1631 Chillingworth left Douai and returned to Oxford, where he pursued his theological inquiries with an impartial mind. In 1634 he again declared himself to be a Protestant, and wrote a statement of the reasons which induced him to adopt the Roman Catholic faith together with a refutation of them. He became, in 1638, chancellor of Salisbury and prebendary of Brixworth. In the Civil War he accompanied the king's forces, though his heart sank within him to see "publicans and sinners on the one side, against Scribes and Pharisees on the other." He took an active part in the operations at the siege of Gloucester, and was taken prisoner at the capture of Arundel Castle. Being very ill he was allowed to remove to the palace of Chichester, where he died. He was the author of a famous tract, called "The Religion of Protestants: a Safe Way to Salvation," first published in 1638, and very frequently reprinted.

Lecture on Chillingworth by E. H. Plumptre, 1877.

Chiltern Hundreds, THE, as the hundreds of Burnham, Desborough, and Stoke, in Buckinghamshire, are called, have attached to them a stewardship, the holder of which office was charged with the duty of keeping down the robbers who infested the woods of the Chiltern Hills. At the present time the office is used for an interesting purpose. As a member of the House of Commons cannot by parliamentary law resign his seat unless he becomes disqualified, either by the acceptance of a place of honour and profit under the Crown (statute of 1707), or by some other cause, a member wishing to retire applies for the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, which is held to be such and necessarily entails the vacation of the seat. The stewardship is usually granted as a matter of course, though it has been refused in a case of bribery. As soon as it is obtained it is again resigned and is thus generally vacant when required by a member of parliament. The method of evading the restriction as to the resignation of a member of parliament appears to have come into practice in the reign of George II about 1750. The gift lies with the chancellor of the exchequer. In the event of two applications being made for the post at the same time, the stewardship of the manor of Northstead is bestowed on one of the applicants. The Chiltern Hundreds and Northstead are the only two of the eight original Crown stewardships now surviving.

China, RELATIONS WITH, cannot be said to have existed much earlier than 1600, though there was, no doubt, indirect intercourse in earlier times between English merchants and Cathay. The Florentine house of Bardi, for instance, which had extensive financial dealings with Edward III, carried on also a considerable trade with China. The first attempt of the East India Company to establish a commercial station at Canton, in 1637, was a failure. And a second attempt in 1668 met with no more success, but in 1670 a trade connexion was opened with Formosa, and sealed by a treaty. Ten years later a factory was established at Canton. An era of foreign trade in China now began. But the Manchu dynasty, inaugurated in 1679, developed a policy of hostility towards alien traders as a result, perhaps, of misconduct on the part of the Portuguese. Trade became confined to Canton alone, and was made difficult, even there, by the rapacity of the mandarins and the dishonesty of the hong merchants; until quarrels between the East India Company, the Portuguese, and the French resulted in the mission of Lord Macartney to Peking as the first British ambassador, commissioned to establish secure commercial relations between England and China (1792). Macartney, however, was unable to obtain a removal of trade restrictions, and Lord Amherst, who was sent to carry on the task (1816), was dismissed by the Emperor for refusing to "kow-tow." (To "kow-tow" would have been a tacit acknowledgment that George III was a vassal of the Manchus.) The next efforts on the part of Great Britain only led to war. In 1834, when the monopoly of the East India Company expired, Lord Napier was sent to Canton with a commission to endeavour to resuscitate commercial relations, but he fell a victim to fever and overwork, and in a short time the Chinese authorities began to protest against the introduction of opium into China by British traders, on the ground that importation of opium was illegal. In 1839 large quantities of the drug were confiscated and burnt—an act which Captain Elliot, the commissioner of trade, regarded as amounting to a declaration of war.

The First Chinese War (1839–42), fought on the opium question, obtained for British trade an extensive sphere in China. After the capture of the island of Chusan by the Indian fleet, followed by a period of abortive negotiations and by the subsequent capture of Hong Kong and Amoy, hostilities were suspended and peace was concluded at Nanking by Sir Henry Pottinger. Hong Kong was thrown open to European traders, together with the five towns of Amoy, Fuchow, Nanking, Canton, and Ningpo; and China agreed to pay an indemnity of $21,000,000 (part of which was to serve as compensation for the confiscated opium).

The Second Chinese War (1855–8) was precipitated, after an interval of comparatively friendly relations, by the seizure of the cutter Arrow by the Chinese authorities on a charge of piracy. There was undoubtedly a case for the Chinese, but the Arrow had obtained British registration, and her surrender was demanded. Her crew were set at liberty, but no apology was forthcoming from the governor of Canton. War began accordingly with the bombardment of Canton by Sir John Bowring. The war was of short duration. After the fall of the Taku forts (1858) the Chinese government sued for peace, and by the Treaty of Tientsin the British commissioner, Lord Elgin, obtained a reduction of transit dues and an indemnity of £4,000,000. An attack on Sir F. Bruce in 1859 (while he was sailing up the river to ratify the Treaty of Tientsin) produced a second campaign under Lord Elgin, which involved a fresh occupation of the Taku forts until the emperor agreed to ratify the treaty, and won for Great Britain the privilege of exchanging diplomatic representatives with China on terms of equality.

Relations were again strained in 1875, when the murder of Mr. Margary on the Chinese frontier, added to the refusal of China to publish the details of treaties by which Great Britain was empowered to establish a trade route between China and Burma, nearly precipitated a third war. Hostilities were averted by the tactful policy of Sir Thomas Wade, who won for foreigners (1876) a recognition of the right to travel unmolested, according to the Chefoo Convention. Intercourse was further extended in 1895, when the Treaty of Shimonoseki, which terminated the Chino-Japanese war of 1894–5, opened four more ports to European trade—Chungking, Hankow, Suchow, and Shatsze. The Yangtse basin was recognized as a British sphere of influence, and Wei-hai-wei was made over to Great Britain on an extensive lease. Britain adopted the policy of the "open door" in China, discountenancing the restriction by any European power of the trade of other powers with that country.

Fresh collisions occurred in 1900 on the outbreak of the Boxer rising; riots at Peking (April) were followed by the murder of missionaries and Christians, culminating in a siege of the foreign legations, lasting eight weeks, during which an international force sent out under Admiral Seymour failed to relieve the besieged legations, but was able to capture Tientsin. The legations were relieved on August 14, however, and the besieging troops fled into the interior. The powers' demands for reparation were, after long deliberation, embodied in a note and presented on December 22. The emperor acceded to them on the 27th, and on January 14, 1901, a Peace Protocol was signed at Peking. It provided for the destruction of the Taku forts, the reform of the Tsung-Li-Yamin, the punishment of individual offenders, the execution of certain officials (six in all), and the payment of an indemnity of £65,000,000. Peking was evacuated by the foreign troops on September 17 following.

After 1900 Anglo-Chinese relations steadily improved. The conclusion of the Anglo-Japanese alliance in 1902 showed how strongly both powers were determined to preserve the integrity of China, and in the same year a fresh commercial treaty was concluded between London and Peking, whereby four new ports were opened and navigation on inland waters was subjected to amended rules; while Likin, a transit-tax on inland trade producing about £2,000,000 annually, was abolished. Six years later a further agreement obtained for Great Britain a stretch of mainland opposite Hong Kong (with a 99 years' lease) and provided for a steady decrease and ultimate eradication of the opium traffic. The revolution of 1911 and the inauguration of the Chinese Republic did not materially affect relations with Great Britain and Europe.

China gained little by her part in the Great War. She hoped for the cancellation of all "spheres of influence," and for the restoration of the German Shantung region. But Shantung fell to Japanese control, and the Peace Conference declined to admit the remaining Chinese claims within its purview. The Washington Conference of 1921-2, however, by means of several treaties to which Great Britain was a party, delimited spheres of influence, regulated customs and tariffs, and guaranteed Chinese integrity. The unpaid portion of the Boxer indemnity was remitted in 1924. But friction recurred in 1926 in a series of anti-foreign demonstrations encouraged by Soviet Russia, directed towards securing the abolition of the "unequal treaties." Sir Austen Chamberlain outlined British policy in a memorandum of December 26, proclaiming sympathy for the nationalist movement in China and a willingness to negotiate on the "unequal treaties" as soon as some stable government should have been established which could speak for the whole of China. The situation, however, grew worse. On January 24, 1927, a Shanghai Defence Force was ordered, and the agreement reached on February 19 between Mr. O'Malley and Mr. Eugene Chen on the subject of the Hankow Concession soon came to nothing. Grave disorders followed at Nanking, Shanghai fell to the Southern forces, and the Chinese Civil War continued unabated.

Chippenhams, THE PEACE OF (sometimes inaccurately termed the Peace of Wedmore), was concluded between Alfred and Guthrum in 878 after the great English victory of Ethandun. Guthrum gave hostages to Alfred and agreed to depart with his army from Wessex. In addition he promised, for himself and his chief men, to accept Christian baptism. This latter pledge was duly fulfilled at Aller, near Athelney, three weeks after the conclusion of the treaty. Thereafter Guthrum and his host retreated eastwards and set up a Danish kingdom in Essex and East Anglia (880). No record of the territorial settlements made at Chippenhams has been preserved, but Alfred seems to have been left the possession of Wessex, Sussex, Kent, and South-western Mercia. The boundary between English and Danes was for the first time precisely defined in Alfred and Guthrum's Frith of 886. It followed the line of the River Lea to its source, crossed thence to the Ouse at Bedford, and continued along its course to its junction with Watling Street at a point near Stony Stratford. Thus, by this later agreement, London and its environs were surrendered to Alfred, and the Danelagh (q.v.) was clearly marked off from the area under English rule.

Chitral Expedition, THE, 1895, occurred as the result of a succession-dispute in the principality of Chitral (in the Hindu Kush Mountains), which had been under the suzerainty of Kashmir since 1878. The death of the ruler Aman-ul-Mulk in 1892 provoked a fourfold dispute between his three sons and his brother, involving first the expulsion of the brother and the murder of one of the sons, and finally the murder of a second son (January 1895). The third son, Afzul-ul-Mulk, sought British recognition, but Dr. George Robertson, who was sent to investigate his claims, was compelled to retire into Chitral fort on the return of the expelled uncle (Shere Afzul) and his ally the Khan of Jandol (February). The investiture of Chitral (March 3—April 18) led to an expedition being sent from India under Generals Low and Kelly. The relief force arrived at Chitral on April 20 and delivered the besieged. On the advice of the Indian government it was decided (August 1895) that Great Britain should retain Chitral, on account of its strategic position.

Chivalry. This word, which variously meant "horsemanship," "knighthood," "a fully-armed array of horsemen or knights," "the knightly ideal of conduct," and other things akin to these, in its widest application embraced the whole brotherhood of trained, approved, and dedicated men of the sword, who had undertaken with elaborate and solemn ceremony to do their fighting in a peculiar spirit, on principles and with aims of a special character, as well as the whole body of laws and usages that these select warriors were bound to observe. Defined by a friendly historian, it was "a fraternal association, or rather an enthusiastic compact between men of feeling and courage, of delicacy and devotion," who had chosen the profession of arms and fitted themselves for it by a long and severe apprenticeship. It was an institution in which each faithful member was animated by a sentiment of conscious dignity, and regulated his life in conformity with a code of military ethics that raised a naturally demoralizing occupation into a chastening discipline and ennobling pursuit. It owed to feudalism the conditions which enabled it to play its part; but it was no essential feature or direct offspring of feudalism; it was rather a corrective of the ferocity and injustice that make the chief reproach of feudal institutions.

The times of its beginning and ending, and its origin, are still controverted points among historians. But we cannot be far astray in limiting its flourishing period as an efficient and earnest motive and rule of action to the twelfth and thirteenth centuries [roughly the period of the Crusades], though its spirit and forms can be traced much earlier, and, in show at least, are perceptible much later. Freeman sees the dawn of English chivalry in William Rufus's making a certain line of conduct "a point of honour"; and the French wars of Edward III display the glitter and affectations, the serious mockeries, that outlived the decay of real chivalry. [In its full development it consisted of three elements, viz., (1) military courage, (2) religious devotion, and (3) gallantry in the erotic sense of the term.] As to its origin, some find it in the Crusades, some in the necessity of confronting the evils that harassed France in the eleventh century by "a consecration of the arms of the strong"; and some in the slow rise to ascendancy of certain ideas and customs—one or two as old as the days of the Germania—amid the anarchy that followed the death of Charlemagne. This last seems the safest conclusion: the ceremonial with which a young German warrior assumed arms; the duty of serving on horseback laid on certain landholders in later times; and the personal attachment to a superior obligatory on an aspirant to a military career, needed but the glow of religious feeling and the sense of individual honour as the master-motive of action to complete the chivalrous character. For the grand creation and central figure of chivalry was the knight; and it is the union in him of religious fervour and sense of duty, with a recognition of honourable obligation, devotion to all women and constancy to one, and a horror of doing anything unworthy of a true knight, that is the very essence of the chivalric idea. Yet chivalry owed to the Crusades its summons into energetic life; in Milman's words, "all the noble sentiments which, blended together, are chivalry—the high sense of honour, the disdain of danger, the love of adventure, compassion for the weak or the oppressed, generosity, self-sacrifice, self-devotion for others—found in the Crusades their animating principle, perpetual occasion for their amplest exercise, their perfection and consummation." The unit of chivalry was the knight, or chevalier, and care was therefore taken to make and keep knighthood select. In most places, though not in all, gentle birth was a necessary qualification; from his seventh to his fourteenth year the aspirant must serve in some noble or knightly household as page or varlet; he had then to choose, from among the well-born ladies of the society he lived in someone as a special object of loyal devotion, and was allowed to receive at the altar from the hands of the priest the consecrated sword that proved him an esquire. His manifold duties as an esquire had as their general drift to make him perfect in the virtues and accomplishments of a knightly character. Having "borne him well" in his long and trying novitiate, he was "ordained" a knight with a most impressive ritual. After being bathed, and clothed in symbolic garments, he fasted for twenty-four hours, watched the arms he was to wear for a whole night in a church, confessed, communicated, had the sword that hung from his neck blessed by the priest, was armed by ladies or knights, and from one of the latter received the accolade. His most imperative obligations, taken on oath, were: to serve God and his prince; to uphold the weak; to be true to his word; to despise gain; to love honour; to persist to the end in any adventure he undertook; to reverence purity in women; to be faithful, courteous and humble; and to protect maidens from danger and insult.

Chivalry had its absurd side: in its name men now and then played very fantastic tricks. Single combats, tournaments, jousts, the splendid frivolities dear to an age of empty show, were its outcome. But its nobler gifts to mankind far outweigh these; for it sprang the Knights Hospitaller and the Teutonic Order, which, along with not a little that is questionable, certainly bore excellent fruit. Above all, it set a curb on the passions of men, and thus softened the horrors of war; held up before them an elevating ideal; made active the virtues of loyalty, courtesy, respect for women, valour, justice, and veracity. Its chief bequest to mankind was the "chastity of honour which felt a stain like a wound," which still lives. It is significant, too, that the clearest English eye of the fourteenth century saw in the knight "who loved chivalrie"

"Trouthe and honour, fredom and curtesie."

Chivalry, THE COURT OF, was held before the constable and the marshal of England for the trial of military offences, and for the decision of questions relating to coat armour, personal honour, and the like. By 13 Rich. II, c. 2, it is declared that the court has cognizance over all matters of this kind, except such as may be determined by the common law. The court has long ceased to be held; the last instance of its sitting being in 1737.

Chronicles constitute one of the two main categories into which the sources for the history of mediæval England are divided. Although the record undoubtedly affords a sounder basis of historical investigation and is increasingly relied upon by the modern historian, the chronicle is and must always be largely used as a source of continuous historical narrative. It has the merit of being more readily accessible, superficially easier to study, more connected, readable, and colourful than the record, which yields its secrets only to the trained investigator after laborious and detailed research. The earliest chronicles were ecclesiastical in origin. The art of historical writing developed in England as a result of the evangelization of the English people in the course of the seventh century; and the first schools of history were the monasteries. The great Benedictine abbeys acted as clearing houses of historical information, and, paradoxically, the men who lived withdrawn from the world became the chief purveyors of the world's news. The "Ecclesiastical History" of Beda (q.v.), the monk of Jarrow, affords the most striking instance in pre-Norman times of the pitch of perfection to which historiography might be carried even under the restrictions and limitations imposed by the cloistral life. In comparison with it the Anglo-Saxon Chronicles (q.v.) sink to the status of mere annals.

In the later Middle Ages the greatest centre of historical composition in England was the abbey of St. Albans, which achieved its highest fame during the thirteenth century, and produced in Matthew Paris (q.v.) perhaps the finest, certainly the best known and most popular of our mediæval historians. With the death of Henry III, however, a definite falling off becomes apparent in the work not only of the school of St. Albans, where Rishanger continued somewhat inadequately the tradition of Wendover and Paris, but in monastic chronicles generally; and the decline was progressive throughout the fifteenth century. The monastic monopoly, never complete, now showed signs of a total breakdown. The succession of "secular" historians, represented in the twelfth century by such names as those of Henry, archdeacon of Huntingdon; Ralph de Diceto, dean of St. Paul's, and Roger of Hoveden, clerk of Henry II's court, was maintained in the fourteenth century by writers such as Avesbury, Baker, and Murimuth; but of much greater significance was the appearance of the civic chronicler, of whom Arnold Fitz-Thedmar, author of the "Liber de Antiquis Legibus," may be cited as an example. By the Lancastrian period the line of monastic chroniclers had almost reached its end. The great schools of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries were represented for the most part by continuators, whose work was jejune, formal, and unsatisfactory. On the other hand, the town chronicles, and especially the chronicles of London, had acquired an authority and importance unprecedented in the earlier period. No less significant was the gradual substitution at that date of the vernacular for the traditional Latin as a medium of expression. It was in the fifteenth century that the English chronicles of London began to take shape, and that the compilation of the great English chronicle of the "Brut" was undertaken to provide a contemporary authority for popular reading. These changes in the language and the provenance of our main historical sources were symptomatic of a deeper and more far-reaching change which was in progress. The Middle Ages were passing, and at the beginning of the Tudor period we find ourselves on the threshold of a new epoch in both history and historical literature. The growth of national consciousness, the rise of the commercial classes, and the revival of learning wrought a change alike in the spirit and the content of historical writing; and the disappearance of the mediæval chronicle may be said to synchronize with the invention of the printing press, and the first stirrings of the literary Renaissance.

Church of England. Christianity came to Britain in the wake of the Roman occupation, and the British Church was so far organized that it sent three bishops to the Council of Arles in 314. [CHURCH, THE EARLY CELTIC.] The English invaders were heathens, and British Christianity was swept westward before them. The conversion of the English was effected by missionaries from Rome in the south, and missionaries from Iona in the north. As the ritual of these two sets of missionaries differed in some points, different usages were found to be productive of confusion, till at the Synod of Whitby (664) the Northumbrian kingdom adopted the Roman use; and from that time England obtained ecclesiastical unity as a daughter of the Church of Rome. The work of ecclesiastical organization was begun by Archbishop Theodore in 668, and the example of unity given by the Church was one of the chief influences to produce unity in the State. Church and State worked harmoniously together, and there were no questions to bring them into collision. The bishop sat by the side of the ealdorman in the shire court, and ecclesiastical causes were decided in the same way as others. [The names of Dunstan and Edgar are connected with the reform of monasticism in England, and with the close co-operation of Church and State before the Conquest.] The period of the Norman Conquest coincided with that of the ecclesiastical reforms wrought by Hildebrand on the continent; and the influence of his ideas is apparent in the ecclesiastical policy of William I. Ecclesiastical courts were established for ecclesiastical causes, which were to be tried by canonical, not by customary, law. This change was considered necessary for the sake of a uniform system of law, to introduce more regular discipline into the Church; but it resulted in later centuries in a vexatious extension of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and led to the recognition of the right of appeal to the papal court, which proved harmful to the authority and independence of bishops. But while making this change, William I was careful to protect himself from papal interference by laying down three rules: (1) That the Pope of Rome should not be recognized as apostolic, except at the king's command, and that letters from the pope be first shown to the king. (2) That the resolutions of ecclesiastical synods should have no legal force till sanctioned by the king. (3) That no baron or royal servant be excommunicated except by the king's consent. These regulations of William I adumbrate the possibilities of difficulty in the relations between Church and State which were speedily realized. Under Henry I, Archbishop Anselm raised the question of the lawfulness of lay investiture to a spiritual office. The tenure of clerical lands was, by the growth of the royal power, assimilated to that of lay. The nomination of bishops, and their investiture with the emblems of their spiritual dignity, had passed into the hands of the Crown. Hildebrand strove to check the growing secularization of the Church; but the State answered, with some show of reason, that it could not allow of the existence of powerful landholders who did not recognize the king as their lord. In England a compromise was at length made between Henry I and the pope. The king agreed that chapters should elect their bishops, but the election was to be made in the king's court; he gave up the investiture with ring and crosier, but the bishops were to do homage for their temporalities. The Crown retained the real appointment of bishops, and the rights of suzerainty over them, but abandoned its encroachments upon their spiritual dignity. Anselm showed that the Church was the only power which could withstand the tyranny of the Crown. In like manner, Becket resisted Henry II; and Bishop Hugh, of Lincoln, offered a constitutional resistance to the demands for money made in the name of Richard I. During the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the Church fought the battle of the people, while it defended its own rights against the threatening power of the king.

But though the Church succeeded in a measure in holding its own against the king, it was less successful against the pope. [The papacy as the fons et origo of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, exercised throughout the various countries of Europe in accordance with the precepts of canon law, secured a great influence through the ecclesiastical courts and the evocation of cases to Rome. Through the various monastic revivals of the tenth to the twelfth centuries, and the movement of the friars in the thirteenth, the papacy also gained emissaries in every country, and further strengthened its power.] The pope, as judge in all disputed cases, gained considerable power over episcopal elections, where disputes were frequent. In 1204 Pope Innocent III rejected the contending candidates for the see of Canterbury, proposed Stephen Langton, and confirmed his informal election without the king's consent. Gradually the king and the pope came to a sort of tacit understanding that they would share between them the appointment to bishoprics, and the result was that the powers of the chapters became more and more shadowy, till they practically died away. Papal provisions and reservations overrode the rights of patrons, and though the Statute of Provisors (1350, 1364, 1390) was enacted and re-enacted to check this abuse, the pope and the king found their interests to coincide in keeping a tolerably close partnership in the disposition of patronage. Yet the Statute of Præmunire (16 Rich. II, c. 5, 1393), which forbade the prosecution of suits in foreign courts, gave the king a powerful weapon against the pope, and was resented as an infringement of the papal supremacy. Papal taxation weighed heavily on the clergy, and the attempt made by Pope Boniface VIII to exempt them from national taxation was powerless before the resolute character of Edward I. [PAPACY, RELATIONS WITH.]

In the fourteenth century the results of the organization of the constitution by Edward I, and the steady growth of royal and papal interference with the appointment and powers of the bishops, gradually diminished the political influence of the Church, and its spiritual activity declined. The teaching of Wyclif marked dissatisfaction against the papacy, social discontent, and, in a minor degree, desire for doctrinal change. The social side of the Lollard movement was the most largely developed, and it was this especially that led to legislation against heresy. In 1401 was passed the statute De Hæretico Comburendo (2 Hen. IV, c. 15). The Church lost its hold upon the people, and became more and more dependent on the pope and the king. There was an acknowledgment of abuses on all sides, but there was no power to work a reformation. The machinery of the Church had been ruined by papal interference. Reform was possible only at Rome; but the popes showed no inclination to undertake it. The clergy gradually put themselves more and more under the royal protection as against the pope, till Henry VIII, freed from any power of the baronage and willing to serve the interests of the commons, found the Church reduced to obsequious dependence on the Crown. Henry VIII quarrelled with the papacy about one of the few points in which the papal interference with legislation was possible without the king's consent. At length he put forth the fullness of the royal power. By suppressing the monasteries, he deprived the Church of a third of its revenues and the papacy of its strongest outposts in England. He severed the union between the English and the Roman Churches, and compelled the reluctant clergy to recognize the king as supreme head of the Church in England. He practically deprived the Church of independent legislative power by requiring the royal licence for all decrees of convocation. Henry VIII broke with the papacy because the papacy was an obstacle in the way of his personal policy; but he aimed at a reformation of ecclesiastical practice and a readjustment of the ecclesiastical system to the needs of England as it was. Still, the breach with Rome would have been impossible to Henry VIII if there had not been a serious breach in the European obedience to the papacy. New theological opinions were rapidly spreading in Germany, representing the application of the ideas of the Renaissance to Biblical studies, and had already attracted the attention of scholars in England; and Henry VIII's wish to confine his changes to mere points of ecclesiastical organization was impossible. Yet, so long as he lived he held the balance between the old and the new learning, and checked the progress of doctrinal change. Under Edward VI the reforming party came into power, and Archbishop Cranmer moved forward towards the German Protestants. The steps in his advance may be traced in the history of the formularies of the English Church, [notably in the First Prayer Book of Edward VI (1549) and the Second Prayer Book (1551).] [ARTICLES.] But the reforming party was a minority of the nation, and its rapid changes shocked the popular mind; it owed its political support to the selfish greed of a body of courtiers, who were willing to use the Reformation as a means of enriching themselves. Hence the reaction under Mary was greeted with delight; but it was too complete to be permanent. The Catholicism of Mary was anti-national, and the successive failures of Protestants and Catholics under Edward VI and Mary prepared the way for the religious settlement of Elizabeth.

Elizabeth reverted to the policy of her father, and strove to effect a compromise between the now hostile parties of the Catholics and Protestants. The Catholics held to the old formularies; the more advanced Protestants, who had been in exile during Mary's reign, had adopted the logical system of theology laid down by Calvin, and demanded that nothing should be adopted but what could be proved by Scripture to be true. Elizabeth favoured the opinion of the moderate Reformers, who held that nothing should be discarded but what could be shown from Scripture to be false. The Second Prayer Book of Edward VI was revised, and two statutes were passed in 1559 which established the legal relations between Church and State. The Act of Supremacy required all beneficed ecclesiastics, and all laymen holding office, to take the oath of supremacy, and renounce all foreign jurisdiction. The Act of Uniformity prohibited the use by any minister of any liturgy save that contained in the Prayer Book, and imposed a fine on all who absented themselves from church. The Liturgy and the Articles, under the direction of Archbishop Parker, were devised so as to retain some of the old uses, while purging them of much that might offend the Calvinistic party. The ideal of Elizabeth was comprehension uniformly enforced. It was impossible that such a scheme should be entirely successful; yet it so far succeeded that the national feeling of England gathered round the Church, which embraced the large majority of the people. But a considerable Catholic party stood aloof; and the excommunication of Elizabeth by the pope in 1570, the secret visits of Jesuit missionaries, and the plots in favour of Mary Queen of Scots, occasioned a rigorous persecution of the Catholics. Similarly, the Calvinistic party, or Puritans, disliked many practices of the prescribed ritual as superstitious, and disregarded them. In 1565 Archbishop Parker issued a book of regulations, known as the "Advertisements" (q.v.), which afterwards received the royal sanction. He attempted to enforce regularity in the conduct of services, and thereby only drove the Calvinists into more pronounced opposition. [It became evident that their opposition was not confined to nocent ceremonies, but aimed at the establishment of a Presbyterian government of the Church in the place of Episcopacy.] Yet the persecution of Archbishop Whitgift was injudicious and ineffective. The High Commission Court, to which was entrusted the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Crown, grew to be a means of royal tyranny.

One result of the legislation of Elizabeth was that the Church became definitely subordinate to the State; jurisdiction and legislation for the Church could only be exercised with the consent of the Crown, and the rites and discipline of the Church could not be altered without the consent of parliament. The appointment of bishops was exercised by the Crown, and Elizabeth demanded that they should be Crown officials, for the purpose of enforcing the ecclesiastical uniformity which she required. They became, and have to some extent still continued to be, disciplinary officers executing the law, rather than Fathers in God to their clergy. [Yet it was the determined retention of Episcopacy by Elizabeth, involving the continuity of episcopal administration, which ensured that the English Church should not follow the reformed churches of the continent. The Anglican position of the via media was expounded with great learning and judgment in the "Ecclesiastical Polity" of Richard Hooker.] On the death of Elizabeth there were loud demands for concessions. But James I lectured the Puritan ministers in the Hampton Court Conference (q.v.) (1604), and agreed to a few insignificant alterations in the Prayer Book which reconciled no one. Archbishop Bancroft continued the persecution of the Puritans, and deprived many Puritan clergy of their benefices. The Puritan party became more and more identified with the party of constitutional opposition to the Crown; and in the Church itself, in reaction against the Calvinistic system of theology and Church polity, a party began to arise which insisted on the necessity of Episcopacy as a divine institution, and, by excluding Presbyterians from the Catholic Church, seemed to draw nearer to the Church of Rome. This party advocated the divine right of kings, and preached the doctrine of passive obedience. Under Archbishop Laud it attained to great influence, and aided Charles I in his arbitrary and unconstitutional conduct. The result was that Puritanism in England combined with Presbyterianism in Scotland, Charles I lost his throne and his life, and the Church of England was abolished. But rigid Presbyterianism would have laid a heavier yoke on England than the rigid Anglicanism of Laud. Cromwell gathered round him the sects, especially the Independents, and saved England from Presbyterianism by advocating the liberty of each congregation. But the Puritan supremacy was intolerable to England, and the restoration of Charles II brought back the Church of England, endeared to the people as a bulwark against Puritanism. There was some show of desire to meet the scruples of the Puritans, and a conference was held in the Savoy Palace, 1661. But Dr. Sancroft, who presided, was of an unyielding temper, and the demands of the Puritans were unreasonable. Both parties separated in anger. A few changes were made in the Prayer Book—but they increased rather than diminished the objections the Puritans had to it. Then, in 1662, was passed an Act of Uniformity, which required all benefited clergy not only to use the Prayer Book, and that only, but also to declare “unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything contained and prescribed in it.” About two thousand of the clergy were ejected from their benefices for refusing to make this declaration. Charles II was willing to grant indulgences to the Puritans, that he might also grant them to the Catholics. Parliament and the bishops regarded the maintenance of the Established Church as the only means of saving England from the dangers of complications in foreign politics which might come through Catholicism and the dangers of the tyranny of an organized minority in domestic affairs. The royal indulgence was opposed, and acts against Nonconformity rapidly succeeded one another; the Corporation Act, the Conventicle Act, the Five Mile Act, the Test Act, and the act for disabling Papists from sitting in either House of parliament, were all passed between 1661 and 1679. In 1664 an important change was made in the relations between Church and State. Hitherto the clergy had taxed themselves in convocation, but it was found that they consequently were taxed more heavily than the laity. In 1664 it was quietly agreed that the clergy should be taxed in the same manner as the laity—by parliament. Though convocation had lost its power of making canons without the king's consent, it still could petition for redress of grievances before granting supplies. Now that it ceased to grant supplies, its proceedings became merely formal, and it did not meet for business again throughout the reign of Charles II; and after giving occasion to a prolonged controversy from 1697 to 1717, it was not again summoned for business till 1861, when it was revived. [CONVOCATION.]

The policy of Charles II seemed to favour the Catholics, and popular suspicion led to a persecution of the Catholics in consequence of the false evidence of a pretended Popish plot. Notwithstanding a vigorous attempt to exclude

James II from the throne, on the ground that he was a Catholic, the general desire of England for a settled government led men to accept him as king. But James II strove to impose by his prerogative a toleration which would enable him to put Catholics in all the important offices of state. He ordered a general declaration of liberty of conscience suspending all penal laws about religion, to be read in all the churches. Seven bishops, headed by Archbishop Sancroft, petitioned the king to recall this order. They were committed to the Tower, and were brought to trial for uttering a libel against the king, and their acquittal was a sign of the public opinion against James, which led to the Revolution. The accession of William III and Mary was largely due to the general fear of Catholicism, illustrated by the fact that the Dissenters preferred to wait for toleration from the Church rather than to accept it unconstitutionally from the king. In 1689 a Toleration Act was passed, which granted some relief to the Dissenters, but none to the Catholics. Moreover, the Revolution overturned the doctrine of the divine right of kings, which had been a tenet of Anglicanism; and Archbishop Sancroft, with three hundred others, resigned their offices rather than take the oath of allegiance to William. The sect of the Non-jurors soon died away [and the Church repelled William III's plans for a “comprehension,” which was intended to bring the great majority of Dissenters within the Establishment. In contrast to William III, who was disliked by the clergy as a Calvinist], Anne showed herself favourable to the Church, and in 1704 formed the fund which is known as Queen Anne's Bounty (q.v.), by giving up for the augmentation of small benefices certain ecclesiastical dues which the English Crown had inherited as the heir of the papal claims. The old High Church doctrines of divine right and of passive obedience were revived in a modified form, and the impeachment of an obscure divine, Dr. Sacheverell, for a sermon condemning the Revolution, was one of the causes of the fall of the Whig ministry. The toleration given to Dissenters under William III was diminished by the act of 1711 against occasional conformity, and the Schism Act of 1714, which required all teachers to have a licence from a bishop. But these were the last acts which savoured of exclusiveness. [The Hanoverian succession in 1714 involved the triumph of the Whigs, and the Church had to face the difficult task of reconciling its interests with the regime of Whig domination. In 1719 the Occasional Conformity and Schism Acts were repealed], and a yearly Act of Indemnity began to be passed in 1727 for Dissenters who held office contrary to prohibitive acts. From this time forward there was a gradual progress in practical tolerance, and in the last thirty years of the century efforts were made, with some success, to repeal the disabling acts. The Corporation and Test Acts were not, however, repealed till 1828, and in 1829 the Catholic Relief Bill became law. [The Church of the eighteenth century was chiefly occupied in the conflict with Deism and in the effort to adjust its doctrines to the discoveries of natural science and the dim beginnings of Biblical criticism. This task was undertaken largely by the latitudinarian school of divines.]

Meanwhile, religious decline had invaded the Church and Nonconformists alike. This was broken by the efforts of the Wesleys and Whitefield, and their movement to Christianize the masses met with great success. It was looked upon by the Church with coldness that deepened into fear, lest there should be a recurrence of the excesses of the Commonwealth period, and Wesley's followers formed themselves into a sect known by the name of Methodists. This movement largely swelled the ranks of Nonconformity, but also awakened the zeal of the Church and influenced the Evangelical Revival. Still, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Church was violently assailed by Nonconformists; ecclesiastical abuses were remorselessly exposed, and claims resting solely on the fact that they were "by law established" were seen by their champions to be untenable. The wave of Liberalism that carried the Reform Bill was seen to be dangerously threatening the Church itself. In the earlier portion of the nineteenth century the most active party in the Church were the revived Puritans, under Simeon and Melvill. A movement which had its seat at Oxford, and was begun by Newman, Keble, Pusey, and Hurrell Froude, revived the old High Church party. In a flow of tracts and pamphlets the leaders of this movement laboured to restore the dogmatic basis of the Church. Their propositions awakened considerable alarm, which increased when some of the leading minds, notably Newman and Ward, joined the Church of Rome. Theological activity again awakened, and questions as to the limits of comprehension allowed by the formularies of the Church of England to its clergy were raised with much frequency. When these questions had slightly subsided, another of equal importance emerged—that of the limits allowed to the clergy in criticizing the Scriptures, and of individual opinion as to their interpretation. The result of this revival of theological interest was to bring forward many points for settlement. In early times appeals in cases of dispute were decided by the pope; after the Reformation they were decided by the king in council, and a Court of Delegates was appointed when occasion required. In 1832 this Court of Delegates was abolished, and ecclesiastical appeals were transferred to the appellate jurisdiction of the king in council. In the first heat of party feeling, the composition of this court was not much regarded; but more recently this question has become one of the chief difficulties in the relations between Church and State. Another consequence of theological differences was to show that the Church was powerless to influence the appointment of bishops by the Crown. In 1847 objections were made on theological grounds to the appointment of Dr. Hampden to the see of Hereford; but it was found that there was no legal means of having these objections brought to trial. In 1861 the meetings of convocation were revived, and though the constitution of that body is not entirely representative of the clergy, it gives expression to many of their grievances. By its agency a revision of the translation of the Bible was undertaken. In 1886 a representative House of Laymen for the province of Canterbury—a body from the purview of which matters of doctrine are excluded—held its first sitting. The Church during the nineteenth century became vigorous and more highly organized, and recognized within its body considerable variations of theological opinion. On the other hand, Nonconformists have been freed from all disabilities and from all legal obligations towards the Church. An act passed in 1868 abolished compulsory Church rates for the maintenance of parish churches, and the Burials Act of 1880 permitted Nonconformists to bury their dead in the parish churchyards with their own rites and ceremonies. [M. C.; N. S.]

[The most remarkable characteristics of the Church in the twentieth century have been the alteration in the position and influence of its respective parties, and the renewed agitation of the question of the relations between Church and State. The revival of dogmatic theology created by the Oxford Movement has resulted in the growth of the Anglo-Catholic party, which, comprising a large section of the clergy and a considerable number of the laity, makes its appeal away from the Thirty-Nine Articles of the sixteenth century to the decrees of the early general councils and to the tradition of the undivided Church. The influence of this party has also led to a considerable enrichment of the ceremonial of public worship and to a renewed study of liturgical principles. On the other hand, the rapid growth of the movement of Biblical criticism has given a new impetus to the old Broad Church party, and, whilst seriously affecting the position of the older Evangelicals, has led to the emergence of a new party of Modernist Churchmen, and of Liberal Evangelicals. In the political sphere the passing of the Welsh Church Disestablishment Act raised the question of the relations of Church and State in England. The agitation culminated in the passing of the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act in December 1919. This act provided for the creation of a National Assembly consisting of three Houses, of bishops, clergy, and laity. The first two Houses were identical in personnel with the Upper and Lower Houses of Convocation of both provinces, and the House of Laity was to be elected by the various diocesan conferences pro rata, and to be representative indirectly of the parochial church councils which were henceforth to be set up in every parish. The assembly was empowered to prepare measures of ecclesiastical reform to be laid before parliament. In parliament these measures were to be considered by a special ecclesiastical committee of both Houses, which was to report in favour of, or against, the proposals sent to them. All measures were to be laid before parliament for a specified period, during which a debate could be challenged. If no debate were challenged, and the report of the ecclesiastical committee was in the affirmative, the measure was passed automatically at the end of the stated period, and presented to the king for his assent. But the powers of parliament were limited by its inability to alter any measure, which must be accepted or rejected in toto. If the ecclesiastical committee reported against any measure, the legislative committee of the national assembly could withdraw that measure. Since the creation of this assembly several acts of a non-controversial character have been passed; such as the Clergy Pensions Act, and various acts for the creation of new bishoprics, e.g., of Leicester and Blackburn. Two measures have been defeated, the Bishopric of Shrewsbury Bill, in the House of Lords, and a bill relating to certain churches of the City of London, in the House of Commons. These two defeats raised doubts as to the practical possibilities of the reforms created by the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act. But it was recognized that the most controversial question was still to come. The task of the revision of the Prayer Book, necessitated by the growth both of the Anglo-Catholic party and of the movement of Biblical criticism, and undertaken by the Church in response to Royal Letters of Business issued to the convocations, entered upon its final stage in 1927.

The Deposited Book received the assent both of convocation and of the national assembly, and was presented to parliament in December 1927; the House of Lords passed the measure by 241 votes to 88, but the Commons rejected it by 238 votes to 205. The House of Bishops decided to make certain modifications in the Book, and to present it, thus modified, again to the Commons. Accordingly, after it had passed through the convocations and the national assembly, it was laid before parliament. On June 14, 1928, the House of Commons rejected it by 266 votes to 220. It is obvious that the two adverse decisions of the Commons have raised in an acute form the problem of the relations of Church and State. Parliament has retained its sovereign authority to reject, though it cannot amend, ecclesiastical bills. But the possibility of a severance of the traditional connexion of Church and State in England is now more immediate than it has ever been before. At least it is clear that the Enabling Act has not effected a solution of the problem, with which it was intended to deal.

Church of Ireland, THE. Ireland was converted to Christianity by St. Patrick, in the latter half of the fifth century. The faith of the new Church was that of the rest of Western Christendom. Her discipline, owing to the geographical isolation of the country, became distinctive. Diocesan organization as understood in countries under Roman law was unknown. The Irish Church was adapted to the principles of tribal government, that is to say that each church or monastic establishment was practically independent. It was only after some hundreds of years that certain national peculiarities such as the form of the Irish tonsure and the old date of keeping Easter were abandoned, and that the supremacy of the see of Armagh was assured.

The tribal constitution of the Celts made them monks. Their old roving spirit made them missionaries. As both they exercised a lasting influence over European Christianity. They helped to convert England, and left it the most monastic of Latin Churches. In the twelfth century Germany was studded with their monasteries. They were the apostles of Franconia and Carinthia. From Naples to Iceland they have left their names. But it was in Gaul that the Irish set an enduring mark on Western civilization. Towards the close of the sixth century St. Columban settled at Luxeuil, in the Vosges, and from that centre colonized the classic land of Latin monasticism. His disciples conformed to the wiser rule of Benedict, and were absorbed in the Benedictine order. But their labours led to the Benedictine settlement of Burgundy. Their monasteries, planted in the darkest days of Western Christianity, prepared the way for Clugny, for Cîteaux, and for Clairvaux, for Pope Gregory VII, and St. Bernard. When the monk-popes of Burgundy saved Christendom from an hereditary priesthood, the danger was, perhaps, greatest in the tribal church of Ireland. But the popes themselves were reared by the children of Columban. St. Malachy (1095-1148), who had been brought early under the influence of Rome, introduced the new discipline into Ireland. The Norse invasions had destroyed the monasteries. The lay administrators of the Church lands had encroached upon the title and the prerogatives of the abbots. Malachy reformed Bangor. He was nominated Archbishop of Armagh by Celsus, the hereditary incumbent. After a long struggle with the assertors of the tribal principle, he found himself acknowledged as primate in 1133. He visited Clairvaux. He left his companions with Bernard for instruction. He journeyed to Rome, and was appointed legate by Innocent II. On his return he founded the Cistercian house of Mellifont, in Louth, the first regular monastery in Ireland. Eight years later he again passed into Gaul to receive the pallium from Eugenius IV. But his strength failed him at Clairvaux. He died under the roof of his friend and master in 1148. Four years after his death Cardinal John Papteron and Christian, Bishop of Lismore, presided as papal legates over a council at Mellifont. The four metropolitan sees were established, an attempt was made to introduce the canonical restraints on marriage, and some minor abuses were corrected. Many other synods were held in the twelfth century. Those of Cashel (1172) and Dublin (1186) are the most important. The first tried to introduce the payment of tithes and other English observances. The second confined itself to regulating the ritual. In both there is a marked tendency to conform to the Roman discipline. By the end of the century the traditional monasticism was everywhere superseded by the rule of the Augustinian canons. The learning of the older monks is proved by the testimony of Bæda, by the classical manuscripts in their peculiar character still scattered over Europe, and by the bold and often unorthodox doctrines they maintained. Virgilius taught the existence of the antipodes in the eighth century, John Scotus Erigena upheld the views of Origen in the ninth, and Macarius seems, in some points, to have anticipated the theories of Spinoza.

From their first conversion the Danes of the eastern seaboard looked upon the tribal church as irregular. Their endeavours to place themselves under the jurisdiction, first of the Norwegian, and afterwards of the English primate, led to a separation between the two Irish Churches, which in one form or other has lasted to the present time. Bishops of Dublin, Waterford, and Limerick were consecrated by the English primates from the days of Lanfranc. The establishment of the metropolitan sees by Eugenius was resented in England as an infringement of the rights of Canterbury. From the coming of the Normans to the final enforcement of Protestantism under Charles I, the mutual animosity of the natives and the colonists deepened the estrangement between Dublin and Armagh. Irish clerks and Irish monks were excluded from English benefices and English monasteries, while the Saxon was shut out from foundations beyond the Pale. At length the Reformation freed Dublin from its dependence by an order in council (1551).

The mendicants reached Ireland soon after their foundation, and have ever since rendered great services to their Church. Even before the Reformation "no person of the Church, high or low, great or small, English or Irish, used to preach the word of God, saving the poor friar beggars." Ecclesiastical discipline had perished in the general desolation. Great foundations like Clonmacnoise and Ardagh were without vestments and church plate. Walled towns alone possessed means for the decent conduct of public worship.

The earlier measures of Henry VIII met with little opposition. The declaration of the royal supremacy (28 Henry VIII, c. 13) was accepted by the Catholics of the Pale, and generally disregarded by the Celts. The only protest against the dissolution of the monasteries came from the deputy and council, who regarded it as a blow fatal to the education "of the whole Englishry of this land." The attempt made in 1551 to force the ritual of 1549 upon the Irish was the first step which provoked resistance. The new doctrines were preached in a foreign tongue. The new preachers were time-servers, and men of scandalous lives. Zealous Protestants refused the cure of souls whom they could not hope to instruct. On the death of Edward VI the old rites were restored, and the Protestant prelates withdrew. The religious policy of Elizabeth is well illustrated by her reply to Hugh O'Neill's demand for liberty of conscience. "Her Majesty hath tolerated herein hitherto, and so in likelihood she will continue the same." Catholicism was a real danger to an excommunicated sovereign, and there were too many Irish Catholics in the queen's armies for a systematic persecution of the Catholic faith. The steps which gradually led to the fusion of the Anglo-Normans of the Pale, and their old enemies the Celts, into a "quasi-nation," have been indicated in the general article on Ireland. Careful provision for the Anglican Church was made in the plantation under James I, and again at the Restoration. But her position was essentially weak. The highest offices were invariably filled with English courtiers. The Archbishop of Dublin was usually one of the chief parliamentary managers for the Crown. Non-residence was shamefully common amongst the dignitaries of the Establishment, while extreme poverty hampered the usefulness of the country parsons. Their missionary efforts bore little fruit, but as resident country gentlemen they did much to improve the social condition of the people. The provisions of the penal code affecting Catholic laymen belong to the political history of Ireland. But there were many special laws aimed directly at the priesthood. By an act of 1703 all priests were compelled to register their names and addresses, and take the oath of allegiance. Over a thousand obeyed. In 1709 they were required to take the oath of abjuration, which they believed to be unlawful. Fewer than forty submitted. The rest incurred the penalty of banishment for life, and of death

if they returned. All the dignitaries of the Church, from archbishops to vicars-general, all friars, and all unregistered priests were liable to the pains of treason. Catholic education was absolutely forbidden, while the proselytism of the Charter Schools (1733—q.v.) was encouraged by heavy subsidies, and special legislative restrictions on the natural rights of parents. The penal system inflicted frightful evils on the country, but of course failed of its object. From the first, "Popish priests spared not to come out of Spain, from Rome and from Reimes, only to draw the people into the Church of Rome." Even in the worst days bishops, arch-priests, and vicars-general lurked disguised in obscure farmhouses. In 1732 there were 892 mass-houses, served by 1,445 priests, besides regulars, in the kingdom. Twenty years later an organized hierarchy of twenty-four archbishops and bishops administered the Church, under the general supervision of the nuncio at Brussels. The prelates were still nominated by the exiled Stuarts. After the middle of the eighteenth century many causes tended to promote a general toleration. The spirit of Locke and Hoadly prevailed amongst educated Protestants. Educated Catholics brought home the doctrines of the Encyclopédie from France. A Gallican tinge pervaded the priesthood. The bishops of Munster were censured by the Propaganda for approving the oath embodied in 13 and 14 George III, c. 35. The teaching of Abernethy and of Francis Hutcheson had diffused a rationalistic spirit amongst the Ulster Presbyterians. The schisms of the "New Lights" in 1726, and of the rigid Covenanters twenty years later, broke their power. The toleration of 1778 sprang, as Charlemont said, "rather from fashionable Deism than from Christianity, which is now unfortunately much out of fashion." But the latitudinarian phase soon passed away. The Evangelical movement and the Ultramontane revival embittered the animosities caused by the rebellion and its suppression, by O'Connell's agitations, by the Church Temporalities Act of 1833, the appropriation clause of 1835, the tithe war, and the education question. The position of the Establishment was indefensible. The enfranchisement of the Catholics (1793) sealed its doom. The Protestants realized their danger, and made an express guarantee of the rights of the Church an indispensable condition of the Union. This policy was for a time successful, but no guarantee could permanently maintain so glaring an abuse. In March 1868 Gladstone carried resolutions condemning the existence of the Church as an Establishment. A dissolution followed in the autumn, and the Liberals acceded to power. In the first session of the new parliament an act "to put an end to the Established Church in Ireland, and to make provision in respect of the temporalities thereof," became law. The Episcopalians availed themselves of the change thus wrought in their position to revise their constitution and liturgy in an anti-sacerdotal sense. The Catholic Church has made great material progress during the last half-century, while her discipline has been thoroughly reformed under the vigorous rule of a new school of prelates. "Secularism" has of late begun to threaten her political power. The Presbyterians are still the strongest and most numerous communion in the North.

Church of Scotland, THE. There is no documentary authority previous to the ninth century for the title "Scottish Church," but there is reliable evidence that in the beginning of the fifth century Christianity reached North Britain. The names of three men deserve mention in the annals of that evangelism—Ninian, Kentigern, and Columba. St. Ninian was a Briton who had visited Rome and later became a disciple of St. Martin of Tours, and his centre of missionary activity was the Candida Casa near Whithorn in Galloway. He laboured amongst the Picts, and recent research has accumulated evidence that in St. Ninian's days (400–32) the Pictish Church exerted a wide influence. St. Kentigern was also of British race and his work was done in Strathclyde. It was he who founded a religious community at Cathures, the site of the modern Glasgow, with the cathedral of which his name was afterwards associated. But the most virile of the three pioneers was St. Columba, who in 563 landed in Iona. He was a Scot, one of a race which inhabited the north of Ireland and had already sent colonists to Dalriada (Argyll) in Northern Britain. St. Columba (521–97) was a monk, an aristocrat, and a statesman; and he deserves his title of the "Apostle of Scotland." The range of his activities and the completeness of his ecclesiastical organization have been exaggerated by chroniclers, mediæval and modern, but it is undoubted that the Columban Church was for centuries a bulwark against paganism in North Britain and a missionary inspiration of Northumbria in the years before St. Augustine reached Southern Britain. The Celtic Church had a just and considerable reputation for its learning, piety, and evangelism. It was monastic, and in its regime the abbot was superior to the bishop, but any divergence from the doctrine and ritual of the Western Church was unconscious rather than deliberate.

In the seventh century, however, the Columban Church was at issue with the Roman Church in England on some matters of ecclesiastical usage, and the decision of the Synod of Whitby gradually wrought a change in its worship and organization. For three centuries the Scottish Church had a precarious hold on the loyalty of the races in Scotland, and was sorely in need of reawakening. That work was effectively begun by Margaret, an English princess who had retired northward at the time of the Norman Conquest and had found refuge and queenly rank at the court of Malcolm Canmore. The friend of Lanfranc, she did not rest until she had brought the Scottish Church into conformity with that of western Europe. Her son, David, carried on what she had begun, and his beneficence was so lavish that it earned for him the epithet of "a sair saint for the crown." David I was not only the founder of feudal Scotland, he was the inspiration of the mediæval Scottish Church. At the close of his reign (1124-53) there were at least nine bishoprics in his country, the formation of a parochial system had begun, and several distinguished monastic orders had been introduced. The face of the Church had been radically changed. But the reorganized Church had soon to meet serious difficulty. Just as English sovereigns were incessant in their claims of lordship over Scotland, so the archbishops of the Church of England claimed a spiritual supremacy. In 1188, however, Pope Clement III rescued the Church of Scotland from the dominance of its neighbour, and declared it to be "a daughter of Rome by special grace and immediately subject to her." The Scottish Church regarded this dependence as its best proof of independence of alien power. During the War of Independence the Church was loyal to Bruce and in great measure helped him to win his campaign. Naturally, churchmen took an increasing share in the governance of Scotland, for such learning as they had made inevitable their appointment to the chief offices of state when their fidelity to the crown was proved. Though the influence of the clergy in fostering education has been exaggerated by the romantic school of historians, it is true that the Church played a considerable part in promoting national culture, and out of the schools connected with cathedrals or monastic foundations there grew the grammar schools of later days. Any interest in music, art, and architecture that marked mediæval Scotland was largely inspired by the Church, and the regular clergy helped the Scottish people to learn agriculture and did much to foster trade and manufacture. The Scottish Church in 1225 received from Honorius III the privilege of holding a Provincial Council despite her lack of a metropolitan, an ecclesiastical defect which was not remedied before 1472 when St. Andrews was erected into an archbishopric. The fifteenth century was notable for the foundation of three out of the four universities of Scotland—St. Andrews (1411), Glasgow (1450), and Aberdeen (1494)—and these were essentially Church institutions. But during that century the Scottish Church, powerful as it was in national politics, disclosed many signs of spiritual impotence. The Statutes of the Church are proof of the vain endeavour of her leaders to set their house in order, and the populace, sullen in their grievance against papal taxation and clerical control of the nation's wealth, were prepared to sympathize with any reformation which promised freedom. The burning of John Resby at Perth and Paul Craw, a Bohemian, at St. Andrews, indicated that heresy had infected Scotland before the middle of the fifteenth century. Despite the efforts of the Crown and the Church the "new doctrines" caught the imagination and held the loyalty of many Scots people. The Beaton exemplified the wealth, political power, and dominance of the Church to such an extent that the nobles grew jealous of their despotism and wavered in their support of the traditional policy of close alliance with France. Patrick Hamilton (1528) (q.v.) and George Wishart (1546) (q.v.) were put to death as heretics, and the assassination of Cardinal David Beaton (q.v.), a base reprisal for ecclesiastical persecution, set in motion a religious revolution. [REFORMATION IN SCOTLAND.] The work of John Knox (q.v.) was trenchantly carried on by Andrew Melville, who gave to the Scottish Church its characteristic stamp of Presbyterianism. But most of the seventeenth century had passed before the victory of Presbyterianism over Episcopacy was assured. The Stuart dynasty clung to the divine-right theory of sovereignty and sought to impress their will upon the Scottish people. The general assembly in Scotland attempted the task that in England fell to parliament, and in 1638 the ecclesiastical policy of James I and his son, Charles, was overthrown with violence. Charles II, aided by the dissensions of the Covenanters, restored an episcopal polity which endured until the high-handed governance of James II brought ruin to the Stuart kings and triumph for the Scottish Presbyterians in 1689. From 1690 until the present time the Scottish Church has been established in its preferred polity. During the century and a half that followed the settlement the Church was weakened by secessions that were brought about by acute dissension regarding purity of evangelical doctrine and the rights of patronage. In 1733 the first break took place, in 1761 there was a second, and in 1843 the Church suffered its severest disruption. The latter half of the nineteenth century, however, was notable for a movement of reunion of the broken parts of the Scottish Church, and in 1900 the United Free Church of Scotland was formed by the union of the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church. The Church of Scotland in 1909 began negotiations with the United Free Church with a view to union of these Churches, and in 1926 so much progress had been made that the movement appeared to be within reach of success.

Church of Wales, THE. The peculiar features of the Early British Church were gradually disappearing when they were swept away by the Norman Conquest, and by the reform inspired by Pope Gregory VII. The bishoprics of St. Davids and Llandaff became subject to Canterbury with the Norman Conquest of South Wales. The two northern dioceses of Bangor and St. Asaph are usually said to owe their obedience to the successors of St. Thomas to Archbishop Baldwin (q.v.), the ostensible purpose of whose tour in Wales in 1188 was the preaching of the Third Crusade. Normans and Anglo-Normans took the place of the Welsh bishops at St. Davids and Llandaff as they took the places of the Anglo-Saxon bishops of England. Until the Edwardian conquest of the principality the northern bishoprics, especially that of Bangor, were held by Welsh ecclesiastics. Even after 1282 many of the higher clergy in the diocese of Bangor were Welshmen, a fact which seems to show that the exclusion of Welshmen from the sees of St. Davids and Llandaff was due to the influence of the Marcher Lords rather than to the settled policy of Edward I and his successors of the fourteenth century. Welshmen, however, were appointed to English sees, as Stubbs complains, but therein they were considered politically harmless. In one important matter the Hildebrandine reformers failed more completely in Wales than in England. The Welsh clergy of the Middle Ages can hardly be called a celibate clergy. Twice during that period was the authority of Canterbury seriously challenged, by Giraldus Cambrensis, and Owain Glyndwr. Gerald the Welshman struggled hard for many years to make St. Davids an archiepiscopal see. This would have given a great accession of power and dignity to the Earls of Pembroke and might have made them rivals of the house of Anjou in the west. After the fall of Richard II, Owain Glyndwr sought to separate the Welsh dioceses from the province of Canterbury, but the scheme failed like his other projects. Neither Gerald the Welshman nor Owain Glyndwr sought an independent Welsh Church. From the Norman Conquest to the Reformation the Welsh dioceses formed a part of the province of Canterbury, and were subject to the authority of the holy see, and the common law of the Church was enforced therein except and in so far as the operation of both were limited by the law of England, and by a passive resistance to its precepts. The great monastic orders had their houses and monasteries in Wales. Alien priories were to be found in the Marches. The Cistercian order found the Welsh hills admirable for the breeding of sheep, and was a great patron of learning. The principal resort of pilgrims in Wales was St. Davids, which seems to have been more accessible by sea than by land. The most famous of the ecclesiastics of Wales of the Middle Ages are Gerald the Welshman and Geoffrey of Monmouth.

In 1399 the great barons of England made Henry of Lancaster king. They dreaded the growth of the royal power in the Marches of Wales, and the rise of Welshmen to positions of honour in the service of the king. The consequent rebellion of Owain Glyndwr was a serious affair and saddled Welshmen with a series of repressive statutes which created a degree of bitterness unknown in the earlier centuries. The decline and fall of the house of Lancaster and the weakness and divisions of England gave Wales and the Marches a decisive influence in the affairs of England. Both the house of York and the house of Tudor were Marcher dynasties, raised up and supported by men weary of baronial government and repression. The territorial expansion of the monarchy in the west, which took place mainly in the reign of Edward IV, enabled Henry VII and Henry VIII to grant the privileges of English law and government to its inhabitants. To them the king was Arthur, a name which suggested war with Rome, and the supremacy of the Crown. Had not Arthur, according to the story, set up his Table Round, the symbol of sovereignty, in the city of Rome itself? When Henry VIII asserted the royal supremacy his Welsh subjects accepted this great revolution and the Reformation. The Reformation in Wales was not, as in Ireland, accompanied with repressive measures. Hence its success, and in the era of religious wars England and Wales were saved from their horrors. When England and Wales were united, English was made the official language, but the Tudors from Henry VIII to Elizabeth encouraged the use of the Welsh language for worship and culture. The history of the Welsh Prayer Book from the Primer of 1547, the New Testament, Bible, and metrical version of the Psalms may be found in many books.

In the reign of Elizabeth Welshmen were numerous amongst the English clergy, as Shakespeare bears witness, and in the reign of James I, as Ben Jonson testifies. In the seventeenth century Wales stood for Church and king. She produced two of the sweetest singers of the Church in George Herbert and Henry Vaughan, and in John Donne one of her profoundest thinkers. The last of the clerical chancellors was John Williams, Bishop of Lincoln. When James II proceeded to attack the Church, Wales was not unrepresented in the ranks of its defenders. Lloyd of St. Asaph was one of the immortal Seven Bishops (q.v.). The most popular of the Welsh clergy of the seventeenth century was the Puritan vicar, Pritchard of Llandovery of the famous Candle, but he supported Church and king.

The decline of the Church in Wales in the eighteenth century is notorious, and is attributed to various causes. The rise of party government caused all high offices therein to become spoils for the supporters of the party in power. These were invariably Englishmen and often non-resident. There was no bond of sympathy between the superior and inferior clergy, and the superior clergy could not speak to their people in the language they understood. These evils were continued to the second half of the nineteenth century. The suspicion, not unfounded, that Welshmen were Jacobites was fatal to the promotion of Welshmen in the Church during the long ascendancy of the Whigs. The Welsh country gentry were gradually Anglicized and ceased to speak Welsh. The English services they demanded afforded no consolation or instruction to those ignorant of English.

The attempts of the Parliamentarians and Cromwellians to force Puritanism on Wales were not successful, but they prepared the way for developments in the eighteenth century and after. The Welsh Puritan revolution took place in the eighteenth century. It came from within the Church, and is contemporary with the Wesleyan movement. Revivals and enthusiasm abhorred of eighteenth-century scholars became the chief feature of Welsh life down to 1859. The parish churches were often entirely deserted, and their clergy demoralized by having nothing to do. Those who showed any unusual activity were suspected of Methodism, and, in one diocese at least, subjected to a contemptible espionage, more degrading to those who practised it than dangerous to its victims. A peculiarly English interpretation of history, and the theory that the English Church is the peculiar product of the English character and genius, robbed the Church in Wales of its history and made it an alien organization forced by conquest upon a Celtic people. A Celtic interpretation of Welsh history, as false as that which inspired it, left the Welsh Church historically defenceless.

The disestablishment of the Welsh Church became the one insistent demand of the Welsh electorate for more than seventy years. When it came to pass in 1914 the Church had set its house in order, and recovered a great deal of lost ground. The Welsh Church Act of that year dealt leniently with the endowments of the Church, and gave it very extensive powers of self-government. Capable and wise management has enabled it to augment its resources, which have been increased by the gifts and bequests of its members. The Welsh clergy to-day are better off than they were before 1914. They are far happier, and are not committed to support any one political party by the exigencies of Church defence. The secularization of tithes has removed the chief cause of hostility to the Church amongst those who belong to other religious bodies. The act of 1914 makes the Welsh Church co-extensive with Wales and Monmouthshire. Two new bishoprics have been created therein, that of Swansea and Brecon by dividing the unwieldy diocese of St. Davids, and that of Monmouth by dividing the densely-populated diocese of Llandaff. Bishops appointed after 1914 are not members of the House of Lords. "The Constitution of the Church in Wales" is a very voluminous document. It is framed within the limits prescribed by the act of 1914. It is very democratic in character and places the government of the Church in the hands of a series of representative assemblies. The governing body is the chief of these, and is, subject to the act of 1914, the constituent assembly and "council" of the Church. Its powers are set forth in clause 40, and clauses 31 and 34. It is composed of three orders, "namely—the Bishops, the Clergy, and the Laity." Each order votes separately.

The representative body looks after the property of the Church, and exercises "any power conferred upon it by the governing body." It is "composed of four classes, namely, the ex-officio, the elected, the co-opted, and the nominated members." The diocesan conference concerns itself with the business of the diocese, and has no right "to pass any resolution or to come to any decision upon any matter concerning discipline, faith, or ceremonial." The ruridecanal conference manages its own affairs, and may give advice to the diocesan conference. Lastly, the vestry meeting and a committee thereof called the "Parochial Church Council" control the affairs of the parish.

Elaborate machinery is provided by the constitution of the Church in Wales for the bestowal of patronage, the election of an archbishop and bishops.

Finally, the Church in Wales is provided with a series of tribunals "called respectively the Archdeacon's Court, the Diocesan Court, the Provincial Court, the Special Provincial Court, and the Supreme Court of the Church in Wales." Judges of His Majesty's High Court gave invaluable help in the framing of the constitution, and a number of expert financiers assisted in reorganizing and augmenting the finances of the Church.

Church, THE EARLY CELTIC. Two sharply-contrasted periods are to be distinguished in the early Church history of Celtic Britain. So long as the Romans ruled in South Britain, the Christianity which gradually permeated from Gaul into the island was weak, mainly confined to the Roman settlements, and affected very little the native population. The efforts made by Ninian, Palladius, and Patrick at the conversion of the Celts outside the province had very little result; but a most remarkable ecclesiastical revolution seems to have closely followed the withdrawal of the Roman legions. A wave of religious enthusiasm, excited perhaps by reaction from the Saxon conquerors, ran through the whole Celtic portion of the island. The first impulse came, as before, from Gaul. Gallic churchmen, like Germanus of Auxerre, rekindled the dying embers of Christianity in Britain, and led the orthodox alike against Pelagian heretic and Saxon or Pictish heathen. Monasticism, brought by St. Athanasius from the East, found in St. Martin of Tours its greatest Western exponent. From St. Martin's great abbey of Marmoutier the monastic current flowed through Brittany into Wales and Cornwall, and thence into Ireland, where it developed itself to its extreme limits, and to Scotland, to which the monastic movement first gave Christianity. But the Saxon conquest cut off all communication between the Celts of Western Britain and the continent. Separated from civilization by a wedge of heathenism, the Celtic Church gradually acquired a character of its own that marks it off sharply from the Churches of the continent. When, in the seventh century, the conversion of the English again renewed intercourse between the Celtic Christians and the Western world, the differences between the Celtic Churches and the Catholic Christians had become so great that intercommunion was regarded as impossible, and a struggle for mastery between the two Churches set in that terminated only with the defeat of the Celts. It was not that the Celtic Christians were in any formal sense heretics. The only points that could be alleged against them were their habit of celebrating Easter according to an erroneous cycle, which the better-instructed Romish Church had abandoned, their peculiar form of tonsure, a few unimportant liturgical differences, and, with a willingness to respect the Roman Church as the caput ecclesiarum, a steadfast refusal to yield it that canonical obedience which the popes had now begun to claim. But though the formal differences of the Celtic and Catholic Churches were thus few—though not on that account the less hotly contested—the difference of organization, system, and spirit between the two Churches was of the last importance. The child of the monastic revival, Celtic Christianity had become through and through monastic. Monasticism had in many places absorbed diocesan episcopacy. Great monasteries had grown up everywhere, which faithfully reproduced the tribal characteristics of the Celtic state, whose abbots, themselves often of royal houses, exercised a jurisdiction that left nothing to the bishops save the mere maintenance of the apostolical succession. In the chief abbeys of Ireland, and still more at Iona—the great foundation of Columba (q.v.), which was the source of the Christianity of Scotland and the seat of a jurisdiction practically episcopal over its dependent churches—the swarms of bishops were, despite their higher rank in the Church orders, subject to the jurisdiction of the abbot, who was generally a mere presbyter. As centres of education, of church worship, of spiritual life, of an extreme asceticism, and of all ecclesiastical jurisdiction, the monasteries enjoyed a far-reaching influence. Their intimate relation to the tribe enabled them to permeate the whole life of the nation with a real, if irregular, spiritual enthusiasm. The sixth and seventh centuries were the great period of the Welsh and Irish saints, of the earliest Welsh literature, of successful resistance to the English, to whose conquests a limit was at last set. Heathenism was driven out of Celtic Britain. Where Augustine and Paulinus failed, Aidan from Iona succeeded. At least half of the conversion of England is due to the Columban monks. On the continent Celtic missionaries carried their own usages and planted their own monasteries. Columbas founded Luxeuil, in the Vosges, St. Gall the great abbey called after him in Upper Swabia. In Gaul, Italy, and Germany a new wave of religious enthusiasm was excited by the strange missionaries from Britain. [ABBOT; MONASTICISM.]

But the monastic Church of Celtic Britain, though fertile in saints and missionaries, had a fatal weakness in its want of definite organization. Even in Wales, where the functions of abbot and bishop were generally conjoined—the founders of the great Welsh monasteries were also founders of the Welsh sees (St. Davids, for example)—the work of discipline and supervision which belonged to the bishop could be very imperfectly performed by a recluse who chose the remotest solitudes for his abode. Efficient in exciting religious emotion, the Celtic Church failed in its more regular and routine duties. The monks were better missionaries than parish priests. A society that aimed at abjuring the world could not thoroughly make its influence felt in the world. Shut up in an extreme corner of the universe, rigidly opposed to all external influences, its doom was sealed when the triumph of Wilfrid at Whitby and the alliance of Oswy of Northumbria and Theodore of Canterbury expelled the Celtic customs from Britain. [WHITBY, SYNOD OF.] Henceforth confined to the north and west of the island, the monastic Church lost, with its capacity for expansion, its powers of vitality. It was affected by two opposite influences from without and from within. The triumph of the Roman party in England gave the secular clergy a position side by side with the Celtic regulars. The ascetic impulse which had established the monasteries continued so far that monasticism itself was no sufficient expression of the severe spirit of renunciation that saw in the life of the solitary anchorite the highest expression of spiritual emotion. Even the tribal connexion which in the first flow of the movement had done so much service to the monasteries ultimately proved a snare. The secular aspect of the tribe began to assert itself, and an abbey whose head was an hereditary official soon became a monastery simply in name. As the abbey had earlier absorbed the tribe, so the tribe now absorbed the abbey.

Thus assailed from within and without, the monastic Church could offer no efficient opposition to the strong reaction in favour of communion with Western Christendom, even at the expense of a loss of the national usages. In 634 the Southern Irish, in 692 the Northern Irish, accepted the Roman Easter. On the death of Adamnan (q.v.) (704), an effort to introduce the Roman customs into Iona itself led to a schism in that monastery. In 717 the Columban monks were expelled from the kingdom of the Picts. In the middle of the eighth century the Welsh gave up the Celtic Easter. Formal schism was thus ended, but it was centuries before the monastic peculiarities of the Celtic churches entirely disappeared. The Danish invasions, the English overlordships, both had their effect, yet it was not until the days of Matilda, wife of Malcolm Canmore, that complete diocesan episcopacy and the rule of St. Benedict were imposed on the Scots, and the Culdees (q.v.) reduced to the position of canons regular. In the same way the Norman kings reorganized the Church of Ireland on a territorial, instead of a tribal, basis. Wales, where the Celtic Church had never developed so far, where diocesan episcopacy always continued in a way, gradually became subject to Canterbury, as well as to the English kings. The Norman Conquest imposed on the Welsh Church a foreign hierarchy which completed the process of union. Centuries earlier the Scottish monks on the continent had been compelled to accept the rule of St. Benedict.

The true history of the old Celtic Church has been obscured by a cloud of fable and legend which has seen in it a Protestant witness against the errors of Rome, and a Presbyterian polity worthy of Calvin, which has regarded its characteristics as survivals of the mystic rites of Druidism, and which has found the explanation of its Easter observance in the Quartodeciman practice of the Churches of Asia.

Church Rates, or rates levied (for the maintaining of the church and churchyard in good condition) from the parishioners and occupiers of land within a parish, were formerly voted and assessed by a majority of the parishioners assembled in a vestry meeting. Under the Parochial Church Councils Measure of 1921, however, the power to levy church rates is transferred to the newly-created parochial councils. The levy is of very ancient origin.

As early as 970, Archbishop Elfric ordained that tithes (q.v.) should be divided into three parts, one of which was to be set aside for the repairing of the church. This Church rate, at first voluntary, became gradually obligatory, and though up to 1817 the only method of enforcing payment was through the action of the ecclesiastical courts, it was in that year enacted that the payment might be enforced by the county justices. The objection of the Dissenters to pay these rates led to much litigation on the subject. Frequent bills were brought in for their abolition, and in 1858 a bill of Sir John Trelawney actually passed the House of Commons, but was rejected by the Lords. The opposition of the Dissenters at the vestry meetings was frequently so strong as to prevent the levying of any rate at all, and in 1859 Church rates are said to have been refused in no fewer than 1,525 parishes or districts. [BRAINTREE CASE.] The question was settled in 1868 by the Compulsory Church Rate Abolition Act, which made the rate for the future voluntary. But Church rates levied under local acts were not affected.

Churchill, ARABELLA (1648-1730), was the daughter of Sir Winston Churchill, and sister of the Duke of Marlborough. She became the mistress of the Duke of York (afterwards James II) and by him the mother of James Fitzjames (q.v.), Duke of Berwick, and three other children.

Churchill, ADMIRAL GEORGE (1654-1710), was a younger brother of the Duke of Marlborough. He saw service at the battle of Beachy Head; and in 1699, and again on the accession of Queen Anne, he was placed on the admiralty board. He had complete ascendancy over the head of the admiralty, Prince George of Denmark, the husband of the queen, and thwarted the counsels of Admiral Rooke. In 1707 he was vehemently attacked by the Whigs for his mismanagement. On the death of Prince George he was dismissed from office (1708).

W. Coxe, "Life of Marlborough, 1818.

Churchill, JOHN, 1ST DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH (1650-1722), was the eldest son of Sir Winston Churchill. He became a page of the Duke of York. In the year 1672 he fought under the Duke of Monmouth, and with the French against Holland. He greatly distinguished himself at the siege of Maestricht, and subsequently went through several campaigns under Turenne. In 1678 he married Sarah Jennings (q.v.), and shortly afterwards became a colonel in the Life Guards. On the accession of James II he was raised to the peerage. In 1685 his skill repaired the mistakes of the commander-in-chief, Lord Feversham, and crushed Monmouth's rebellion at Sedgemoor. He opened communications with William of Orange in 1687. On the arrival of William in England, Churchill deserted James at Westminster, leaving behind him a polite letter of regret. In the discussion on the disposal of the crown, Churchill voted for a regency; but, finding that his friends were in a minority, he absented himself from the House. On the accession of William and Mary, he was sworn of the privy council, made lord of the bed-chamber, and created Earl of Marlborough. In 1689, on the outbreak of war with France, he commanded the English brigade under the Prince of Waldeck, and defeated the French at Walcourt. On the departure of William for Ireland, he was appointed one of Queen Mary's Council of Nine. When William returned to England he landed in the south of Ireland, and in five weeks took Cork and Kinsale (1690). He began in this year to correspond with James. His professions of repentance were rewarded by a written pardon. On William's departure for the continent, Marlborough accompanied him. The Jacobites expected him to desert at the head of his troops. It appears that his plot was to work on the dislike entertained by the English towards the Dutch, in order to induce parliament to petition the king to discharge all foreign forces. He then hoped to get the English army to further his views. The Princess Anne was persuaded to write repentant letters to her father. But Marlborough was hated and mistrusted by the Jacobites, who thought that he would declare, not for James, but for the Princess Anne. They disclosed the scheme to Portland. William deprived Marlborough of all his offices (1692). As the real state of the case was unknown, his fate excited general sympathy. In this year he was sent to the Tower on account of false accusation given to the government against him by an informer, Robert Young; but was soon released. He passed into opposition, exciting the aristocracy against the Dutch; and vigorously supported the Place Bill. In 1694 he betrayed to the Jacobites an intended expedition against Brest commanded by Talmash. So thoroughly was he now mistrusted, that William refused to entrust the regency to Anne on his departure for the continent. The death of Mary (1694) was followed by a recrimination between William and Princess Anne. Marlborough's designs were now changed, and he was content to wait till the death of William for his own aggrandizement. He became governor to the Duke of Gloucester. In 1696 he was implicated in Sir John Fenwick's confession, but William ignored the accusation. He took a neutral part in the debates on the Resumption Bill, and declared against the reduction of the army. In 1701, when the War of the Spanish Succession was imminent, he was sent to Holland as commander-in-chief; and negotiations for the Grand Alliance were entrusted to him. William, on his death-bed, recommended him to Anne as the fittest general to carry on his projects. On the accession of Anne, he assumed a position quite unique. "He was at once general, diplomatist, and minister." He occupied the same position which William III had held as the leader of the European opposition to Louis XIV. His voice was for war, and it was chiefly by his influence that the wish of the Tory party, that England should merely act as an auxiliary, was overcome. War was declared in March 1702, and Marlborough was made commander-in-chief of the English and Dutch forces. A sketch of Marlborough's military operations is given elsewhere [SPANISH SUCCESSION, WAR OF]. On his return from his first campaign he became Marquis of Blandford and Duke of Marlborough. At home his design to rely on a mixed government had not been carried out, but an almost entirely Tory ministry was formed, of which his friend Godolphin was chief. But the dismissal of Rochester (1703) was followed by that of the extreme Tories in 1704, and a moderate section of that party were placed in office. After the campaign of 1705 Marlborough visited Vienna, Berlin, and Hanover, where he reconciled the differences between the British and Hanoverian courts. In 1706 he with difficulty persuaded his friend Heinsius, Pensionary of Holland, to reject the French terms of peace. In 1707 he visited the camp of Charles XII of Sweden, and dissuaded that monarch from joining the French alliance, whereby the cause of the allies would probably have been ruined. Meanwhile at home Marlborough's affairs were not progressing favourably. The nation was getting weary of the war, and the duke's Tory followers would not support his policy. He determined to complete his idea of a composite ministry by admitting a section of the Whigs to office. But the plan was doomed to failure. Harley, seeing the weakness of the coalition, began to intrigue against it, through the queen's new favourite, Mrs. Masham (q.v.), arousing in Anne a dread of the subversion of Church interests. The Whig party determined to make their power felt, and joined the High Tories in an attack on the duke's foreign policy. Marlborough and Godolphin were therefore obliged to dismiss Harley and his followers, and admit the Whigs to office (1708). Marlborough has been accused of wishing to continue the war from purely selfish motives. He was sent as plenipotentiary to The Hague, and seemed to have strongly but ineffectually urged upon his colleagues to accept the terms offered by the French in 1709. He made two desperate attempts to obtain a position independent of home politics. He demanded from the Archduke Charles the office of governor of the Low Countries, worth about £60,000 a year, and he demanded from Anne the post of captain-general for life. Both requests were refused. In England the violent temper of the duchess had alienated the goodwill of Queen Anne. On the fall of the Whigs (1710) Marlborough at once made overtures to the Tories. He seems to have done his best to further the negotiations of Gertruydenberg. But the fall of the duchess already foreshadowed his own. Harley secretly pushed on negotiations for peace. When the duke returned from the campaign of 1710 he entered into communication with his old friends the Whigs, who had joined a section of the Tories under Nottingham. Harley and St. John determined to ruin Marlborough. He was accused of having received large sums of money, amounting to £63,000, on the contracts for supplying the army with bread, and also of having received $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on all subsidies for foreign troops, amounting to £177,000. Marlborough's defence was that the bread money had been habitually received by every commander-in-chief and was employed as secret-service money; and that the percentage on the subsidies was a free gift from the allies. He was, however, deprived of all his offices on December 31. On the death of his friend Godolphin (1711), Marlborough returned to the continent, and resided first at Frankfort, then at Antwerp. He corresponded frequently with the Hanoverian court, for which he displayed great zeal, advising the Elector to go over to England with a body of troops. At the same time he continued the intrigues with the Jacobite court that he had begun before his fall. On the dismissal of Oxford [HARLEY], he resolved to return to England, perhaps at the instigation of that politician, perhaps hoping to play a part in the crisis that was at hand. He arrived in England on the day of Anne's death. Much to his disgust, he was omitted from the list of lords justices who were to act until the accession of George. Later on in the year he was reappointed commander-in-chief; but his power was gone, and he was distrusted by the king. We find him sending money to the Pretender just before the invasion of 1715. Next year an attack of paralysis greatly impaired his faculties. He lived in retirement and partial insanity at Blenheim until his death. He was a true child of the years of the Restoration, of their social training and lax morality, their restless activity in Church and State, in which each individual hoped to turn his natural gifts to account free from the trammels of any thought of consequences, and to attain everything which in the eyes of men seems desirable. His father's motto had been "faithful, but unfortunate." He, on the contrary, had the favour of fortune in all he undertook; he belonged to those men whose special property it is, men suppose, to be fortunate; but of his fidelity to his sovereign he himself could not have boasted. The organization of the British army after the Revolution was in the main his work. In conducting public affairs, Marlborough by no means lost sight of his own interests. His cupidity may have had in it an element of ambition that the family which he was to found might take an equal place with all that was wealthy and aristocratic in England; but over the brilliancy of his success and fame it cast a shade which made the contrast all the more painful.

Churchill, LORD RANDOLPH HENRY SPENCER (1849-95), third son of the 7th Duke of Marlborough, entered parliament in 1874 as Conservative member for Woodstock. After the Conservative defeat of 1880 he began, as leader of the Fourth Party, to distinguish himself in debate, acquiring fame also as an effective platform orator. In Lord Salisbury's first ministry (1885) he was secretary for India; in the second (July 1886) he became chancellor of the exchequer and leader of the House of Commons. On December 20, in the same year, he resigned, never to take office again.

Churchill, THE RIGHT HON. WINSTON LEONARD SPENCER (b. 1874), eldest son of Lord Randolph Churchill (q.v.), served in the Spanish War with Cuba, in the Malakand Field Force, and went as a war correspondent to South Africa during the Boer War (1899-1902). He was elected to parliament as a Conservative in 1900, but dissociated himself from Chamberlain's fiscal policy and joined the Liberals. He became under-secretary for the colonies in 1906, and president of the board of trade in 1908. In 1911 he was appointed first lord of the admiralty by Mr. Asquith, at the time of the Agadir crisis (q.v.). During the Great War he strongly advocated the Antwerp and Dardanelles expeditions, until the resignation of Lord Fisher in 1915 caused the downfall of the Liberal government. Churchill resigned in November, after a few months as chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. In 1917 he became minister of munitions, secretary for war, and air minister in turn. And he played a conspicuous part in the Irish settlement of 1921. In 1924 he again changed his party, standing first as an Independent and anti-Socialist, and in September as Conservative candidate for Epping. His second candidature being successful, he became chancellor of the exchequer in the second Baldwin administration.

Churchwardens are parish officers who are charged with the provision of what is necessary for the celebration of the sacrament and the services, of summoning vestries, and of superintending church matters generally. They are usually two in number, and are chosen by the parson and the parishioners jointly, or one by the minister and the other by the parishioners. In the great majority of cases, one is chosen by the minister and the other by the people. Their powers and status have been in some degree modified by recent legislation, and especially by the Parochial Church Councils Measure of 1921, which transferred to the newly-created parochial councils certain functions formerly exercised by the churchwardens.

Cinque Ports, THE, are a group of towns situated in Sussex and Kent, which still possess, in some degree, their old and peculiar jurisdiction. The original members of the group were Hastings, Romney, Hythe, Dover, and Sandwich, to which the "ancient towns" of Winchelsea and Rye were afterwards added. They still retain the privilege of holding two courts, viz., the Court of Brotherhood and the Court of Guestling; but these exercise now only a very small part of their former functions. The Cinque Ports owe their existence as a corporate body to the fact that in our early history there was no standing navy. Hence, whenever invasion was threatened or contemplated, it was necessary to rely mainly on the services of the seaboard towns. It was the Cinque Ports that contributed largely to the defeat of Eustace the Monk in 1217, and four years later we find the same body summoned before Hubert de Burgh for piracy against the men of Calais. In 1242 Henry issued orders to the officers of this corporation to prey upon French merchants and travellers—an order whose terms they enlarged upon, to the hurt of their fellow-countrymen. By this time, then, we may consider the Cinque Ports to be a recognized institution, with its own officers and warden, and in this capacity its members espoused the cause of de Montfort, and were summoned to send "barons" to the parliament of 1265. Local historians have claimed for these barons a position higher than that of the borough members, or even the knights of the shire. It is not, however, till the reign of Edward I that we have absolute proof that the Cinque Ports possessed a charter. But, on the other hand, the terms of Edward's charter speak definitely of certain rights possessed by this body in the time of Henry II, and more vaguely of others dating back through almost every previous reign to that of the Confessor. And we may consider Edward I's charter, though somewhat enlarged by later sovereigns, as a fair summary of the privileges of the Cinque Ports. By the terms of this charter the Cinque Ports were to have criminal and civil jurisdiction within their limits; exemption from all taxes, aids, and tallages; the right of assembling in their own parliament at Shepway, near Hythe, for the purpose of making by-laws; and several other privileges, including the right of regulating the Yarmouth fishery and fair. In return for these concessions, they were to furnish the king at call with fifty-seven ships for fifteen days each year, and there is at least one instance where they had to victual the ships supplied by another town (London). The officer in command of the ships furnished by the Cinque Ports was called the warden; and under Edward I the warden of the Cinque Ports acted as admiral of the fleet from Dover to Cornwall.

The Cinque Ports continued to be the main strength of our navy till the time of Henry VII. In the reign of this king we find signs that they had already fallen, or were falling, under the ordinary taxation of the kingdom, though they were still allowed to deduct £500 from their own share of any tenth or fifteenth levied on the counties of Sussex and Kent—a privilege which Elizabeth confirmed as a reward for their services against the Armada. The charters of the Cinque Ports were surrendered to the Crown in 1685, and most of their peculiar privileges and obligations were abolished by the Reform Act (1832), and Municipal Corporations Act (1835).

Cintra, THE CONVENTION OF (August 30, 1808), was an agreement made at the beginning of the Peninsular War between the French and British after the battle of Vimeiro. The conditions would have been much more favourable to the British had not the timid caution of Sir Harry Burrard and Sir Hew Dalrymple prevented Sir Arthur Wellesley from following up the advantage gained in the battle. An advance was cautiously begun towards Lisbon; and almost immediately an envoy was sent by Junot to treat. Terms were drawn up, subject to the approval of the British admiral, and this he would not give. Negotiations were accordingly begun afresh, while the British advanced still nearer to Lisbon. Junot on his side threatened to fire the public buildings of Lisbon; and the threat had the effect of hastening on the negotiations. Finally, the Convention of Cintra was signed at Lisbon, the terms being that the French troops should evacuate Portugal, and should be transported to France in British ships. After some trouble it was also decided that the Russian fleet in the Port of Tagus should pass into the hands of the British. Much indignation was felt in Great Britain on the news of the convention, although four months previously it would have been hailed with delight. Burrard, Dalrymple, and Wellesley were ordered home to take their trial, and Sir John Moore was appointed to the command in the Peninsula.

"Circumspecte Agatis" was the title of a writ (sometimes erroneously termed a statute) issued by Edward I in 1285, defining in relation to the bishop and clergy of Norwich the duties of the ecclesiastical courts, and fixing the boundaries between the temporal and spiritual jurisdictions, thus putting a stop to the gradual encroachment of the ecclesiastical courts in matters of which the cognizance belonged to the Crown. Like the ordinance of William I it reserves to the courts Christian all cases quæ mere sunt spiritualia. Breaches of morality, such as adultery and false swearing, are assigned to the Church courts, together with questions of tithes and mortuaries; and cases of defamation and of assault upon clergy.

Cirencester (Gloucestershire) is situated on the site of an important Roman military station, named Corinium or Durocornovium Dobunorum. It was captured by the Danes in 878. An Augustinian abbey of some importance was founded by Henry I, and a fine church built in the fifteenth century. During the Civil War the town was held by the Parliamentarians. It was captured and sacked by Prince Rupert in 1642, but surrendered again to the Roundheads under Essex in 1643.

K. J. Beecham, "History of Cirencester," 1887.

Cissa (d. 520 ?) was, according to the traditional account, the son of Ella (q.v.), whom he is said to have succeeded in 517. It has been thought that his name is preserved in that of Chichester (Cissaceaster) and possibly also in Cissbury Camp.

Cistercians, THE, were a religious order, an offshoot of the Benedictines, founded at Cîteaux in Burgundy by Robert, abbot of the Benedictine house of Molesme in 1098. The order owed much to its second abbot, Stephen Harding, an Englishman, who enjoined the strictest adherence to the austere Benedictine rule, from which the Benedictines themselves had long departed. It was under his inspiration that, at the chapter of the order in 1119, the Carta Caritatis was drawn up, establishing a form of government in which a large amount of independence was allowed to each abbey under the supervision of the general chapter of the order, and of the abbot of the parent house. Provision was made that when the numbers of any house became too large, twelve brethren might, with the consent of the general chapter, be sent out under an abbot to found a new monastery. St. Bernard, who thus became in 1115 abbot of the first daughter house—Clairvaux—did much to arouse enthusiasm for the new rule. The order became popular all over western Europe, and in no country more than in England. The first Cistercian colony was established by the Norman abbot of L'Aumône at Waverley in Surrey in 1128, and thence the movement spread throughout the country. The Cistercians settled by preference in places "remote from the conversation of men," and hence we find their houses especially numerous among the Welsh mountains and on the Yorkshire moors. An almost puritanical simplicity characterized their churches and buildings, the windows being filled with plain glass, and vestments and church ornaments being of the plainest kind. Each monastery was ideally a self-sufficing unit; and the manual labour in the convent workshops and in its fields and granges was performed by the "conversi" or lay brothers, who were a special feature of the order. Subsequently, by becoming wool-growers and wool-exporters on a large scale, the Cistercians came to exercise an important influence upon the economic life of mediæval England. Their white frocks and cowls gave them the distinctive name of "white monks," as opposed to the Benedictines or "black monks."

Ciudad Rodrigo, THE SIEGE OF, during the Peninsular War, January 1812, was the opening operation of Wellington's campaign of 1812. The fall of the works was hastened, in spite of many natural and artificial obstacles, on account of the approach of Marmont with a relieving force. On the 13th the Santa Cruz convent was taken; a well-organized sally, however, delayed the bombardment; but on the evening of the 14th it was begun, and in the confusion that arose the 40th Regiment seized the convent in the suburbs to the east of the town. The bombardment was kept up almost continuously, till on the 18th the great breach became a wide gap. On the 19th, soon after seven o'clock, the assault was begun: the fausse-braye was cleared by the stormers; but the French, driven back, held their ground behind the retrenchment, and wrought great havoc among the British. Meanwhile, the attack at the smaller breach had been made with reckless impetuosity, which carried the fausse-braye; and sweeping onward, led by Major Napier, the light division dashed into the narrow opening, and at the point of the bayonet broke down all resistance, until they had gained a foothold in the town. Then part of the light division, driving all before them, fell upon the flank of the defenders at the great breach, and by their overthrow made a way for the entrance of the storming party; while the rest of the light troops cleared the streets and houses in the town. The allies lost 553 men during the siege.

Civil List, THE, is a sum of money granted annually by parliament for the support of the royal household, and the personal expenses and bounty of the sovereign. It originated in the reign of William and Mary, and at first included the payment of civil offices, and pensions. Its amount was fixed at £700,000 (£400,000 being derived from the hereditary revenues of the Crown and £300,000 from the excise duties). This continued to be the nominal sum—although frequent debts were incurred—until the reign of George III, when it was increased to £800,000, being further raised in 1777 to £900,000. This sum, however, proved quite inadequate for the necessary expenditure, and debts on the Civil List had continually to be paid throughout the whole of the reign of George III. Hence it was found advisable to remove from the list many charges, such as salaries of state officers and the like. On the accession of William IV these extraneous charges were further reduced, and the king in return surrendered all the sources of revenue enjoyed by his predecessors apart from the Civil List, except the revenues of the duchy of Lancaster. The Civil List was fixed at £510,000, a sum which included a pension list of £75,000. The Civil List paid to Queen Victoria by 1 Vict. c. 2, amounted to £385,000, and the pension list was now separated from the ordinary Civil List. The Civil List paid to the king by 1 Edward VII, c. 4, amounted to £470,000; total, with annuities and pensions for members of the royal family, £576,000. George V was granted the same sum as his father, the additional annuities and pensions amounting to £146,000. The Civil List is now charged upon the consolidated fund; the old system of allocation having been abandoned on the accession of George III.

Claim of Right, THE. [RIGHT, CLAIM OF.]

Claimants of the Scottish Crown in 1291. On the death of the Maid of Norway (1290), the last of the descendants of Alexander III, a number of competitors for the Scottish crown appeared. Chief amongst them were John Baliol (lord of Barnard Castle in Durham and of Galloway in Scotland), Robert Bruce (lord of Skelton in Yorkshire and of Annandale in Scotland), and John de Hastings (lord of Abergavenny), the descendants of three sisters, daughters of David, Earl of Huntingdon. Baliol claimed as the grandson of the eldest sister, Bruce as the son of the second, and Hastings, as the son of the youngest daughter, claimed one-third of the kingdom, contending that it was divisible like other inheritances. This disputed succession Edward I determined to settle, and accordingly summoned a conference of Scots and English nobles to meet at Norham, May 1291. It was there determined to accept Edward's appointment as lord paramount, and to appoint commissioners to decide upon the merits of the claimants. Forty were named by Baliol, forty by Bruce, and twenty-four by the English king. In June 1292 these commissioners, after much deliberation, reported in favour of Baliol, saying that "By the laws and usages of both kingdoms, in every heritable succession the more remote in one degree lineally descended from the eldest sister, was preferable to the nearer in degree issuing from the second sister." Edward accordingly declared John Baliol king.

Besides these three chief, there were ten minor, competitors: Nicholas de Soules, the grandson of Marjory, natural daughter of Alexander II, whom he declared to have been legitimized; Florence, Count of Holland, great-grandson of Ada, daughter of Prince Henry (son of King David I) and sister of William the Lion; Robert de Pinkeny, great-grandson of Marjory, daughter of Prince Henry; William de Ros; Patrick, Earl of March, and William de Vesci and Roger de Mandeville, the descendants of illegitimate daughters of William the Lion; Patrick Galightly, son of an illegitimate son of William; John Comyn of Badenoch, who claimed as the descendant of King Donald Bane; and Eric, King of Norway, who claimed as the heir of his daughter, the Maid of Norway. None of these claims was of any validity, and they were not pushed to an open trial.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Claims, THE COURT OF, was established in 1662, in accordance with the first Act of Settlement to examine the case of all dispossessed Irish proprietors. It decided very largely in favour of the natives, and very soon such large grants were made to the Duke of York and others, that it became impossible to provide for any other claimants. Thus, after it had heard about 600 claims its labours came to an end, and the second Act of Settlement, 1665, became necessary.

Clanrickard, ULICK BURKE (DE BURGH), 5TH EARL AND MARQUIS OF (1604-57). [BURKE.]

Clare, GILBERT DE, EARL OF GLOUCESTER AND HERTFORD (b. 1243), son of Earl Richard, threw himself into the party of Leicester, after his father's death in 1262, but was soon involved in dissensions with de Montfort. Though fighting with Montfort at Lewes, he broke completely with him in the course of 1265 and fled to the Marches, where he joined Prince Edward after the latter's escape from Leicester's custody in May. At Evesham it was Gloucester's attack that decided the day in favour of the king's party. In 1267 Gloucester reverted temporarily to his old allegiance, and sieged London as the champion of the Disinherited; but a peace was soon concluded. He kept on good terms with Edward I, whose daughter Johanna he married in 1290. Gilbert de Clare was the most powerful English noble of his day, and the natural leader of the baronage after the death of de Montfort, for whom, however, he was no match in ability or singleness of purpose.

Clare, GILBERT DE, EARL OF GLOUCESTER AND HERTFORD (d. 1314), was the son of Earl Gilbert and Johanna, the daughter of Edward I. He took the side of Gaveston, his brother-in-law, against the barons, was one of the lords ordainers of 1311, being elected by co-optation from the royalist side, and endeavoured more than once to prevent civil war, in particular mediating between Edward II and Lancaster in 1313. He was slain at Bannockburn (1314). He was the last of his line, and his estates fell to his three sisters, whose husbands' rivalries take up a great place in the history of Edward II's reign.

Clare, JOHN FITZGIBBON (1749-1802), EARL OF. [FITZGIBBON.]

Clare, RICHARD DE, OR RICHARD FITZGILBERT, was a Norman baron, nearly related to William the Conqueror. He accompanied William to England, and received lavish grants of land, among which were the castle and manor of Clare, from which he took the name which his descendants likewise adopted. He was appointed joint regent of England during William's absence in 1073, and in 1075 was instrumental in quelling the rebellion of the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk. The date of his death is uncertain.

Clare, RICHARD DE, EARL OF GLOUCESTER AND HERTFORD (d. 1262), the leader of the baronial party under Henry III, acted at first in conjunction with, but afterwards in opposition to, Simon de Montfort. He was one of the baronial committee appointed under the Provisions of Oxford, 1258, but he quarrelled with de Montfort in 1259 and from 1259 to 1261 was in friendly attendance on the king. Henry's fortification of the Tower in the latter year led to a new rapprochement between Gloucester and de Montfort in face of the common danger; but Gloucester died next year at Ashenfield near Canterbury. Like the more aristocratic party of the baronage, he neither understood nor sympathized with Montfort's far-reaching aims, and never quite forgave his foreign origin.

Clare, RICHARD DE, EARL OF PEMBROKE AND STRIGUIL (d. 1176) (better known by his sobriquet of Strongbow), found himself, after the accession of Henry II, out of favour with the king, and with estates diminished by the incessant incursions of the Welsh. His misfortunes inclined him to accept the overtures made to him in 1168 by Dermot, the de-throned King of Leinster, who promised him in reward for his services the hand of his daughter Eva, and the ultimate succession to his kingdom. Nevertheless it was two years before Strongbow set out in person to fulfil his bargain. He applied to Henry for leave, and got a dubious answer, which became finally an absolute prohibition, but in spite of it he sailed at last from Milford Haven in the summer of 1170. At once he married Eva, and on the death of Dermot in May 1171 he succeeded to the kingdom of Leinster. He found himself, however, confronted by a rising of the Irish, under the ard-ri, Rory O'Connor. He defeated O'Connor at Dublin, but felt the necessity for strengthening himself by an understanding with Henry II. Henry landed at Waterford in October, and after receiving Strongbow's submission recognized him as Earl of Leinster. In 1172 he seems to have joined Henry in Normandy, and on his return the king granted him the custody of Ireland. A mutiny of the soldiery compelled him temporarily to supersede his friend Hervey Mount-Maurice by Raymond le Gros, but he refused the latter the hand of his sister. Being defeated by the O'Briens in 1174, however, he found it necessary to accept Raymond as a brother-in-law; and the voice of the soldiery again compelled him to make Raymond their commander. In 1176

Strongbow died at Dublin of an ulcer in the leg, and was buried in the cathedral. He left but one daughter, Isabel, who brought his vast lands to William Marshall of Pembroke, her husband. According to Giraldus he never originated an enterprise, but allowed himself to be guided by others; he, however, acknowledges him to have been just and even generous, and brave in battle. He was a munificent patron of the Church, and was the founder of the priory of Kilmainham.

Clare Election (July 1828) was the famous contest in which Daniel O'Connell was, after five days' polling, returned against Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald, a supporter of Catholic Emancipation, but a Protestant, who was seeking re-election on becoming president of the board of trade. O'Connell was the first Catholic returned to parliament since 1690. He owed his election to the forty-shilling freeholders; the £50 freeholders and the gentry without distinction of political opinion voting to a man for his opponent. When he was elected he refused to take the oaths; but after the Catholic Emancipation Bill he was re-elected (July 30, 1829) without opposition, and shortly afterwards took his seat in the House.

Clarence, GEORGE, DUKE OF (1449-1478), was the third son of Richard, Duke of York, and brother to King Edward IV. After the battle of Wakefield and the death of his father, he was sent to Utrecht for security, but returned to England in 1461, on the accession of Edward IV. He was made lieutenant of Ireland for seven years in 1462. Being greatly vexed at the king's marriage, he intrigued with the Earl of Warwick against him, and, in 1469, married Warwick's eldest daughter, Isabel, contrary to Edward's wishes, at Calais, whither he had retired with Warwick. In 1469 Edward fell a prisoner into their hands after the battle of Edgecote, and for a time Clarence and Warwick had everything their own way. But local feeling compelled them to release the king, and the defeat of the Lincolnshire rising which they had fomented changed the aspect of affairs, and Clarence and Warwick had once more to flee to Calais. Thence they invaded England towards the end of 1470, landed in Devonshire, and soon found themselves at the head of a large army. Edward was obliged to flee from the kingdom. Warwick with Clarence entered London, and recrowned Henry VI. But Clarence was playing a double game. When Edward IV landed at Ravenspur and marched southwards, Clarence was in correspondence with him, and when Edward advanced towards London, Clarence marched out and joined him, and fought against his old confederate at Barnet. But Clarence soon quarrelled again with his brother. He claimed the inheritance of Warwick as the husband of Isabel, and was unwilling to divide the earl's possessions with Richard of York, who married the second daughter, Anne. On the death of Isabel, Clarence was anxious to marry Mary of Burgundy, but the marriage was prevented by Edward IV. A violent quarrel ensued. A gentleman of Clarence's household was condemned for using necromancy against the king. Clarence espoused the cause of his followers with more energy than discretion, thus giving Edward a handle against him. He was arrested, and Edward himself impeached him in the parliament of January 1478. He was condemned to death, and was made away with secretly in the Tower. According to a well-known story, which is not supported by authentic evidence, he was drowned in a butt of malmsey wine.

Clarence, THOMAS, DUKE OF (1388?-1421), was the second son of Henry IV. In 1401 he was made lieutenant of Ireland, and in 1412 created Duke of Clarence. He played an important part in the French wars of Henry V's reign, and in 1421 he was defeated and slain at Beaugé by a combined force of French and Scots. He married Margaret, daughter of Thomas Holland, Earl of Kent, and widow of his uncle, John Beaufort, Earl of Somerset, but left no issue.

Clarendon, ASSIZE OF. [ASSIZE.]

Clarendon, THE CONSTITUTIONS OF (1164), received their name from the royal hunting-lodge of Clarendon, near Salisbury, where they were enacted. They were the outcome of the determination of Henry II to settle the relation between Church and State in matters of jurisdiction. The ecclesiastical courts which had been separated from the lay courts by William the Conqueror had gradually extended their jurisdiction, and their pretensions had been favoured by the anarchy of Stephen's reign. Now, however, that justice was once more fairly administered in the civil courts, it became an absolute necessity to assert the supremacy of the State over clergy and laity alike, the more so since the ecclesiastical courts had shown themselves unable to perform the work they had undertaken. Many other points connected with the relations between Church and State had to be settled, such as questions of advowson and excommunication, of election to bishoprics, and of ecclesiastical appeals, and on all these points the Constitutions are very firm in insisting on the rights of the Crown. "They are," says Stubbs, "no mere engine of tyranny or secular spite against a churchman: they are really a part of a great scheme of administrative reform, by which the debatable ground between the spiritual and temporal powers can be brought within the reach of common justice, and the lawlessness arising from professional jealousies abolished." The Constitutions were drawn up by a committee of bishops and barons, the justiciar, Richard de Lucy, having the chief hand in them. Their purport is as follows:

1. Any controversy concerning advowson or presentation to livings to be tried in the king's court.

2. Churches on the royal demesne not to be given away in perpetuity without the king's leave.

3. Clerks accused of any offence to be brought before the king's court, there to answer for such things as the court shall hold to be answerable in that place, and in the ecclesiastical court for such things as shall appear to be there answerable; the king's justice to send an officer to watch the proceedings in the Church courts; convicted clerks to receive no further protection from the Church.

4. No archbishop, bishop, etc., to leave the realm without the king's consent.

5. Excommunicated persons not to give excessive bail.

6. Laymen not to be accused, save by lawful witnesses, in presence of the bishop. If those who are arraigned are such that no one is willing or dares to accuse them, the sheriff shall, on demand of the bishop, cause twelve lawful men of the neighbourhood to swear before the bishop that they will declare the truth in that matter according to their conscience.

7. No tenant-in-chief to be excommunicated or to have his lands put under interdict without the king's leave.

8. Appeals to be from the archdeacon's court to the bishop, from the bishop to the archbishop, and no farther (that is, to Rome) without the king's leave.

9. Disputes between clerics and laymen, whether a fief is held by ecclesiastical or lay tenure, to be settled by the declaration of twelve lawful men, in the presence of the king's justice.

10. A man refusing to appear before an ecclesiastical court not to be excommunicated till an officer of the king has inquired into the matter.

11. Archbishops, bishops, etc., who hold of the king in chief, to have their possessions as baronies, and answer for the same to the king's justices and officers, and follow and observe all the royal rights and customs, and like other barons to participate in the judgments of the king's court, except in cases of life and limb.

12. The custody of vacant archbishoprics, bishoprics, abbeys, and priories of royal foundation to be in the king's hand, and he to receive all the revenues and proceeds. Canonical elections to take place under the king's writ in his chapel, with his assent, and the elect, before consecration, to do homage and fealty to the king, saving the rights of his order.

13. If any of the barons refuse justice to an ecclesiastic, the king to give him justice.

14. The chattels of those who are in forfeiture to the king not to be detained in a church or churchyard.

15. All pleas concerning debts to be tried in the king's court.

16. The sons of villeins not to be ordained without the consent of their lords.

It is important to notice that the mention of a jury in clause 6, and of the principle of recognition by twelve lawful men in clause 9, are the earliest instances of such mention in anything like statute law, though the practice of such recognitions prevailed long before this date. [BECKET.]

Clarendon, EARLS OF. [HYDE.]

Clarendon, SIR ROGER (d. 1402), was a reputed natural son of the Black Prince. He was a personal attendant of Richard II; and in 1402, on a rumour that Richard was still alive, attempted to raise a rebellion, but was seized and executed.

Clarendon Code, THE, is the name given to the four acts passed during Lord Clarendon's administration, directed against Nonconformists—viz., the Act of Uniformity, the Corporation Act, the Conventicle Act, and the Five-Mile Act. [The four are noted separately (q.v.).]

Clarkson, THOMAS (1760–1846), was born at Wisbech, and educated at St. Paul's School, and St. John's College, Cambridge. In 1785 he carried off the Latin Essay, the subject being, "Is it lawful to make men slaves against their will?" He was so thoroughly convinced by what he read on the subject of the horrors of the slave traffic, that he resolved to devote all his energies towards its abolition. Clarkson began with indefatigable zeal to prosecute inquiries at every port. The result of his researches he embodied in a pamphlet, entitled, "A Summary View of the Slave Trade." Most of the leading men among the Whigs encouraged the movement, and Pitt, in 1788, supported a bill for mitigating the horrors of the Middle Passage. Clarkson's next publication was an "Essay on the Impolicy of the African Slave Trade" (1788). When the French Revolution broke out, he went over to Paris to try to induce the national assembly to set an example to the world by introducing real equality for both white and black men. So unceasingly did he labour that in 1794 his health completely broke down, and he had to cease from all active work. He occupied his enforced leisure in writing a "History of the Abolition of the African Slave Trade" (1808, the year after the act of abolition had passed through parliament). In 1823 he was appointed one of the vice-presidents of the Anti-Slavery Society, which had just been formed. To Clarkson's exertions is the abolition of the slave trade in large measure due, since it was his researches which enabled Wilberforce to bring such convincing proofs of its horrors before parliament.

Classes, THE ACT OF (1649), passed by the Scots Estates, disqualified four "classes" of men from sitting in parliament or holding office for various periods. The classes consisted of the enemies of the Covenant, Maligants, those who had entered into the "Engagement" with Charles I, and persons of immoral life.

Claverhouse, JOHN GRAHAM OF (1649–89). [GRAHAM, JOHN.]

Clayton - Bulwer Treaty, THE (April 19, 1850), was negotiated between John M. Clayton (for the United States) and Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer (for Great Britain) as the result of mutual jealousy between the two countries over the question of connecting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans by a canal across Honduras. The treaty forbade either government to obtain an exclusive control of the canal or to found colonies in Honduras, Costa Rica, or any other part of Central America, and guaranteed the neutralization of the canal. Disputes arose later as to the precise interpretation of the treaty. It was finally superseded in 1902 by the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty.

Cleanse the Causeway (1520) was the name given to a street fight in Edinburgh, between the partisans of the Douglas family and the followers of the crown and the Hamiltons. The Douglasses overpowered their antagonists, and drove them from the streets; hence the name of the combat, in which the Earl of Angus, the head of the Douglasses, slew Sir Patrick Hamilton, brother of the Earl of Arran.

Clergy is the general name given to the body of men set apart in England for the performance of public worship. Christianity in England was at first monastic, and churches were chiefly served by monks. [CHURCH, THE EARLY CELTIC.] The clergy were maintained by the offerings of the people or by the lords. The ecclesiastical organization of Archbishop Theodore began from the top and was diocesan; but it spread downwards, and parishes were formed on the basis of townships. The Levitical ordinance of giving a tithe to God was first recommended, and in 787 was enacted by ecclesiastical councils which had the authority of witenagemots. At first this tithe went to the bishop, who distributed it into four parts: one for himself, one for the fabric of the church, one for the poor, and one for the incumbent. It was, however, frequently given by the lords of lands to monasteries, and so the system of appropriation began. The appropriators were bishops, monasteries, or spiritual corporations who received the tithe, and paid only a portion which they deemed sufficient to the vicar or curate who discharged the spiritual duties of the parish. Where the parson received the endowments of his office he was styled rector. This system of appropriation led to the growth and wealth of monastic orders, and to an inadequate provision for the parochial clergy. Its prevalence in England rendered easy the transference to Henry VIII of ecclesiastical revenues which were held by appropriators in this anomalous way. In early times the clergy were the civilizers and educators of England. Their system, their councils, and their learning made them powerful in influencing the growth of the organization of the state. After the Norman Conquest their status became more definite, as everything else became more definite likewise. The growth of the canon law into a regular system, and the establishment of ecclesiastical courts, gradually led to clerical exemptions from ordinary jurisdiction, which produced disorders. Henry II strove to remedy this by the Constitutions of Clarendon; but criminous clerks were still handed over to ecclesiastical tribunals if they claimed Benefit of Clergy (q.v.), a privilege which was not entirely abolished till 1830.

The tenure of Church property was regulated by the concordat between Henry I and Anselm, which established the obligation of homage on all temporalities. This led to the taxation of Church lands on the same footing as lands held by other barons. The taxation of the spiritual revenue of the clergy was attempted by John, but was withstood. The claim of the pope to tax the clergy for a crusade gradually helped the king to break down clerical immunities on this head. The Crown demanded grants from the spirituality, who considered these demands in convocation. In this way the clerical assembly took part in secular business, and the clergy became more definitely organized into an estate of the realm. They were recognized as such by Edward I in his parliament of 1295, to which he summoned the proctors of chapters and of the parochial clergy by means of the famous Præmunientes clause inserted in the writs of summons to the archbishop and bishops. But the clergy preferred to tax themselves in convocation, and therefore did not form a clerical estate. Probably they considered that they were sufficiently represented by the lords spiritual. [CONVOCAATION.]

The clergy in the Middle Ages were a wealthy body. Their share of indirect taxation was nearly a third of the whole amount. Their landed estates were spread over England, and their revenues from tithes and offerings were still greater. The monastic orders especially were good farmers, and did much to bring the soil of England under cultivation. The clergy were mild landlords, and stimulated the national industry. The numbers of the clergy were very large, and they were taken from every class of society. Even villeins sought ordination as a means of obtaining freedom. But the wealth of the Church was unequally divided. The bishops were generally engaged in the business of the state, and their example was followed by a large number of the lower clergy. A statute of 4 Edward III gave legal basis to the traditional custom by which the chancellor exercised the right of presentation to all livings of twenty marks and under which were rated in the king's books; and this statute limited the chancellor's choice to clerks of the Chancery, of the Exchequer, and of both benches. As a result of this income and of the appropriations by monastic houses, together with the dispensations granted by Rome to allow clergy to hold several incompatible benefices, the majority of the parishes were served by unbeneficed clergy and absenteeism was a widespread abuse. Parishes were not well served, in spite of the number of clergy. Very many of them were chaplains, or were endowed by private persons to say masses for their dead. Abuses grew up in proportion as the mechanism of the English Church was broken down by papal interference, and appeals to Rome rendered futile the authority of the bishops. Until the beginning of the thirteenth century the clerical order was amongst the most resolute supporters of natural liberties against the Crown. The growth of clerical corruption gave weight to the attacks of the Lollards upon the clergy, and the clergy, finding themselves threatened, made close alliance with the Crown. Yet the clergy, though ready to unite in defence of their own privileges, never made a compact political power. They were divided amongst themselves. The regular clergy opposed the seculars, the monks disliked the friars, Dominicans were set against Franciscans. In current politics the clergy were as much divided as the nation. They represented the education of the country, and their influence was spread into every class. Their moral influence was not so good. The excessive number of clergy, their wealth and idleness, rendered them on the whole frivolous. The obligation of celibacy was frequently evaded by concubinage, for which in some cases licences were purchased from bishops.

After the Reformation the wealth of the Church and the numbers of the clergy were greatly diminished. The connexion with the papacy ceased, and the clergy became closely united with the Crown. Ecclesiastical courts were not, however, abolished; and under Elizabeth a new court, the Court of High Commission, was created for the purpose of exercising the powers of the royal supremacy. Elizabeth used the bishops as State officials for the purpose of reducing to uniformity the body of the clergy. In large measure the internal administration of the Church remained unchanged. An attempt was made to restrict the holding of benefices in plurality, but, although some restraints were imposed, the attempt was not very successful. Nor was any effort made to restrict the number of persons taking orders. From the middle of the thirteenth century to the middle of the nineteenth, comparatively little change was made in the internal organization of the Church. Hence the social gulf between the higher and lower clergy was great. The clergy were allowed to marry, but were ill-provided for, and no longer had an intellectual superiority over the laity. In the struggle against popery on one side and Puritanism on the other, the clergy became more and more firm adherents of the royal prerogative. The State, in its desire for internal unity, recognized no other religious system save that of the Church of England, and refused to extend its limits. At the same time the Court of High Commission was used to sanction oppressive proceedings on the part of the Crown. The Great Rebellion destroyed monarchy and Church alike, and at the Restoration the clergy returned as staunch Tories. Even the avowed intention of James II to re-establish Romanism did not, in the eyes of some of the clergy, justify the Revolution. Nearly four hundred followed Archbishop Sancroft in resigning their benefices rather than take the oath of allegiance to William III.

The clergy of the seventeenth century and the early part of the eighteenth as a body were poor, and very many of the incumbents laboured with their own hands. Ecclesiastical incomes were still very unequally divided, and there was a great difference between the wealthy and learned clergy and the ordinary incumbents, who were on the same level as their people. The first attempt to raise the position of the poorer clergy was made by Queen Anne, who resigned the claims of the Crown on annates and first-fruits, dues levied by the pope on benefices which had passed into the hands of the Crown. Out of these dues was formed a fund, known as "Queen Anne's Bounty" (q.v.), for the augmentation of small livings. From this time the average position of the clergy has slowly increased. In 1836 a body called Ecclesiastical Commissioners was established for the improved management and distribution of the revenues of the Church. The number of clergy attached to cathedrals was reduced, and the surplus revenues were applied to the increase of small benefices. In the same year the Tithes Commutation Act converted tithes into a rent-charge upon the land; and so ended the numerous disputes between the clergy and their parishioners which the system of tithes encouraged.

From the reign of Anne the clergy ceased to have any direct political importance. In 1717 the sittings of convocation were practically suspended. Since Anne's reign no bishop has held any office of state. During the eighteenth century the clergy were not zealous in the discharge of their duties till a new stimulus was given to religious zeal by the Wesleyan movement. The clergy were content to rest on their position as officers of a Church "by law established," and there were many scandals in reference to simoniacal appointments. The Tractarian movement of 1833 did much to deliver the Church from Erastianism, and to develop the zeal of the clergy. In 1838 the Pluralities Act did away with many of the abuses caused by the non-residence of wealthy clergymen at the benefices whose revenues they received.

Politically the clergy have been gradually deprived of exclusive privileges, and the State has removed all the disabilities which it had formerly placed on those who were not members of the Established Church. The clergy are now subject to the same jurisdiction as laymen in all civil matters. As regards their orthodoxy, their morals, and the conduct of their ministrations, they are subject to the jurisdiction of their bishops and to the law of the Church. The procedure of the Bishops' Court is regulated by the Church Discipline Act, 1840. Appeals from this court were formerly made to a Court of Delegates appointed by the king; but in 1832 this was transferred to the king in council.

Admission into the clerical body is given by episcopal ordination. Candidates must have reached the age of twenty-three, must prove themselves fit in character, education, and orthodoxy, and must show that they have a definite sphere within which they can exercise their clerical functions. By canon law, ordination conferred an indelible character on the recipient, and a clergyman could not relinquish the priesthood. The Clerical Disabilities Act (1870) provides that a clergyman may execute a deed of relinquishment, which is to be recorded by his bishop in the diocesan registry. After this registration, the priest or deacon is incapable of officiating as such, and loses all his rights as a clergyman.

To enable the clergy to discharge their duties more efficiently, the State exempts them from certain civil responsibilities. They cannot be compelled to serve on a jury or to hold any temporal office. Ecclesiastical revenues cannot be seized in payment of debts, but are subject to sequestration, i.e., the churchwardens pay the sum due out of the profits of the benefice, after making provision for the performance of the services of the church. On the other hand, the clergy labour under certain disabilities owing to their spiritual avocations. They are prohibited from trading, and may not sue for debts due from commercial transactions. In 1800 they were declared incapable of being elected members of the House of Commons.

[In the twentieth century the passing of the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act in December 1919, and the measures of reform passed by parliament after consideration by the national assembly, have effected considerable alterations in the position of the clergy. Acts have been passed requiring all parochial clergy to make compulsory contributions to a pension scheme, and providing a more expeditious means of removing from their benefices priests who habitually neglect the duties of their office. A measure for the reform of ecclesiastical courts is also engaging the attention of the national assembly. The position of the clergy may not improbably undergo several changes in consequence of the reforms of the assembly. It is worthy of note, in conclusion, that during the Great War of 1914-18 the clergy were exempted from all liability to military service.]

"Clericis Laicos" are the opening words of the famous bull issued by Pope Boniface VIII (February 24, 1293) absolutely forbidding the king to take, or the clergy to pay, taxes on their ecclesiastical revenues. The result of this was that, in 1297, Archbishop Winchelsey refused to agree to a money grant, whereupon Edward I put the clergy out of his protection and confiscated the estates of the see of Canterbury. Upon this, many of the clergy gave in; but the archbishop still held out, till eventually a compromise was made, whereby Winchelsey promised that, if the king would confirm the charters, he would do his best to obtain money from the clergy, the pope having already declared in the bull Romana Mater that his prohibition did not affect voluntary grants for purposes of national defence. [CONFIRMATIO CARTARUM.] In July 1297 Boniface completely abandoned the doctrine of Clericis Laicos in the bull Etsi de statu.

Cleveland, BARBARA VILLIERS, DUCHESS OF (1641-1709). [VILLIERS.]

Clifford, GEORGE, 3RD EARL OF CUMBERLAND (1558-1605), early displayed a taste for naval adventure. In 1586 he inflicted considerable damage on Portuguese commerce, and two years later commanded a ship in the attack on the Spanish Armada off Calais. He subsequently engaged in several marauding expeditions against the Spaniards in 1591, 1593, and 1595, and in 1598 took Porto Rico. The earl, besides being renowned for his dashing exploits by sea, was an accomplished courtier and a great favourite of the queen, by whom he was made a knight of the Garter, though his character was not altogether free from stain. "Before his death he had squandered his fortune; nor, high as he may rank as a man of talent, science, enterprise, and chivalry, is his memory as a husband free from the charge of cruelty."

Biography by E. C. Williamson, 1920.

Clifford, HENRY, 1ST EARL OF CUMBERLAND (1493-1542), was famous as one of the three northern nobles who remained loyal to the king's cause during the formidable insurrection of 1536, known as the "Pilgrimage of Grace" (q.v.). His successful defence of Skipton Castle against the vigorous attack of the rebels was an important check to their otherwise triumphant progress through the districts north of the Humber, and considerably advanced him in the confidence and favour of the king. He was created Earl of Cumberland in 1525.

Clifford, JOHN, 13TH BARON CLIFFORD, and 9TH BARON OF WESTMORLAND (d. 1461), was the son of Thomas, Lord Clifford, who fell in the first battle of St. Albans. He was a strong Lancastrian, and took part in the battle of Wakefield, after which, in revenge for his father's death, he killed in cold blood the young Earl of Rutland, son of the Duke of York. In 1461 he was defeated and slain at Ferrybridge.

R. B. Mowat, "Wars of the Roses," 1914.

Clifford, ROSAMUND (d. 1175?), commonly called the FAIR ROSAMUND, was the daughter of Walter de Clifford, and mistress of Henry II. There is no foundation for the late story that she was the mother of Henry's two illegitimate sons, William Longsword, Earl of Salisbury, and Geoffrey, Archbishop of York. The story that Rosamund was poisoned by Queen Eleanor is also without authority. Nothing is known of her death. She was buried at Godstow nunnery, but in 1191 Hugh, Bishop of Lincoln, ordered her body to be removed to the chapter-house, where it remained till the Reformation.

Clifford, THOMAS, 1ST LORD CLIFFORD OF CHUDLEIGH (1630-73), descended from an old Catholic family, highly distinguished himself by his bravery in the Dutch War of 1665, and in 1666 was made a privy councillor. He joined the Cabal ministry (q.v.) in 1667, and took a prominent part in the Treaty of Dover, and in advocating the war with Holland. In 1672 he was made lord high treasurer and a baron. In 1673 the passing of the Test Act compelled him, as a Catholic, to resign his office; and shortly afterwards he died. Clifford was one of the most zealous Catholics at court, and a strong advocate of tolerance of all religious opinions.

Clinton, EDWARD FIENNES DE, 9TH LORD CLINTON AND SAYE (1512-85), an able commander and astute diplomatist, was, in 1550, appointed lord high admiral of England, having in the previous year held the post of governor of Boulogne. On the accession of Elizabeth, he was confirmed in his office of lord high admiral, though he had just before shown some want of energy whilst commanding the fleet in the expedition against Brest, 1558. He subsequently became a trusted adviser of Elizabeth, and in 1569 did much to suppress the rising in the north. In 1572 he was created Earl of Lincoln, and in the same year sent to Paris to ratify the treaty with France. His policy was strongly anti-Spanish.

Clinton, Sir Henry (1738-95), was a grandson of the 6th Earl of Lincoln. On the prospect of a rupture with the American colonies, he was sent out with Howe and Burgoyne in command of reinforcements. He distinguished himself at Bunker Hill, and was soon afterwards dispatched to Charleston. He was appointed commandant of Long Island. He did not, however, hold it long, as he was compelled to capitulate to Gates. In January 1778 he was appointed commander-in-chief in America, and was fairly successful in this position. In 1780 he made an expedition to South Carolina and captured Charleston, and at one time had almost won back the Carolinas and Georgia. This campaign was stained by his tampering with General Arnold to induce him to deliver up West Point—a transaction which cost Major André's life. He failed also to succour Cornwallis. Circumstances which would have tried a much greater general than he were opposed to him, and he was superseded. On his return to England, a pamphlet war of mutual recriminations ensued between the two generals. He was afterwards governor of Limerick, and in 1794 was transferred to Gibraltar, in command of which post he died in December 1795.

Clinton, Sir Henry, G.C.B. (1771-1829), entered the army in 1787, and first saw active service, as aide-de-camp to the Duke of York, in the campaigns of 1793-4 in the Netherlands. On his return to England in 1795 he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 66th, and proceeded to the West Indies to join his regiment. On his return from there he served under Lord Cornwallis in Ireland, as aide-de-camp, and was present at the surrender of the French at Ballinamuck. In April 1799 he was attached to Lord William Bentinck on a mission to the Austro-Russian army in northern Italy, and was present at the battles of Trebia and Novi, and the siege of Alessandria. He afterwards joined Suwaroff in Switzerland. On his return to England he was appointed adjutant-general in India till 1805, where he served under Lake at the battle of Laswari. In 1806 he commanded the Guards in Sicily, and held Syracuse from December 1806 to the following November. He was then appointed to the command of a brigade in Sir John Moore's expedition to Sweden, and on his return became adjutant-general to the army in Portugal, in which capacity he was present at the battle of Vimeiro. He accompanied Moore through the Spanish campaign and the retreat to Corunna. His next employment was in Ireland, where he remained two years, until he found a more congenial sphere in the command of a division under Wellington. He rendered conspicuous service at Salamanca, was left in command on the Douro when Wellington advanced to Madrid, and was present at the siege of Burgos. For his services he received the thanks of parliament. His last public services were rendered to the country at Waterloo, where he commanded a division of infantry.

Sir C. Oman, "Peninsular War," 1902-20.

Clive, Robert, Lord (1725-74), was the son of an obscure country gentleman of good lineage but small fortune. He was sent to India in the capacity of a writer in 1743, and was present at the surrender of Madras to La Bourdonnais in 1746. The counting-house was little adapted to his genius, however, and he soon exchanged the pen for the sword. Having obtained an ensign's commission, he distinguished himself in the operation before Devikota, where he attracted the admiration of Major Lawrence (1749). He was also present at the disastrous siege of Pondicherry, under Admiral Boscawen. By this time the success of the confederation which Dupleix had aroused against the British had rendered the French masters of all south India. Clive successfully persuaded Saunders, governor of Madras, to allow him to undertake the celebrated expedition to Arcot, which, by dividing the forces of the enemy, saved the British garrison cooped up in Trichinopoly. Clive's defence of Arcot laid the foundation of the British Empire in India. After fifty days the troops of Chanda Sahib raised the siege. A series of successes, culminating at Trichinopoly, led to the surrender of the French general d'Auteuil to Chanda Sahib, and this in its turn brought about the recall and disgrace of Dupleix. After the capture of Covelong and Chingleput—two strong places in the Carnatic—Clive returned to England, in 1753, with his health greatly impaired. He was received with great distinction by the company and by the ministers, and on his return to India was appointed governor of Fort St. David. In 1756 Clive was entrusted with the task of revenging the tragedy of the Black Hole of Calcutta (q.v.) on Suraj-ud-Dowlah. With Admiral Watson in command of the fleet, he soon recovered Calcutta, and forced the nawab to treat for peace. But no sooner had Clive been called away than Suraj-ud-Dowlah began to intrigue with the French. It was evident that the British power was in serious danger unless a prompt blow were struck; and Clive, after entering into negotiations with the nawab's discontented subjects, utterly defeated the native army at Plassey (June 23, 1757). Mir Jafar was appointed to the government of Bengal; but his fellow-traitor, Omichund, whose services had been secured by a forged promise of £300,000, received nothing. From the new nawab Clive obtained for the company a concession of the land 600 yards around the Mah-ratta Ditch, and the zemindary rights of the country lying to the south of Calcutta. The victory of Plassey was followed by the assassination of Suraj-ud-Dowlah; the reconstitution of the government of Calcutta, with Clive at its head; the rout of the invading army of Alamgir, the heir of the Mogul Empire (1759); and the return of Clive to England in 1760. On his arrival he was received with great distinction by all ranks, and honoured with an Irish peerage. In 1765 he went once more to India, as governor of Bengal, pledged to reform the luxury and corruption of the civil servants of the company—who had made large fortunes by the cruellest extortion—and to settle the disturbed affairs of Bengal. He put an end to these practices by enforcing the laws prohibiting the acceptance of presents from the natives; while, at the same time, he raised the pay of the civil service by appropriating to this purpose the proceeds of the salt monopoly. The Nawab of Murshidabad [MIR KASIM] was pensioned off, the dewan of Bengal, Bihar, and Orissa was obtained for the company by imperial firman, and a mutiny in the army was successfully quelled. In 1766 Clive finally returned to England, with his health shattered by severe attacks of disease, when his enemies in the India House tried to impeach him for corrupt practices; but the House of Commons passed a resolution that "Robert Lord Clive had rendered great and meritorious services to his country." Broken, however, by the pressure of bodily and mental suffering, he put an end to his existence in November 1774. [INDIA, ADMINISTRATION OF.]

Clontarf (CLUANTARBH), THE BATTLE OF, was fought on Good Friday, April 23, 1014. Brian Boru (q.v.) and his son, at the head of the Irish of Munster, Connaught, Meath, and Ulster, were opposed to the Ostmen (q.v.) of Ireland, reinforced by their countrymen from the Baltic and the Orkneys, and supported by the Leinster Irish. The result was a victory for Brian; but both he and his son fell in the fight. The Danes never became formidable to the native Irish after this defeat.

Clontarf, MEETING AT. A monster meeting in support of the repeal of the Union was to be held on this historic spot on October 8, 1843. The government issued a proclamation for its prevention, and military precautions were taken. O'Connell (q.v.) and the priests exerted themselves to keep the people from assembling, and succeeded, in spite of the short notice given. But it thus became evident that O'Connell would not fight. The repeal movement therefore collapsed.

"Annual Register," 1843; Sir T. Erskine May, "Constitutional History," ed. F. Holland, 1912.

Close Rolls, THE, are certain records of the Crown containing letters, mandates, etc., of a private nature. They begin in 1204, and treat of an infinite variety of subjects. They are of very great importance in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries as containing materials for local and family histories, and also as shedding light on many obscure parts of our national annals. The Close Rolls of John and the first eleven years of Henry III have been printed by the Record Commission under the editorship of Sir T. Hardy.

Closter-Seven, THE CONVENTION OF (1577). [KLOSTER-ZEVEN.]

Cloth of Gold, FIELD OF THE, is the name given to the meeting between Henry VIII and Francis I of France at Guines in June 1520. It has been so designated from the lavish splendour with which it was prepared. The meeting was preceded in May, and followed in July, by conferences between Henry VIII and the Emperor Charles V at Sandwich and Gravelines.

Clovesho was the place appointed at the Council of Hertford (673) for the annual assembling of the whole Church. These projected annual assemblies were not held, but two notable synods were held at Clovesho in the eighth century. There have been numerous conjectures as to its situation. It may perhaps be identified with Cliffe-at-Hoo, in Kent, though some have claimed for it a position nearer London.

Club, THE, was a name given to the parliamentary majority of the Scots parliament, 1689, which used to meet in a tavern in Edinburgh to concert measures against the government. The Club, which was composed of various elements, including Tories, discontented Whigs, and men of other political creeds, soon attained considerable power, and proved an immense hindrance to the government. In 1690 its chief members, Annandale, Ross, and Montgomery, began to intrigue with the Jacobites, but Annandale divulged the plans and the "Montgomery Plot" was abandoned.

Clyde, SIR COLIN CAMPBELL, BARON (1792-1863). [CAMPBELL.]

Cnut. [CANUTE.]

Cobbett, WILLIAM (1762-1835), the son of a Surrey farmer, was born at Farnham. After spending some years as a solicitor's clerk and a private in the army, he went to America in 1792, and opened a bookseller's shop in Philadelphia. Here he issued a series of pamphlets over the signature of "Peter Porcupine." In 1801 he returned to England and set up a morning paper, in which he warmly supported Pitt. This failed, and he started the Weekly Political Register in January 1802. At first he was patronized by the ministry, but in 1805 he became an eager Radical, and a formidable opponent to the ministry. In 1810 he was prosecuted for some remarks on military flogging, and imprisoned for two years; but he continued to write. It was at this time that he issued Twopenny Trash, a series of papers wherewith he harassed the administration. In 1817 he again settled in America; but returned in 1819 and took an active part in the trial of Queen Caroline. He also unsuccessfully contested Coventry and Preston. Renewing his attention to agriculture, he took a farm, and attempted to introduce Indian corn as a staple article of English produce, but the project proved a failure. About this time he undertook his famous series of political tours, which were published under the title of "Rural Rides" (1830). In 1831 he was prosecuted for publishing a libel with intent to rouse discontent in the minds of the labourers. In defending himself he made a defiant speech, declaring that "the Tories had ruled the country with rods, but the Whigs scourged it with scorpions." The jury disagreed and he was discharged. In 1832 he was returned to the reformed parliament for Oldham. The exertion of speaking on the Marquis of Chandos's motion on agricultural distress on May 25, 1835, and remaining late to vote were too much for him. He went down to his farm early next morning, and died three weeks afterwards. He was a most prolific and popular writer, and the vigour of his style and his extraordinary mastery of the resources of the language have been deservedly praised. Among his works are the "Parliamentary History of England from the Norman Conquest in 1066 to the year 1803," a well-known and useful compilation; the "Political Register"; "Cottage Economy," 1823; and a translation of Marten's "Law of Nations," 1795.

The biographies of Cobbett include those by E. I. Carlyle, 1904; G. K. Chesterton, 1925; G. D. H. Cole, 1924.

Cobden, RICHARD (1804-65), was born at Midhurst, in Sussex, and became early in life a traveller for a cotton firm, settling in Lancashire. In 1828 he started a business in partnership with some of his relatives. He was highly successful in his new sphere of work, and travelled abroad in Greece, Turkey, and the United States in the interest of the house to which he belonged (1835-7). On his return from America he addressed several letters on economic and political subjects to the Manchester Examiner, strongly advocating the theories he championed in later years—peace, retrenchment, non-intervention, and free trade. Meanwhile the Anti-Corn Law League had been established in Manchester (1838), and when Cobden and John Bright (q.v.) joined its ranks they roused its energies to the full. At the election of 1841, when Lord Melbourne appealed to the country in favour of a fixed duty on corn, Cobden was returned for Stockport. He now had every opportunity of advocating his views; and at last Sir Robert Peel declared himself in favour of the suspension of the Corn Laws (1845) and repealed them in the following year, paying a just tribute to Cobden's efforts. While absent on the continent Cobden was returned for the West Riding of Yorkshire in 1847. He had previously declined to join Lord Russell's minority, but he offered a strong opposition to the Derby government of 1852, and roundly denounced the policy of the Aberdeen coalition in entering the Crimean War (1854). Though he succeeded in carrying a vote condemning Sir John Bowring's proceedings in China, however, his course was so distasteful to his constituents that he did not offer himself again for the West Riding and remained out of parliament until 1859, when he was elected in his absence for Rochdale. In 1860 he negotiated the Cobden Treaty (q.v.) with France, but still refused to accept office. To the end he continued an ardent advocate of free trade and non-intervention, and was one of the few British politicians who supported the North in the early stages of the American Civil War of 1861-5. His principles of free trade and non-intervention sprang from a common root—his earnest desire to destroy tariff barriers and other obstacles to internationalism and peace. He detested what he called the "filthy idol" of balance of power, and urged governments to "keep their hands off and allow the mutual interests of free commercial intercourse to weave bonds of union between peoples," and to make an end of the prevailing system of diplomacy "poisoned by obsolete traditions of suspicion and hostility." He died on April 2, 1865.

Cobden Treaty, THE (January 23, 1860), was a commercial treaty concluded between Great Britain and France, Richard Cobden (q.v.) being the British plenipotentiary. It is remarkable for having been negotiated by Cobden not by the set methods of diplomacy, but in an informal conversation with the Emperor Napoleon III. It met with considerable opposition from the Conservative party in England, and from the protectionist followers of Thiers in France. The terms were a limitation of the French duties on British manufactured goods to 30 per cent., the abolition of the British duty on French manufactured goods (and French silk), and a reduction of the duty on French wines to three shillings per gallon.

Cobham, ELEANOR, was first the mistress and then the wife of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, to whom she was married some time before 1431. She was the daughter of Reginald, Lord Cobham. In 1441 she was arraigned on a charge of treason and witchcraft, and it appeared that her accomplices had by her orders constructed a waxen image of King Henry VI, which they gradually melted before a fire, it being expected that the king's life would waste away as the image was acted upon by the heat. In the event of Henry's death, the Duke of Gloucester, as the nearest heir of the house of Lancaster, would have succeeded to the throne. For these crimes Eleanor Cobham was compelled to do public penance in the streets of London, and was imprisoned for life.

Cobham, BARONS. [BROOKE, HENRY; BROOKE, WILLIAM.]

Cobham, LORD (d. 1417). [OLDCASTLE.]

Cochrane, ROBERT, said by his enemies to have been a stonemason, but more probably an architect, was the favourite and principal adviser of James III of Scotland, whom he is said to have instigated to murder his brother, the Earl of Mar. On Mar's death, Cochrane obtained a grant of his estates, a circumstance which roused the Scots nobles to fury. No audience could be obtained with the king except through his favourite, and the debasement of the coinage which he advised irritated the whole nation. He was hanged, together with some other favourites of the king, at the bridge of Lauder, by Archibald Douglas (q.v.), Earl of Angus ("Bell-the-Cat"), in 1482.

Cochrane, THOMAS, 10TH EARL OF DUNDONALD (1775-1860), after brilliant service against the French as commander of the Speedy and of the Pallas, entered parliament as member for Honiton (1806). In 1807, with Sir Francis Burdett, he was elected for Westminster, and so excited the enmity of the authorities by his attacks upon naval administration that when, in 1808, he failed in his gallant attempt to destroy the French fleet off Brest, he was put upon half-pay. In 1814 he was charged with having circulated lying news of the fall of Napoleon in order to make money on the Stock Exchange, and, though innocent, he was cashiered and imprisoned. In 1817 and subsequently he distinguished himself in the naval service of Chile (1818-22), Brazil (1823-5), and Greece (1827-8). In 1832 he received a free pardon, and became a rear-admiral.

Codrington, CHRISTOPHER (1668-1710), was born in Barbados, and having served with distinction in Europe, being present at the siege of Namur, was rewarded in 1699 with the post of governor of the Leeward Islands. In 1703 he planned and carried out the attack on the French at Guadeloupe.

Codrington, ADMIRAL SIR EDWARD (1770-1851), entered the navy in 1783, and was present at the battles of the First of June and Trafalgar. He accompanied the expedition to Walcheren, and was employed off the coast of Spain co-operating with the Catalonian patriots during the Peninsular War. During the war with the United States which followed he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral. In 1815 he was nominated a K.C.B., was promoted to the rank of vice-admiral, 1825, and was appointed commander-in-chief of the Mediterranean squadron, 1826. It was in this capacity that he took the leading part in the battle of Navarino, October 20, 1827. In reward for this, Codrington was advanced to the dignity of the Grand Cross of the Bath; while from the Emperor of Russia he received the Grand Cross of St. George; and from the King of France the Grand Cross of St. Louis. But at home opinions were divided as to the necessity of what the Duke of Wellington called "an untoward event," and Sir Edward was thought to have been unduly influenced by his Philhellenic idea. He was recalled in April 1828, on account of subsequent neglect, declared Wellington, rather than because of Navarino. Before sailing for England he negotiated the Convention of Alexandria (q.v.), August 6. He obtained the rank of full admiral in 1837, and was appointed in 1839 commander-in-chief at Portsmouth, resigning his seat as M.P. for Devonport, which he had held since 1832.

His "Memoirs," edited by his daughter (1873), provide a good deal of valuable evidence for the obscure period of Navarino and his subsequent recall.

Coinage. The Britons seem first to have learnt the art of coinage from the Gauls about a hundred or two hundred years before the invasion of Julius Caesar. The Gaulish native coinage at this era consisted chiefly of rude imitations of the gold staters of Philip II of Macedon, which almost from the time that they were struck, or say from about 300 B.C., began to have a currency in that country. These copies passed over into Britain, and were again in their turn copied still more rudely by the Britons. The coins of Philip, which thus afforded a prototype to both the Gaulish and British coins, represented upon one side the laureate head of Apollo (or possibly Arès or Heracles), and on the reverse a two-horse chariot or biga. The British imitations of these picees are so rude that at first sight no resemblance between the original and the copy can be detected. The barbarous artists, unable to copy the head, have represented it by only a few lines and dots, and have at last confined their attempts at copying to the hair and the laurel wreath. On the reverse, the chariot and charioteer have almost or totally disappeared, and the horse is barely recognizable. At first the British currency was entirely of gold, but a short time before the Roman invasion, silver, copper, and tin coins were also issued. These began by being imitations of the gold coinage, but afterwards copied the silver and other metal coins of Gaul. The British coins were at first entirely without legend; but about the time of the Roman invasion names began to appear upon them. Some of these names are otherwise known to history, as is, for example, Cunobelinus, the Cymbeline of Shakespeare. Although Cæsar's invasion did not immediately affect the political condition of the country, a tendency to imitate the Roman civilization (which was beginning to take a firm hold in Gaul) set in in Britain, and of this there is abundant evidence on the coins. The Macedonian type gradually disappears, and we have designs copied from the contemporary Roman coinage.

After the subjugation of South Britain by the Romans, the regular imperial series was substituted for the native currency, British towns of mintage being Londinium (London) and Camulodunum (Colchester). The last Roman coins struck in Britain were probably some which bear the name of Magnus Maximus the usurper, and which were apparently issued in or about A.D. 383. From this time forward a considerable interval occurs. Doubtless, Roman coins were still current in Britain, though as time went on they must have diminished in numbers. Then came the rise of the Saxon currency. The first coins issued by the Saxons seem to have been some small silver pieces usually called sceattas, weighing twenty grains, and bearing generally no name, whose precise date, on this account, it would be very hard to determine. Those of the sceattas which are probably the latest are some which have Runic letters, and which can be dated in the middle of the seventh century. While we are speaking of these coins it is the proper place to notice a series of copper pieces, very like the sceattas in size and shape, which were confined altogether to the kingdom of Northumbria, and which belong to a rather later period than the sceattas, namely, to the eighth and part of the ninth centuries. They are called styccas.

We then come to the coin which long remained almost the sole money of the English, with the insignificant exception of a few gold coins, which were struck from time to time. This was the penny. It was copied from the silver denarius, which in the course of the eighth century and under the Carolingian dynasty had come to supplant the gold currency of the Merovingian time. The penny, like the Carolingian denarius, was a thin and flat silver coin, weighing some twenty to twenty-four grains; the full weight being twenty-four, whence the twenty-four grains which make up our pennyweight. The usual type of the penny showed on one side a rude head or bust, intended conventionally to represent that of the king, whose name was written round the head, while on the reverse the piece showed some device, most frequently a form of cross :

around this device was written the name of the moneyer, i.e., the fabricator of the coin, and of the town in which the piece was made. The pennies begin with Offa, King of Mercia (A.D. 757-96), and they continue (with trifling exceptions) the sole English coins until the reign of Edward I (1272).

The student must be placed upon his guard against confounding the actual denominations of coins with the denominations of money of account. In early times calculations were constantly made in money of account which was unrepresented by any coined pieces. This was a reminiscence of the days when money was computed altogether by weight. In fact, it may be said that the name of almost every coin which has ever existed has denominated a weight before it denominated a coined piece (e.g., the Greek stater, the Jewish shekel, etc.). The Saxon money of account was of two kinds. One was derived from their weight system, which was a combination of the Roman and a non-Roman Teutonic system, and whose chief denominations were the pound and the mark. The second money of account was simply taken from the Roman (or Byzantine) gold coin, the solidus, which in English was called the shilling. We frequently read of sums computed in pounds, marks, and shillings. Occasionally a solidus in gold was actually struck. The value of these moneys of account relative to the current coin has remained unaltered. The pound contained twenty shillings, or 240 pence; the mark two-thirds of the pound, or 160 pence. The mark eventually fell out of use, leaving the three forms of money by which we still compute—the pound (liber), the shilling (solidus), and the penny (denarius). From these Latin names come our symbols, £, s, d.

The Norman Conquest produced at first no material alteration in the English coinage. The penny continued to be the sole currency down to the reign of Edward I. Henry I is said to have ordered an issue of half-pennies, but none of these are known. John struck some half-pennies at the London and Winchester mints. The pennies of the first two Williams were as varied in their types as those of any previous monarch; but after these reigns the types diminished rapidly in number, and from the time of Edward I downwards, through many subsequent reigns, this coin was made upon one uniform pattern, which showed on the obverse a full face crowned, and on the reverse a long cross; the whole displaying a distinctly architectural design. The groat (first coined in the reign of Edward I) was in type almost identical with the penny. The next important change was made by Edward III, who introduced a gold currency into England. For a long period in the Middle Ages—that is to say, from the beginning of the ninth century to the middle of the thirteenth—the gold coins in use in western Europe had been supplied by the Emperors of Byzantium, whence these pieces acquired the name of bezants. Florence and Venice, in the course of the thirteenth century, instituted a gold currency of their own, and this example was speedily followed by other countries of Europe. Henry III had made the experiment of a gold coinage by striking gold pennies worth thirty times as much as the silver coins; but this was only an experiment. Edward III introduced a regular gold currency, first of florins (named after the gold coin of Florence), and afterwards of nobles, so called on account of the fineness of their metal. In value they were equal to eighty pence—i.e., to half a mark. The noble represented on one side the king in a ship (said to be an allusion to the victory of Sluys), and on the other a highly ornamental cross. Half and quarter nobles were issued at the same time. The type was slightly altered by Edward IV, who replaced the reverse cross by a sun, and on the side of the ship placed a rose, from whence his pieces got the name of rose nobles. They were also called ryals (royals). Silver having declined in value in comparison with gold, the rose nobles were now worth ten shillings, and to represent the older value of half a mark a new piece was struck, having on one side the figure of St. Michael trampling upon Satan, and on the other a ship bearing a cross. This coin was called the angel noble, or, more shortly, the angel; its half was the angelet.

Further changes of importance are to be noted in the reign of Henry VII. In the gold currency, the pound sovereign was added to the pieces already in circulation. This coin, which was larger than any previously struck and current for twenty shillings, represented upon the obverse the king enthroned, and on the other side the royal arms over a rose. Shillings were now first struck, and the type of the groat was changed from a front to a side face. Henry VIII struck some double-sovereigns, as well as half-sovereigns, and crowns, or quarter-sovereigns, in gold, and he issued a new type of noble (not continued in subsequent reigns) called the George noble. It nearly resembled the angel, but displayed St. George in place of St. Michael on the obverse. This king is unfavourably distinguished as the first who persistently debased the coinage of the country. The debasement continued during the two following reigns; but in the reign of Elizabeth the coinage was restored to its former purity. Edward VI first struck the crown and the half-crown in silver, as well as the sixpence. In the reign of Mary we have sovereigns, rose nobles, angels, half-angels, half-crowns, shillings, groats, pence, and the divisions of the penny; but in the reign of Elizabeth we find the highest complement in the number of its denominations which the English coinage ever attained. It now consisted of no fewer than twenty distinct kinds of coin, viz., in gold, of the sovereign, half-, quarter-, and half-quarter-sovereign, rose noble or ryal, angel (now equal to half-sovereign), angelet and quarter-angel, crown and half-crown; in silver, of the crown, half-crown, shilling, sixpence, groat, half-groat, threepenny, and three-halfpenny pieces, the penny, the three farthings, the half-penny, and farthing. Queen Elizabeth also struck coins for the use of the East India Company, which may be reckoned the beginning of the English colonial coinage. In the reign of James I there was no substantial alteration, though some of the above denominations were changed, and some abandoned. The sovereign was now generally known as the broad, and this name was continued through the reign of Charles I and through the Commonwealth. Charles I struck some pieces of the value of three pounds, and subsequently, during the scarcity of gold which he experienced during the Civil War, he melted plate and coined it into silver pieces of the values of twenty and of ten shillings.

From the accession of James I until the reign of Charles II, considerable fluctuations took place in the value of gold, and therefore in the value of the chief gold coin. At one time the broad was worth as much as thirty shillings. In the reign of Charles II it became fixed to the somewhat arbitrary value of twenty-one shillings, and as the gold from which the money of this reign was made came chiefly from the Guinea coast, the highest gold coins of this period acquired the name of guinea-pounds, or of guineas. Henceforth, until nearly the end of the reign of George III, the guinea entirely replaced the sovereign, and the gold currency, from the reign of Charles II to George III, uniformly consisted of pieces of five, two, one, and half-guineas. In 1817 George III reintroduced the sovereign, and the guinea was abandoned. Copper coins were first made in 1672, and replaced by bronze in 1861. £5 and £2 pieces, in gold, and a silver four-shilling piece were added in 1887, when new designs were placed on all the coins in honour of Queen Victoria's jubilee. The double florin and the groat were not continued in the coinage of Edward VII, and the crown piece has since also been discontinued until 1928, when new designs were introduced in our silver coinage. As a result of the financial crisis caused by the Great War of 1914-18 the gold coinage ceased to be current and was replaced by treasury notes to the value of ten shillings and one pound.

The coinage of Scotland began at a much later date than did that of England. With the exception of a few rude pennies, we have no Scottish money until the reign of David I, about the year 1124. The first coinage of Scotland followed as closely as possible the types of the English money, consisting, like the English coinage, at first exclusively of pennies, and about the end of the thirteenth century (David II) of the penny and the groat. The noble was likewise introduced by David II, but not continued in subsequent reigns. After her long struggle for independence had come to an end, Scotland began to issue a series of new denominations, which we will briefly mention in the order in which they were introduced. Robert II. coined gold pieces called, from their types, St. Andrew and Lion (having the shield of Scotland upon one side), and equal respectively to half and a quarter of the noble. These two names and types were afterwards united for one piece. James I. struck a coin called demy, and equal in value to half an English noble. In the reign of James III. were issued the first coins in base silver, or billon, and of a very low value, which went by the names of placks and half-placks. The Scottish coinage was now completely separated from the English, though some of the nominal values were still retained. The actual values of the Scottish currency deteriorated so rapidly that when, in the reign of James VI. (I.), the coinages of the two countries had to be brought into agreement, the Scottish shilling was found to be worth only one-twelfth of the English shilling. Therefore, when we read of a certain number of shillings Scots, we may pretty generally reduce that to the same number of pence in English reckoning. In the reign of James III. we notice the introduction of two new gold coins, the ridar, which shows the king on horseback, and the unicorn, on which that animal is holding a shield. Divisions of these pieces and of the St. Andrew were struck. Two other gold coins, not differing much from these in value, but different in type, belong to the reign of James V.—viz., the ecu, or crown, giving (as the name implies) the shield of Scotland on the obverse, and the bonnet piece, where the king's bust is represented in a square cap. The same prince coined a billon piece, known as the baubee, a corruption from bas pièce in Scottish French. In the reign of Mary we have a number of new coins, which by their names show an approach to the contemporary English coinage—viz., the twenty shilling piece, the ryal in gold, the testoon, equal in value to an English sixpence, and a billon piece called hardhead. A separate Scottish coinage was continued in the reigns of James I. and Charles I., but the coins were more and more assimilated to the English type.

The Irish coinage calls for little remark. The Danish kings of Ireland in the tenth and eleventh centuries struck pennies, some of which bear the names of known kings. The first coins struck after the Anglo-Norman conquest were issued by John while still a prince, and governor of Ireland. Henceforward the Irish coinage follows that of England, with these differences—that it contains no gold coinage, nor the higher denominations of silver, and is generally of a more alloyed metal. The harp for Ireland and the three crowns are the most distinctive types. The principal Anglo-Irish mint places were Dublin and Waterford.

Edward IV. struck a considerable Irish currency, and at various mints, Dublin, Cork, Drogheda, Limerick, Trim, Waterford, and Wexford. During the period that James II. remained in Ireland, after his flight from London, he issued a coinage of bronze, generally called gun-money, which assumed the denomination of coins of corresponding size and type in silver. On the accession of William and Mary this coinage fell to its metal value, that is to say, a nominal value of £22,500 was bought back for £640.

Coke, SIR EDWARD (1552–1634), chief justice of England, was born at Mileham, in Norfolk. After leaving Cambridge, he became a member of the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar early in 1578, when his extraordinary ability speedily became manifest. Appointed recorder of Norwich, 1586, he fulfilled the duties of his office with such acuteness that, in 1592, he was made recorder of London, and in the same year solicitor-general. As Speaker of the House of Commons, in 1593, he distinguished himself by the flowery nature of his addresses to Elizabeth, and a few months later became attorney-general, in which capacity he conducted the prosecution, for the Crown, of the Earls of Southampton and Essex (1601). In 1603 Coke, who had received the honour of knighthood from James I., was the Crown prosecutor at the trial of Sir Walter Raleigh, on which occasion he displayed unfeeling harshness and arrogance. Three years later Sir Edward Coke was engaged to prosecute the conspirators in the Gunpowder Plot, and displayed great ability in his management of the case. Shortly afterwards he became chief justice of the Common Pleas, and, in 1613, was transferred to the King's Bench and made a privy councillor. His enemies were, however, many and powerful; Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, Buckingham, and Sir Francis Bacon were his implacable foes, and in 1616 Coke refused to assist the court by giving judgment for the king in the case of Commendams (q.v.), and thus gave them an opportunity to procure his downfall. The chief justice was removed from his office on the charge that in his reports of decided cases he had introduced several things in derogation of the royal prerogative. The enmity of Bacon continued, but Coke, by the alliance of his daughter with a brother of Buckingham, regained some small share of the royal favour, and was subsequently one of the managers of Bacon's impeachment. In 1621 he entered parliament, where he speedily drew upon himself the hostility of the court by his opposition to monopolies, and by his determined assertion of the power of parliament. At the end of the year he was imprisoned in the Tower, but was released after a few months, and continued to take an active part in parliamentary affairs, whilst, in 1628, he originated and carried the Petition of Right (q.v.). Sir Edward Coke's reputation as a lawyer and as a judge was unequalled in his age. As the author of the celebrated "Reports," 1600-15, and the "Commentary upon Littleton," 1628, he is still a writer of the greatest importance to those who would know anything of the history of English law and practice.

Colborne, SIR JOHN, 1ST BARON SEATON (1778-1863), one of the most famous generals of his age, distinguished himself in his first campaign in Holland (1799). In 1801 he was present at the battle of Maida, and served throughout the Peninsular War with great distinction. It is said that his handling of his regiment at Waterloo contributed in no small degree to the British victory. In 1828 he was made lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada, and governor-general of the same province in 1837. He was also commander of the forces at the same time, and to his energetic action the easy suppression of the Canadian rebellion of 1838 was mainly due. In the following year his services were rewarded by a peerage, and in 1860 he became a field-marshal. In 1843 he was made lord high commissioner of the Ionian Isles, an office which he held for six years.

Biography by G. C. M. Smith, 1903.

Colchester (Essex), the Roman Camulodunum, was a "colonia" and one of the most important Roman stations in England. Immense quantities of Roman relics have been found here. It was an important centre under the kings of the West Saxon line, and was strongly fortified by Edward the Elder. It appears in Domesday as a place of considerable importance. In 1218 it was taken by Louis of France. The town enjoyed considerable trade all through the Middle Ages. During the Great Rebellion it was captured by the Royalists under Lord Goring in 1648. Fairfax besieged it for eleven weeks, and finally took it. The abbey of St. John was a Benedictine foundation, instituted in the reign of Henry I, and suppressed in 1539. The town returned two members to parliament from 1295 to 1885, when the number was reduced to one. It received a charter from Richard I in 1189.

Colchester, CHARLES ABBOT, LORD (1757-1829). [ABBOT.]

Coleman, EDWARD (d. 1678), was secretary to the Duchess of York. He was a Roman Catholic, a convert from Protestantism, and a busy intriguer, who corresponded secretly with the French court. He was one of the first accused by Titus Oates of complicity in the Popish Plot (q.v.). His papers were seized, and he was arrested. In his possession were found letters addressed to Père La Chaise, Louis XIV's confessor, in which he asked for money to be employed in giving "the greatest blow to the Protestant religion it has received since its birth," together with other expressions of a similar character. These were considered to be conclusive proofs of his guilt. On his trial Oates and Bedloe bore witness against him, and he was executed on December 3. J. Pollock, "Popish Plot," 1903.

Colepeper, JOHN, LORD (d. 1660), after having spent many years abroad in foreign service, returned to England, and was elected to the Long Parliament, where he distinguished himself by his vigorous opposition to monopolies. In 1642 the king made him chancellor of the exchequer, and he acquired great influence in the royal councils. On the outbreak of the Civil War he joined the king, was made master of the rolls in 1643, and a peer in 1644. He accompanied Prince Charles into exile. At the Restoration he returned to England, but died very soon afterwards.

Colet, JOHN (1466?-1519), Dean of St. Paul's, was the son of Sir Henry Colet, and was educated at Magdalen College (?), Oxford. About 1493 he went to the continent, and studied Greek in Italy and Paris, making the acquaintance of scholars. Returning in 1496, he lectured at Oxford on divinity and Greek. In 1505 he was made prebendary and dean of St. Paul's. Between 1508 and 1512 he founded and endowed St. Paul's School. Colet was one of the most effective of the teachers of the "New Learning" in England in the early part of the sixteenth century, and one of the most earnest of the knot of churchmen who aimed at the reformation and purification of the Church of England without actually separating from Rome.

College, STEPHEN (d. 1681), known as "the Protestant joiner," was a citizen of London, celebrated in Charles II's reign for his intemperate zeal against the Roman Catholics. In 1681 he was sent to Oxford by Shaftesbury to watch the proceedings of the court party during the session of parliament. While at college there he distinguished himself by inventing a "Protestant flail" for beating out the brains of Papists, and by writing coarse rhymes against the king. He was indicted in London on a charge of high treason, but the bill was thrown out by the grand jury. Subsequently he was tried at Oxford, found guilty of a conspiracy to seize the king, on the evidence of Dugdale and other informers, and executed.

Collier, JEREMY (1650-1726), was rector of Ampton, in Suffolk, and in 1685 was appointed lecturer at Gray's Inn. He was a zealous partisan of the Stuarts, and was committed to Newgate for writing against William III; he was, however, released without trial. But having granted absolution to the prisoners executed for the Assassination Plot (q.v.), he was obliged to leave the country. Returning to London, he wrote several works, among which was the famous "Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain" (1708-14), which involved him in a controversy with Burnet.

Collingwood, CUTHBERT, LORD (1750-1810), was born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and was very early sent to sea. In 1774 he served under Admiral Graves in America, and led a party of seamen at Bunker Hill. In 1776 he proceeded to the West Indies, where his promotion was rapid, as he stepped into each place vacated by Nelson, and in 1780 he accompanied Nelson in the expedition against San Juan, where his strong constitution served him well among the pestilential marshes. During the three next years he did good service in the capture of French merchantmen, and on peace being concluded in 1783, rejoined Nelson in the West Indies. In 1786 he returned to England, but did not long remain idle; and at the battle of the First of June, 1794, he greatly distinguished himself, though his services were passed over by Lord Howe. In command of the Excellent, he was present at the battle of St. Vincent (February 1797). After this he was employed in blockading the enemy's ports, and in 1799 was made a rear-admiral, and appointed to serve in the Channel fleet. He was shortly afterwards dispatched with reinforcements to Lord Keith in the Mediterranean. In 1803 he was sent to join Admiral Cornwallis off Brest. In 1804 he was engaged in the blockade of Cadiz, until the union of the French and Spanish fleets compelled him to retire. But he soon resumed his position, and only left it to join Nelson's fleet in its pursuit of Villeneuve. In command of the Royal Sovereign he was second in command to Nelson at Trafalgar, and, leading one division of the fleet, was the first to engage the enemy. On Nelson's death the command devolved on Collingwood, who has now been acquitted of any blame for not having saved more of the enemy's ships after the battle. He was at once raised to the peerage with a life pension of £2,000 per annum. He continued actively employed in annoying the French coast, and guarding the relations of England with the countries bordering on the Mediterranean. So unremitting were his exertions that they produced a disease which finally, on March 7, 1810, killed him almost at his post, and before he could reach England. He was of all the able captains of his day second only to Nelson, nor was he less beloved by his men for his gentle consideration and his daring courage.

Collins, MICHAEL (1890-1922), Irish politician, began his career in the British civil service, in which he remained until 1909. He was one of the organizers of the revolt of Easter 1916, and after a few months of imprisonment at Frongoch he became Sinn Féin member for County Cork in December 1918, and in de Valera's Republican ministry of 1919 he combined the offices of minister of finance and head of the intelligence department. The British government unavailingly offered a reward of £10,000 for his arrest. In 1921, however, he was prominent in bringing to a successful issue the negotiations opened between de Valera and Lloyd George; though his efforts to reach a settlement with Ulster and to establish the Free State by moderation did not succeed in averting civil war in Ireland in 1922. He was shot from ambush while motoring towards Cork on August 22, 1922.

Colonial Conferences. [IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.]

Colonial Office, THE, as a department of state dates from 1854, but it actually developed from a series of privy council and parliamentary committees and commissions. At first colonial affairs were not delimited; they were the concern of the privy council, committees of which were appointed to deal with trade and plantations. Archbishop Laud's commission (1634-41) was followed in 1643 by a parliamentary commission under Robert Rich, 2nd Earl of Warwick. Then control of the colonies was assumed by the council of state, which appointed committees to deal with specific questions as well as anticipated the Restoration council for foreign plantations (1660). In 1672 this council was united to the council for trade, but two years later its functions were transferred to the privy council. In 1694 parliament attempted to gain control of colonial affairs and in 1696 a separate board of trade and plantations was appointed, which, however, became merely advisory to the secretary of state for the southern department. In 1768 a secretary of state for the colonies was created, but both the secretary and the board were abolished in 1782. Two years later a committee of the privy council was appointed, but administration was left to the home office. In 1794 Henry Dundas became the secretary responsible both for war and the colonies. Under him the committee lost its colonial functions and became known as the board of trade. His successor in 1801 united as a separate secretaryship of state the two departments of war and colonies, which were not separated until the creation of the fourth secretary of state in 1854. Since the Napoleonic wars colonial affairs have grown in importance and the staff of the department has been greatly augmented. In 1907 the office was divided into the Dominions, the Colonies, and the General Divisions, and a secretary appointed to deal with correspondence arising from the Imperial conferences. In 1921 the affairs of the Far East were added to its duties. In 1922 it supervised the treaty arrangements with Ireland and is now responsible for relations with the Irish Free State. In July 1925 the Dominions Office was created, under a secretary of state for the Dominions identical with the colonial secretary, but as a separate department of state, to relieve the Colonial Office of business connected with all the self-governing Dominions, the self-governing colony of South Rhodesia, the South African territories of Basutoland, Bechuanaland Protectorate, and Swaziland, and Imperial conferences. The overseas settlement department of the Dominions Office was created to administer the Empire Settlement Act of 1922.

The Colonial Office is divided into the following departments: General (including treaties, League of Nations, defence); West Indian (including also British Honduras, British Guiana, Prince Edward and Marion Islands); Far Eastern; Ceylon and Mauritius (including St. Helena, Fiji, West Pacific Isles); Gold Coast and Mediterranean (Gibraltar, Malta, and Cyprus); Nigeria; East Africa; Tanganyika and Somaliland; West African Frontier Force; King's African Rifles; Middle East; and Accounts.

An unofficial journal, edited by Sir W. H. Mercer, was published from 1907 under the title of "The Colonial Office Journal" and from 1914 (vol. 8) as "The Colonial Journal," until publication was ceased in 1920 (vol. 13).

Colonies, THE. [BRITISH EMPIRE.]

Columba, St. (521-97), was a native of Gartan, in Donegal; he was the son of Fedhlimh and Eithne, both of Irish blood royal. Educated for the Church, he founded, in 545, the monastery of Derry, and subsequently established many churches in Ireland. In 563 he crossed over to Scotland, with the object of preaching the Gospel to its pagan inhabitants. Later accounts ascribe the departure of Columba from Ireland to his action in bringing about a battle between two Irish tribes in 561, but the story is of doubtful authenticity. Columba landed in Iona, receiving the grant of the island from Conall, King of Dalriada, or, as some think, from Brude, the Pictish monarch; here he founded his church, which became for 150 years the national Church of Scotland. The Columban Church, always intimately connected with the Church of Ireland, was in some points of doctrine and ceremonial opposed to that of Rome, to which it owed no allegiance. [CHURCH, THE EARLY CELTIC.] After some years spent in the establishment of his monastery and in preaching to the Scots of Dalriada, Columba went on a mission of conversion to the court of Brude, King of the Picts, at Inverness; having won over the monarch to the new faith, he proceeded to establish monasteries throughout the Pictish territory. In 575 he accompanied to Ireland Aidan, King of Dalriada; and was active at the Council of Drumceatt at which the independence of Aida from the Irish Dalriads was asserted. The remaining years of his life were chiefly spent at Iona and in founding churches amongst the southern Picts. The clouds of tradition and romance in which the facts of his life are enshrouded render it somewhat difficult to estimate his true character; he is called by his biographer Adamnan a man of contrasts, "at once tender and irritable, rude and courteous, grateful and revengeful." He seems to have possessed political insight as well as religious fervour, and his work contributed greatly to the development of a consolidated Scotland and a united Scots people. Columba died in June 597 before the altar of his own church of Iona. In later years part of his relics were removed to Kells, in Meath, and part by Kenneth MacAlpine to Dunkeld.

Columbia, BRITISH, was formerly part of the Hudson Bay Territories. It rose into importance owing to the discovery of gold there (1858-61) and the consequent influx of settlers. It was created a Crown colony in 1858. In 1866 Vancouver Island, and in 1868 Queen Charlotte Islands, were incorporated with it; and in 1871 the whole district was formed into a province of Canada (q.v.). The government, which, like those of the other provinces of the Dominion, is subject to the central authority at Ottawa, consists of a lieutenant-governor and a legislative assembly of forty-eight members, with an executive council of seven.

Commendams. On the vacancy of a benefice, it was sometimes customary to assign it to the care of a bishop, to be held in commendam until a proper person could be found on whom to bestow it. This system was employed for the purpose of evading the law against pluralities, and was frequently abused. In 1616 occurred the famous Case of Commendams, when an action was brought against Neile, Bishop of Lichfield, for holding a living, in commendam, to which it was alleged he had been illegally presented by the king, whose general prerogative of granting a commendam was disputed. The case is famous for the subserviency of the judges, who, having made some slight effort to resent the king's attempt to obtain a verdict favourable to himself, subsequently sued for pardon on their knees. Sir Edward Coke's opposition to James I's unconstitutional act entailed his dismissal shortly afterwards.

Commissaries, THE COURT OF, for Scotland, was an ecclesiastical court created in 1563, "to fill up the gap caused in the administration of civil justice" by the abolition of the Consistorial Court. It dealt with divorce cases, sentences of excommunication, and other ecclesiastical matters.

Commissions are instruments issuing from the Crown, and delegating authority to particular persons to perform certain acts. Thus, in military matters a commission is, properly speaking, the document issued to every military officer, authorizing him to perform duties on behalf of the state. Commissions of array were royal warrants authorizing certain individuals to raise men for the purpose of exercising and training them in war. [MILITARY SYSTEM.] Among the permanent bodies of commissioners, who perform regularly duties delegated by the Crown, are the commissioners in lunacy, who are required to supervise the care of lunatics, and the justices on the commission of the peace. [JUSTICE.] Royal Commissions are frequently issued to small bodies of persons—members of either House of parliament, and others—empowering them to inquire into the operation of laws, into alleged grievances, or social, economic, or educational matters; generally with a view to future legislation. It is not usual to appoint members of the government unless the inquiry affects their own departments, or is non-political; and members of a commission who subsequently take office are usually superseded or abstain from signing the report. In commissions appointed under an act of parliament the members are sometimes nominated in the act itself; but in a Royal Commission strictly so-called names are not usually communicated to parliament beforehand. They are empowered to collect evidence, and to examine witnesses, though not on oath; and their proceedings are recorded and usually published in the form of a report. Royal commissioners are also appointed by the Crown, on the report of both Houses of parliament to the effect that the judge who has tried any election petition has reported the prevalence of corrupt practices. They inquire into the matter; and on their report the action of parliament in the way of disfranchisement or prosecution is based. Such commissions were established in 1853.

Common Lands, Open Fields, and Enclosure. These topics naturally belong to one another. The methods of joint occupation and use of lands in England, besides possessing an intrinsic interest for the economic historian, become part of the subject-matter of political history as soon as the enclosure movement begins to make an impression on the social structure. Enclosure cannot be rightly understood without a study of the conditions which farming in severalty replaced. By enclosure is generally meant the process by which estates composed of large open arable fields, divided into strips and supplemented by woodland, meadow land, and waste for pasturage, were converted into aggregates of smaller fields which were then fenced or ditched and held in private ownership. The process has, in fact, generally marked the transition from collective to individual occupation. The medieval village farm, operated by the villagers on what is called the open-field system, was the prevalent type of agricultural organization over the greater part of the country. It reached its highest and most scientific stage of development in the good flat farming lands of the Midlands and was the standard unit (with local variations) throughout the central plain and eastern and southern counties. In the north, in the south-west, and in Kent collective farming on the open-field plan never took so firm a hold. In the north, north-west, and south-west the older methods of agriculture and systems of tenure, sometimes termed Celtic and associated particularly with Wales, never entirely gave way. Further, the complete adoption of open-field farming was impossible in many parts of these areas, since natural features (e.g., in the Lake District of Cumberland) imposed the necessity for more individualistic methods. This second consideration also applies to the down and forest lands of Kent, where special conditions prevailed. As early as the seventh century the common arable fields of the Anglo-Saxon community are known to have existed. Of their history before this period we still know very little, nor do we know at exactly what date the habit of more or less haphazard movement from one fertile area to another, as the soil became exhausted, gave place to the permanent cultivation of a single area of intensive husbandry; but there is evidence of the existence of "common intermixed arable acres" in the Laws of Ine. It is not, however, until the eleventh and twelfth centuries that we are able to tell on exactly what principle the village farms were organized, and then it appears that two systems were in use, viz., those of two-field and three-field husbandry. In either case one of the large tillage fields into which the arable of the community was divided would lie fallow each year, resting after its exhaustion by a corn crop and drawing fresh strength from the waste matter dropped by the villagers' beasts upon it. After harvest the temporary fences would be removed from the field or fields that had been sown for corn, and the whole arable area thrown open as pasture until the ploughing for the next year's corn began. On the relative distribution of the two- and three-field systems the recent researches of Professor H. L. Gray have provided more definite information. The fertile country of the midlands, extending from the Welsh borders to the Fens and from Hampshire to Durham, was the area of three-field agriculture. Here the open village had its longest history. "The two-field system was most apparent in the counties of Oxford, Gloucester, Somerset, Dorset, Warwick, Wilts, and Berks, the upland parts of which counties form a compact area mostly of high bleak downland, not favourable to a developed type of agriculture. In the more fertile valleys the three-field system prevailed" (Curtler). The eastern counties had customs of their own which prevent their approximation to either of the systems mentioned. During the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries improvements in methods and the extension of knowledge of good farming led some villages which had previously practised the two-field course to take the revolutionary step of changing over to the three-field system. Whatever the open-field arable system used, the areas sown were always parcelled out to the lord of the demesne and his tenants in small allotments, in the shape of long strips of anything from half an acre to an acre or more in extent. These roughly represented the area which a plough could cover in one day, and it may very well be that the strip system has its origin in the allotment of land tilled under a system of co-operative ploughing, whether it be of Celtic or Germanic invention. The larger owners naturally received a greater number of strips. Individual tenants had to harvest their own crops, but it was hardly to their convenience that they were not compact but scattered in the fields.

The strip system of communal cultivation is subject to several forms of criticism. It has been described as "wasteful, unsystematic, and in every way bad economy." The even current of village life was apt to be disturbed from time to time by quarrels between the owners of neighbouring strips. There were alleged trespasses, encroachments, removals of landmarks. No one could improve his land with any prospect of reaping an ultimate reward. Nor was careful cleaning feasible when the thistle seeds of an untidy neighbour could drift across to destroy the fruit of a man's labour. Moreover, the course of the crops and the determination of the common routine of husbandry depended on the general voice of the village. The agreement of the lord and of all the tenants was required before any improvement could be instituted in crop-rotation. Outside the arable fields the use of the common hay-meadows and of the common waste depended similarly on the general will. On the other hand, it has been argued that if farming of a high order was seldom possible, at least a definite standard of average competence was maintained, since no sign of individual negligence could escape the public eye, and the bad farmer would be subject to the discipline of the manorial officials. Apart from this a stronger argument presents itself to those who regret the unquestioned diminution of the class of small occupying landholders. Individual enterprise was not altogether suppressed. An ambitious farmer, however small his beginnings, could improve his position by the gradual acquirement of land strip by strip, and even the cottager could invest his small capital in the few acres sufficient to give him a partial independence.

The mediæval village farmer, with his portion of the village arable, had rights over the adjoining meadow and waste. While the hay was growing, the meadows (Lammas land) were fenced, and strips in them were reallocated to the individual co-operators. From July or August to the beginning of February they were thrown open as common pasture. The common waste, unlike the meadow, was used all the year round for pasturing the village beasts. Frequently, though no allotment of ground was practised, a check on individuals was employed, which consisted in stinting the commons, that is, in limiting for each man the number of stock which might be turned out in rough approximation to the value of the arable portion of his tenement. His pasture rights on the waste were part of the most valuable assets of his property. Common appendant, the right to turn out oxen and horses, cows and sheep, belonged to those whose freehold or tenement anciently comprised part of the village arable. Common appurtenant was a right which proceeded as a special grant from the lord of the manor (who from the lawyers' point of view was the owner of the common) and did not necessarily attach to the holding of ploughland. Common in gross occurred when rights were taken up beyond the strict allowance of the ancient stint. It could be used by men who were wholly without land on the manor, being "neither appendant nor appurtenant to land but annexed to a man's person." In addition to pasturage rights there existed common of estovers (the cutting of wood) and common of turbary (the cutting of turfs).

Reference is made in other articles to the break-up of the manorial system. [MANOR; BLACK DEATH; PEASANTS' REVOLT; COMMUTATION; COPYHOLD; VILLENAGE.] The mediæval manor was destroyed in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; but open-field husbandry remained as the object of scientific attack and of passionate defence for many generations to come. In 1236 the Statute of Merton was passed, confirming the claim of the manorial lord to enclose the waste; but he must not proceed to extremes; enough must be left for the use of the tenants. It is not to be supposed that the latter were always strong enough to enforce the lord's observation of the law, and it was a frequent matter of complaint in the sixteenth century that the villagers were "straitened" in the use of their commons. The geometrical simplicity of the holdings in the average twelfth-century manor was by the fourteenth century considerably disturbed. Some villagers, even though they held by base tenure, had amassed large holdings; an increasing inclination showed itself on the part of the lord to lease out his demesne land as a farm to a tenant for terms of a number of years. Money was playing a larger part in the internal economy of the village; farm produce was transported to neighbouring towns and to distant parts to feed the denser centres of population. Commercialism had invaded the manor. Enclosure on the part of the peasantry was sufficiently frequent to leave its mark on the history of the fourteenth century, and it proceeded side by side with that undertaken by the lords, but often the motives were different. The tenants, where they enclosed their strips, or threw them together in compact fields, did so for convenience and efficiency in arable farming. The lords, with their frequent difficulties in obtaining labour, were often tempted to enclose for the purpose of creating extensive sheep pastures, which could be managed at a small labour charge, and with increasing prospects of a good return for their wool. The tenants in their turn were affected by the growth of pasture farming. In the sixteenth century they enclosed more pasture land than arable, sometimes, no doubt, as a protection against the big graziers who overstocked the commons with their sheep. Until the reign of Edward VI the conversion of arable fields into sheep walks was the dominant motive of the enclosers of the open village farms, if we are to believe contemporary writers. In its expression public opinion was against enclosure. Writers, like Tusser, who approached the topic from the technical side, emphasized its advantages, and Hales, who fully realized the evils of depopulation and rural insecurity for which the oppressive and speculative landlord could be made responsible, yet remarks through the mouthpiece of his Knight in the "Discourse of the Common Weal" that "experience should seem plainly to prove that enclosures should be profitable and not hurtful to the common weal, for we see that countries where most enclosures be are most wealthy, as Essex, Kent, Devonshire. Experience sheweth that tenants in common be not so good husbands as when every man hath his part in several." Hales was writing at the time when popular indignation against the enclosing landlord was at its height. In 1549 the great rising under Ket in Norfolk broke out, the rebels throwing open the fields which had been hedged in, and displaying particular animosity against the enclosers of commons. The Prayer Book issued by authority in 1553 contained a special prayer for the conversion of landlords to a proper spirit of responsibility for the welfare of their tenants. Enclosure proceeded without cessation after the middle of the sixteenth century, but the public outcry became gradually less loud. The most satisfactory way of accounting for this decline of feeling is to assume that changes in the prices of wool and arable produce began to make tillage more profitable, with the necessary consequence that the wholesale depopulation involved by the conversion of ploughland areas to pasture ceased to be so remarkable a social evil. The efforts of the government, actuated by both mercantilist and humanitarian motives, to protect the corn lands in a long series of parliamentary acts may also have had a slight effect in preventing its continuance, though this is doubtful. Enclosures of the Tudor period affected chiefly the Midland counties. In nine of these, including Middlesex in the south, the land enclosed between 1455 and 1607 was more than 8 per cent. of the total area, according to Dr. Gay's figures; and it was in these Midland counties, notably Northamptonshire and Warwickshire, that the last of the great enclosure revolts occurred in the latter year. The rising led to the appointment of a commission of inquiry, working on the lines adopted by early commissioners in 1517-19 and 1548. The government followed its old course of supervising and, where possible, preventing enclosure. This negative policy did not survive the Restoration. But there was no return on the part of landowners to the earlier mode of quiet enclosure entirely unchecked by official recognition. A common means of agreement found confirmation of allotment in severalty in a completed suit between the lord and his tenants in the Court of Chancery. This means could be employed, too, to bring pressure on the unwilling members of the village farm. At the end of the century the Chancery decree began to be superseded by the private act of parliament. A general bill for permitting enclosures was proposed in 1681, but private acts continued to be the rule until the first general act, which was passed in 1801. Seventeenth-century enclosure after the first two decades seems on the whole to have made little diminution in the arable lands. A large amount of fen country was drained and converted into farm land. There was considerable improvement of the waste elsewhere; but our knowledge of these years is at present somewhat fragmentary. From the reign of Anne onwards much information is provided by the acts themselves, by the numerous publications of those who wrote on the subject of agriculture and on the struggle between the new and the old schools of husbandry, and, at the close of the century, by the experts who prepared reports on the counties for the newly-established Board of Agriculture (founded 1793). Whereas enclosure in earlier days had been undertaken as much for the creation of sheep pastures as for other purposes, the dominant note of the eighteenth-century changes was improvement of arable. Already, since the end of the Tudor period, improvements in crop rotation and in new grasses had been the subject of experiment. The eighteenth century is remarkable for the number of enthusiasts sprung from all classes of the rural community who devoted their lives to the development of new agricultural methods and processes. Those who gave thought to the immense gain in productivity which enclosure and drainage brought to arable land had considerable influence in bringing about the rapid advance of enclosure in the central plain of England, which was still relatively the most backward part of the country from their point of view. It has been estimated that, between 1700 and 1760, a series of 208 acts enclosed about 250,000 acres of common field and waste; between 1761 and 1801, 2,000 acts enclosed

3,180,000 acres; between 1802 and 1844, 1,883 acts enclosed 2,549,000 acres; since 1845, upwards of 670 awards have enclosed over 500,000 acres (more than half of which were waste land). [See "ENCLOSURE AND COMMONS SINCE 1801."]

Common Law may be defined as that part of the law of the land which, before the Judicature Act of 1873, was administered by those courts which were called courts of common law, in distinction to the courts of equity. It was founded on the old popular law of the nation, and has grown by the process of legislation and by the assimilation in whole or in part of other systems; just in the same way as the judicial system of the royal courts introduced after the Conquest became part of our common law. It consists of written laws or statutes, and of unwritten laws or customs; though the term "common law" was generally used in a more restricted sense to describe the system of customary law grounded on the recorded decisions of successive judges, as opposed to the "written" or statute law. Such decisions of judges which are preserved in year-books, reports and digests of cases, as well as certain famous law books such as the "Institutes" of Sir E. Coke, are of high authority in our courts. The application and interpretation of the statute law is entrusted to the judges. By the way in which they carry out this work the law is modified. They are, however, not free to interpret statutes as they choose, but must observe certain rules in their dealings with them; as, for instance, that all acts of parliament, except in cases where the effects would be manifestly absurd or unjust, and so contrary to the clear intention of parliament, are to be interpreted according to the plain meaning of the words. For judges are not set to speculate on, but to carry out, the intentions of parliament. In order to ascertain the meaning of a statute, the preamble, though not in itself law, may be consulted as an authority. As regards the administration of statutes, it is to be observed that no statute is of retrospective force unless the same is expressly declared; that repealed statutes are not to be taken into account except as having had force before their repeal; that general terms used after particular cases apply only to cases which are strictly ejusdem generis; and that all penal statutes and such statutes as relate to taxation are to be construed strictly.

The statute law begins with 9 Hen. III, the Great Charter. Customary law has the same force as statute law as to the assent of the people. For lex non scripta "consists of those rules and maxims concerning persons and property which have obtained by the tacit consent and usage of the inhabitants of the country." Customs are either general or particular. General customs bind all men equally who are under the same conditions, though they may not have been the subjects of enactment. For a general usage, if ascertained and established, becomes part of the common law and is recognized by the courts. Particular customs are exceptional in their application. For a custom to be good it must have arisen before legal memory, which has been fixed at the first year of Richard I. This doctrine has, however, been regulated by statute (2 and 3 William IV, c. 71, 1 and 2). A custom must, moreover, be continuous as regards right; it must be peaceably enjoyed; not unreasonable; it must be certain, or at least such as can be ascertained; and it must be consistent or compulsory in its application. A particular custom which is contrary to general rights must be construed strictly. The customary law is declared by the judges, and their decisions collectively exhibit the common law both as regards the application of statutes and the declaration of customs.

Common Order, THE BOOK OF, was the service book of the Scottish Reformers, and was compiled, in 1567, by Knox from a manual issued by Calvin. It long continued to be used by the Presbyterians, both in Scotland and England.

Common Pleas, COURT OF. [PLEAS.]

Commons, THE HOUSE OF, is the Lower Chamber or representative branch of the English parliament, appointed by popular election. The peculiar feature in the constitutional position of the Commons, when they secured their place as part of parliament, is that they had little more than a formal share in legislation; in control of the administration, only the power of petition; and no share at all in the function of justice; while almost from the first they took the chief part in the grants of taxation. This theoretic position is traceable even at the present time, when the Commons alone settle taxation, whereas their share of legislative and administrative power won by the conversion of the petition into a "bill" is, at least in theory, only concurrent with that of the House of Lords, and the Lords retain exclusively the powers of justice. These peculiarities are due to the historical conditions of the development of the House of Commons. Another peculiarity, which only these historical conditions can explain, is the meaning which came to be attached to the word

"commons," including freeholders and burgesses at once, and which thus differentiated essentially the English parliamentary system, both in its construction and in the course it has run, from the representative systems of other countries. Lastly, the history of the "third estate" brings out the original character of the members of the House of Commons as being mere delegates, and the gradual replacement of this by the higher character of senators, so that each member is not the deputy of a locality, but a representative of the whole.

The word "commons" (communitates, communauté) is found in the thirteenth century often in the simple sense of the whole body of the nation. But under the influence of the French use of the word for an organized body such as the town corporations, it comes to be also used for smaller organized representative bodies, such as the county courts or the corporate body controlling the boroughs, or again, the body of tenants-in-chief. The barons at Oxford in 1258 speak of the twelve appointed per le commun, i.e., by the baronial tenants-in-chief, to consult pour le commun de la terre, i.e., for the whole nation. Indeed the whole constitutional struggle between classes in this century may be put in the formula of a struggle as to the practical interpretation of the word communitas. And for some time it seemed that the English constitution would be cast in a mould like the French, constituted of clergy, chief tenants, boroughs; or at least that it would resemble that of Aragon (clergy, magnates, knights, towns); for each of these bodies had in England at one time an identity of its own. What, then, defeated this tendency? What common ground brought the burgesses and freeholders' class together in England alone of all countries? The answer is, the shire-moot, or county court. Here the two classes had been long used to meet and work together under royal orders, the communitas sciræ had contained not only freeholders from hundred and township, but also the representative burgesses from each borough, entrusting the duties laid on the shire to three or four of the more discreet knights; and after the dangerous precedent had been set aside of Simon de Montfort's dealing with the boroughs apart from their shires, from 1283 the writ for knights and burgesses alike was executed in the shire-moot. The shire had brought over the knights from the baronial body to the freeholders, and had now associated the knights with the burgesses. The only thing which threatened to keep them still separated in parliament was the system of taxation, and when the old feudal taxation by aids, scutages, and carucages [AID] had yielded to the national taxation by subsidies and customs, it became natural for the knights and burgesses, as the representative and taxing body, to make common cause. By the end of the fourteenth century they had coalesced to form a body clearly differentiated from the lords.

The English parliament, then, in the fourteenth century, consisted of two "estates"—if that term be permitted—the clergy and the lords, and a third body, which had more the character of a representation of localities. It had seemed not impossible under Edward I that two other groups might be added—the lawyers and the merchants. The former would have been fatal to the Commons' acquisition of administrative supervision; the latter, fatal to their monopoly of taxation, and so to their one weapon against the Crown. However, not only was this not realized, but the actually existing clerical group entered on the suicidal policy of escaping their position between "the hammer and the anvil"—pope and king—by taking up a position of jealous constitutional isolation, and persisted in dropping out of the parliamentary system. The Commons were left alone, the sole body representative of the nation, and the sole body too which could be fairly deemed able to impose a national tax. For while the making of laws and the administering of supreme justice had been the business of the king and his great council, it had been always necessary to obtain the active concurrence of the shire-moot to raise a tax. Thus the terms in which the representatives are called to Edward I's parliaments are merely "to hear"; under Edward II, "to hear and consent to," as against the Lords "to treat of" the matters. But the evolution of the two Houses increased the powers of the representative House, as did also the appeals to them made by the contending parties of the court and the opposition baronage in 1322, 1327, 1386, 1387, 1399. Also through the reign of Edward III the Commons felt, as their song said, that they were the "shippe's mast, That with their chattel and their good Maintained the war from first to last." And moreover, the knights of the shire were now taking up that attitude of bold, yet wary and unsleeping opposition which justifies Hallam in saying that they "bore the brunt of the battle for constitutional liberty." Thus it was almost wholly their energy which, in the battle over taxation, secured to parliament in 1340 the control of direct taxation, and in 1362 of the customs; while, under Richard II, the indirect control by appropriation and audit, and the rule settled in 1401, that grants be made the last day of the session, laid down the principle that redress precedes supply, as the downfall of Richard II was a protest against the claim of the Crown to an ordaining power tantamount to the law-making power of parliament. "The year 1341 distinctly marks the acquisition by the third estate of its full share of parliamentary power, the Commons asserting, and the Lords allowing them, an equal share in the common demand of right and control" (Stubbs).

In legislation it had already in 1327 become the rule to say "at the petition of the Commons," instead of "by their assent." And this was made a reality—the real initiative was given to them—when in 1439 the petition was transformed into a “bill, containing in itself the form of an act,” a usage which became regular under the Tudors. To the control of administration the Commons had made their first step by their great petition against grievances in 1309, and this attitude they maintained by indefatigable petitioning through the century, e.g., in 1376 especially; while their being called on to ratify the depositions of Edward II and Richard II strengthened their claim immensely, as did the period of regency after Edward III, and above all the fact that, up to 1437, the Lancastrian dynasty’s parliamentary title obliged the kings to subject their council to instructions from parliament, and to constitute it of such members as would be agreeable to the Commons. Even Edward IV evaded rather than defied their interference. The Tudors have been accused of packing the House with creatures of the court, and of introducing more than eighty new boroughs, with a view to influencing parliamentary policy. The alleged “subservience” of the Tudor parliaments is, however, to be ascribed less to royal interference and intimidation than to the fact that the Tudors had the confidence of their subjects, and, in the last resort, knew how to yield when the temper of the House had been dangerously stirred by anxiety as to the succession, by an ecclesiastical measure for which they were not prepared, or by some great defect in the ordinary administration, such as the abuse of monopolies in Elizabeth’s reign. In the seventeenth century a common spirit animated the whole House. It was far better attended, the grant of freedom of speech became more of a reality than the warning with which it was conjoined against abuse of the grant. The old weapon of impeachment, which had proved so formidable to unpopular royal ministers in 1377, and in 1386, and in 1449, had lain unused since then, but was brought forth once more against Mompesson and Bacon in 1621, and against the Earl of Middlesex in 1624, and, as used against Strafford in 1640, gave the death-blow to ministerial reliance on Crown support. No part of the Commons’ work is now more thoroughly carried out than this supervision of all public departments by the machinery of motions for a resolution, motions before supply, and questions to ministers. Similarly the House, by its representative character and its hold of the purse, has long had practically the final voice in deliberation on such matters as foreign policy, and the determination of war and peace. In the fourteenth century the Commons had mostly avoided direct interference in such questions, but the failure of the French wars had roused them to more straightforward interposition, and this jealousy was afterwards revived by distrust of the action of the court. In taxation the fourteenth century had seen the sole right to impose taxes won for parliament by the Commons, the fifteenth sees the Commons secure the fruits of this victory solely for themselves, for in 1407 it was allowed that a tax could originate only with the Commons; the Lords and the clergy in convocation having nothing to do but practically to follow with corresponding grants. This claim they did not relax under the Tudors, though it was evaded by benevolences, and it was this which brought them first into collision with the Stuart theory of prerogative, which took nowhere a more offensive form than in the ship-money and customs duties by which it aimed at superseding the representative control of taxation. The Petition of Right (1628) and the Bill of Rights (1689) embodied this as a cardinal principle of the constitution, and it was completed by the doctrine first heard in 1671 and 1680, and subsequently vindicated in 1861 by their resolute action in rejecting the Lords’ amendments to the Bill for Repealing the Paper Duties, that no amendment can be made in a money bill of the Commons, nor can the Lords even indirectly impose any charge. And this the language of the acts of parliament and of the King’s Speech formally recognizes. The exclusive authority of the Commons in financial matters was finally established by the Parliament Act of 1911. It is this principle, as much as the necessity to renew the Mutiny Act, that gives the Commons control over the numbers of the standing army. But with all their sole control, and the annual Appropriation Act, and budget, and elaborate machinery for audit and for criticism of each item, it may be doubted whether the growth of public expenditure is not beyond the power of the House, as at present constituted, effectually to restrain.

In the course of their long advance to supreme power in the state, the Commons have sometimes made errors; thus they were defeated in their attempts to tax the clergy (1449) and to claim a share of the Lords’ judicial powers (1400, and Floyd’s Case, 1621), and they were compelled to abandon the practice of forcing bills through the Lords by tacking them to a money bill; but most of all have they misjudged their dignity in the interpretation they have sometimes given to privilege of the House. As to the elections in the shires, acts had been passed in 1406 and 1430 to check the interference respectively of the sheriff and of others than freeholders; but the cognizance of disputed elections lay with king and council until the Commons took notice of such cases in 1553 and 1586, and in 1604 entered on an indecisive conflict with the Chancery. Since that date, however, or indisputably since the Aylesbury Case (q.v.) in 1704, the House has been judge of its own elections, a function it deputed to a committee from 1790, and from 1868 more honourably delegated to the judges, with marked results on the purification of the public tone in relation to bribery, as can be seen in the stringent clauses of the bill of 1883. [BRIBERY.]

As to privilege of members of the House of Commons from arrest, the first important case to be noticed is that when the Speaker, Thorpe, was imprisoned on an action of trespass brought by the Duke of York in 1453. But Henry VIII, in Ferrers' Case (1543) supported their claim, and James I had to allow it in his first parliament (Shirley's Case), and it has been allowed consistently ever since, with the exception that it has ceased to be extended to members' servants. The House has always exercised jurisdiction over its own members by committal or expulsion, though the former expires at a prorogation, and is so far inferior to the internal jurisdiction of the Lords. The important privilege of freedom of speech was not acquired till the Lancastrian reigns, and was little respected in practice by the Tudor kings, but under the Stuarts the release of Sir John Eliot and others (1629), and the failure of the attempt upon the Five Members (q.v.) (1642), led to the recognition of the principle by the King's Bench and its final enunciation in the Bill of Rights (1689). It still was found necessary, after the undignified dispute with Stockdale (1837-40—q.v.), to pass an act protecting printers of parliamentary papers from liability to actions for libel. On the other hand, in appealing to privilege to prevent the publication of debates, the Commons had put Wilkes into the position of a representative of a just and irresistible popular demand (1771), and they have more prudently given up this pretension, as well as the inconvenient custom of excluding "strangers" at a single member's request [resorted to, however, in 1927].

The constitution and structure of the House of Commons has also a history of its own. In 1295, 37 counties and 116 boroughs were represented; the Tudor period saw the addition of two English counties with two members, and 12 Welsh counties with one member each, and more than 80 boroughs. It was not until Charles II's reign that the Palatinate of Durham first sent members to the House of Commons. The number of boroughs increased up to 1832, and in the interval 45 members had been added for Scotland, 100 for Ireland, and 5 for the universities. After many proposals for reform, the Reform Bills of 1832 and 1868 transferred members from many boroughs to the counties, and increased the representation of Scotland and Ireland. Further alterations were made in 1885 [and by the great Representation of the People Act of 1918, which for the first time extended the franchise to women. Since the creation of the Irish Free State in 1922 the total number of members of the House of Commons has been 615]. [REFORM BILLS.] In 1430 the county franchise was declared to belong only to 40s. freeholders; in 1707 a property qualification for members was required; but the former has been steadily enlarged since 1832, while the latter was abolished in 1858. [ELECTIONS.] The original theory of the representative system under which a member was a delegate from a particular place had always tended to be tacitly dropped in favour of the wider senatorial theory that each member represents the whole commons; and occasional endeavours in the fifteenth century to require from candidates residence as a qualification were fortunately never acted on. A greater necessity was to strengthen the independence of the House and make its representative character a reality by excluding lawyers (1372, 1404), maintainers (1350, etc.), and sheriffs (1372 and afterwards); but the "Undertakers" (q.v.) of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and the placemen of the eighteenth century, were not satisfactorily excluded till the rule established in 1707 disqualifying pension holders, and even obliging members appointed to office to seek re-election.

But the essential defect in the Commons as a representative House up to 1832 lay elsewhere. The representative system, which when first constituted in the thirteenth century was an honest reflex of the social state, failed to respond to the expansion of society; the villeins who were unfit for representation in 1295 had acquired practical independence before 1381; the boroughs which were worthy of representation at 1295 fell into decay as the centre of gravity of the population shifted from the south of England to the north. Thus the Commons of the sixteenth century had ceased to be a just representation of contemporary wealth and intelligence; yet reform was delayed till it was almost enforced by revolution, a pregnant lesson which statesmanship will do well to learn of history. Commonwealth, THE, a term formerly employed to signify the general weal, and the nation with its inhabitants, was specially adopted to designate the government which intervened between the death of Charles I in January 1649 and the establishment of Cromwell's Protectorate in December 1653, though it is used broadly for the whole period from 1649 to 1658. After the forcible ejection of certain of its members by Colonel Pride [PRIDE'S PURGE], December 6, 1648, the House of Commons consisted of 80 members. On February 6, 1649, seven days after the execution of Charles, this mutilated House resolved that the House of Peers ought to be abolished, and on the next day adopted a similar resolution with regard to the office of a king. These resolutions were afterwards enlodged in acts of parliament, and a further act passed enacting that the people of England and of all the dominions thereto belonging should be governed as a Commonwealth and free state (May 19, 1649); the executive was vested in a Council of State (q.v.) of forty-one members, re-elected by the parliament yearly. With the exception of three or four members, this council always consisted of members of parliament. The average attendance of the House was about fifty, and as the most active members of the council were also the most active members of parliament, it was the council which was mainly responsible for the policy of the government. There was no individual responsibility; all work being done by committees formed of members of the council, and of the parliament, and of both bodies united.

The republic rested entirely for its maintenance on the army. Yet amongst the mass of officers and soldiers no desire was felt for the continued existence of the present parliament. Before the execution of Charles a project drawn up by Ireton had been presented to parliament, demanding its speedy dissolution, and proposing the election of triennial parliaments, a reform of the electoral system, and a redistribution of seats. The parliament was, however, unwilling to decree its own dissolution, and the dangers with which the new government was surrounded justified its refusal to take the question into consideration. It had to face the hostility of the Presbyterian section of the Puritan party, as well as of old Royalists and Irish Catholics. Both in Ireland and Scotland the Prince of Wales was proclaimed king of the three countries. Prince Rupert ruled the Channel at the head of some revolted ships. Foreign princes refused to recognize the republic. Dangerous mutinies broke out amongst the Fifth-Monarchists and Levellers in the army. These, however, were quickly suppressed, by the energy and decision of Cromwell and Fairfax in dealing with the mutineers. An act was passed to restrain the press (September 20, 1649). An engagement to be true and faithful to the Commonwealth, as established without king or House of Lords, was required as a necessary preliminary to holding any office in Church or State (October 12), and by a subsequent act was rendered universal (January 2, 1650). In Ireland Cromwell in nine months brought the greater part of the country again into subjection to England. His great victories gained over the Scots at Dunbar (September 3, 1650) and Worcester (September 3, 1651) destroyed for the time all hope of a Presbyterian or Royalist reaction, and reduced Scotland to the condition of a subject province. A bill was introduced into parliament for the union of the two countries. An act was passed for the settlement of Ireland, which excepted from pardon all persons who had taken part in the massacre of 1643, and confiscated a large amount of land belonging to Irish Catholics (August 12, 1652). A further bill was brought in for the planting of Protestant families on the land thus confiscated.

In March 1649 the Council of State appointed Milton its secretary for foreign tongues. After the victory of Worcester, foreign princes, who before refused to recognize the republic, sought its friendship. During the two years in which Cromwell was reducing Ireland and Scotland, the Republicans in London had raised a formidable navy—Prince Rupert, driven by Admiral Blake from the mouth of the Tagus when he sought refuge, saw his fleet dispersed and destroyed in the Mediterranean (1649). Commercial jealousy led to the passing of the Navigation Act (October 9, 1651), intended to transfer the carrying trade of the Dutch to Englishmen, and in the ensuing summer to the opening of hostilities with the United Provinces. In an engagement off Dover the English under Blake were worsted by the Dutch under Van Tromp. In February 1653 the hostile fleets again engaged off Portland Isle, when the Dutch were defeated and driven for refuge into the Texel.

After the restoration of internal peace the question of the dissolution of the parliament again rose into prominence. Various acts had been passed by which the House sought to express its regard for religion and morality, but the chief reform demanded remained unexecuted, nor did it seem probable that the government, as at present constituted, would ever have the energy requisite for the attainment of practical results in the directions required. The reform of the law, a definite settlement with regard to the Church and the appointment of ministers, the termination of the system of sequestering the estates of former delinquents, and of governing by means of committees, appeared no nearer attainment than at the time of the institution of the Republic. The impracticability of compromise between the so-called Republicans, Vane, Ludlow, and others, who sought to maintain the existing form of government, and those who were indifferent to the form the government should assume, so long as the predominance of the Puritan party was assured, led to the sudden and forcible ejection of the members from their seats by Cromwell (April 19, 1653).

From this time Cromwell was practically at the head of the government, which was for the time carried on by a council of thirteen, including himself and eight other officers. In July, in answer to his summons, there met an assembly of 139 persons, known as the Little Parliament, or as Barebones' Parliament (q.v.), from the name of one of its members, a leather-seller—Barbon, a London anabaptist. It was representative of the reforming party, and was divided nearly equally between a more radical but small majority and a large, less radical, minority. It passed acts for the relief of debtors, for the registration of births, marriages, and deaths, and the institution of civil marriages. It also brought in bills affecting the Poor Laws and the administration of justice. It voted the abolition of the Court of Chancery. It further voted that the choice of ministers should be vested in their parishioners, and rejected by a majority of two the report of a committee in favour of the continuance of tithes. These votes on the Church question represented the triumphs of those who desired to effect the severance of Church and State. The minority, opposed to a voluntary system, took opportunity in the name of the parliament of resigning their authority to Cromwell. The officers of the army determined to restore the executive into the hands of a single person, and, on December 16, Cromwell was installed head of the government with the title of Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Commutation in English agrarian history is the process by which cash payments were substituted for labour services and payments in kind. The commutation of services naturally involved closer attention to the keeping of manorial accounts, and it is from the evidence furnished by these accounts that attempts have been made by modern historians to trace the growth of the practice. As early as the beginning of the twelfth century rent-paying tenants existed in numbers considerable enough to show that the process had begun, but for two centuries more labour services were still the rule in most parts of England except Kent and the north-west. Even before commutation took place, however, it was customary to assess labour services in monetary values. Thus the transition was accomplished on many estates with an ease which would not otherwise have been possible. In the fourteenth century money began to play a larger part in local economy, whilst simultaneously the ancient self-sufficiency of the manor was breaking down. It was often to the convenience of the villein to pay money rather than perform services, and where the supply of services was greater than strict economy required in the working of the lord's demesne lands, commutation of part at least of his labour dues would be to the lord's convenience also. As the practice developed, the obligation of the manorial tenant changed in many places gradually from the stage of customary servitude to a stage in which the proportion of services and money payments varied according to seasonal needs and the option of the lord, and finally to the stage of fixed rent and money payment for services. Boon works lingered after week-work had gone. The period to which the process in its fullest vigour can be ascribed has been the subject of controversy. It now seems evident that Thorold Rogers's original view that services had largely been commuted for rents before the Black Death must be abandoned. In the north, however, in the west, in Kent, and in parts of East Anglia, where the standard three-field manorial system had never taken deep root, labour services were the exception at a much earlier date. Elsewhere during the thirteenth century permanent commutation was making way in uneven patches and the process continued in the fourteenth. The Black Death hastened commutation in some districts by stimulating the survivors on the manors to raise their social level by commutation to one more in keeping with their improved economic position. Attempts on the part of the lord to thwart such endeavours played their part in provoking the discontent which found expression in the Peasants' Revolt of 1381. The process of commutation therefore continued with an increased impetus. By the middle of the fifteenth century labour services had fallen almost entirely into disuse. In the few manors where they remained, in whole or in part, commutation took place before the end of the sixteenth century. But even as late as 1707 the manor of Crondal was leased with all the works not arrented into money. [BLACK DEATH; MANOR, THE MEDIEVAL; VILLENAGE.] [A. V. J.]

Compounders, THE, were a section of the Jacobite party who wished for a restoration of the Stuarts, "but for a restoration accompanied by a general amnesty, and by guarantees for the security of the civil and ecclesiastical constitution of the realm." They obtained their name about 1692. The Compounders formed the main strength of the Jacobite party in England; but the more violent party or Non-Compounders were all-powerful at St. Germain's. Their leader at St. Germain's was the Earl of Middleton, who resigned in 1693. They were much offended by James's Declaration in 1692, and shortly afterwards recommended that James should resign in favour of his son, on his refusal to accept their conditions, part of which was the observance of the Test Oath. The remainder of their history is merged in that of the Jacobite party. [JACOBITES.]

Comprehension Bill, THE (1689), was a scheme for the relief of Protestant Dissenters proposed by the Earl of Nottingham. A measure of similar tendency had been advocated on the occasion of the enactment of the Test Act, but had been allowed to drop. Another proposal of similar tendency, a bill to relieve Protestant Dissenters from the penalties of the 35th of Elizabeth, suffered a similar fate in 1663. Nottingham's bill provided that (1) all ministers of the Established Church, and members of both universities, should be freed from the necessity of subscribing the Thirty-nine Articles on signing a declaration that they approved, and would support, "the doctrine, worship, and government of the Church of England"; (2) scrupled ceremonies, such as the wearing of a surplice, the sign of the cross in baptism, the admission of godfathers and godmothers to christening, and the reception of the Eucharist in a kneeling position, were left at discretion; (3) a Presbyterian minister might acquire all the privileges of a clergyman of the Church of England on submitting to the imposition of the hands of a bishop. This bill was mutilated in the Upper House, and a petition substituted that the king would call the houses of convocation "to be advised with in ecclesiastical matters." The Nonconformist clergy, themselves accustomed to independence, and disliking formal subscriptions of faith and compulsory uniformity, were not anxious for the passing of the measure; and accordingly the scheme of comprehension was allowed to fall absolutely and finally to the ground.

Compton, HENRY (1632-1713), was the youngest son of the Earl of Northampton. After studying at Oxford he entered the army, but soon after relinquished the military for the clerical profession. In 1669 he was made a canon of Christ Church; in 1674, Bishop of Oxford; and in 1675 was translated to London. He incurred the displeasure of James II by disregarding the royal order prohibiting controversial sermons, and was suspended from his episcopal functions. He joined Danby and others in inviting William of Orange to England, and took a leading part in the Revolution. He assisted in the coronation of William and Mary, but, being disappointed in his hopes of obtaining the archbishopric of Canterbury, from that time took little further part in public affairs.

Compton, SPENCER, EARL OF WILMINGTON (1673?-1743), a son of James, Earl of Northampton, was chosen Speaker of the House of Commons in 1715. He was a favourite of George II while Prince of Wales; and on the prince's accession he was commissioned to form a ministry (1727). Walpole, however, gained over the king by proposing to increase the civil list; and Queen Caroline's influence was employed in his favour. Compton could not even draw up the speech from the throne, and had to apply to his rival for assistance. He saw that his power was gone, and soon accepted the position of president of the council, with a peerage as Lord Wilmington. He gave lukewarm support to Walpole, and remained neutral when, in 1741, Sandys's motion that Walpole should be removed from the king's council was brought forward. On the fall of Walpole in January 1742, Pulteney, who refused the premiership, proposed Wilmington as first lord of the treasury and nominal head of the government. He retained most of the old ministers. The only incident in his brief administration was the committee of inquiry against Walpole [WALPOLE, SIR ROBERT].

Compurgation, or LAW-WAGER, was a mode of defence common to the laws of many of the barbarian tribes who overran the Roman Empire. It was a recognized part of Anglo-Saxon legal procedure. A man accused of an offence might clear himself by a formal denial of the charge, provided that he could support his denial by the oath of a certain number of other persons (compurgators). The number of compurgators required varied according to the heinousness of the offence, and the rank of the accused and the accuser; but in England it was commonly twelve. Compurgation persisted after the Norman Conquest. In the twelfth century it began to be regarded with disfavour, especially by the royal courts, but it was only gradually that it fell into disuse. In the later Middle Ages it continued to be used frequently in the manorial courts, in the borough courts—where it was particularly valued as an alternative to trial by battle—and in the ecclesiastical courts; while it lasted into modern times as a special peculiarity of the actions of Debt, Detinue and Account. The compurgators were not a jury, but "a body of sworn witnesses to character." The last instance of the use of compurgation in England occurred in 1824 (King v. Williams). It was finally abolished in 1833.

Comyn, JOHN, 3RD EARL OF BUCHAN, was a staunch adherent of Edward I. He was defeated by Bruce at Inverury (1308) and had his territory harried by the victorious troops. He died in England in the same year. His wife, Isabella Macduff, sister of the Earl of Fife, was a supporter of Robert Bruce, and crowned that king at Scone, March 27, 1306. For this she was imprisoned by Edward I in a cage at Berwick, as a warning to those who dared to support Bruce.

Comyn, JOHN, LORD OF BADENOCH, surnamed "the Black," married Marjory, sister of John Baliol. He was a man of vast wealth and influence, and, in the competition for the Scottish throne in 1291, put in a claim as a descendant of Donald Bane. He had been named a regent of the Maid of Norway, and, in 1289, was one of the Scots commissioners sent to Salisbury to confer about the marriage of the young queen to Prince Edward of England.

Comyn, JOHN, called "the Red" (d. 1306), was the son of John Comyn, of Badenoch, and Marjory, sister of John Baliol. In 1298, after the battle of Falkirk (q.v.), he was chosen one of the three guardians of Scotland. In 1302 he defeated the English troops at Roslin, while in the following year he made an unsuccessful attempt to relieve Stirling. In February 1304 he laid down his arms and submitted to Edward I, whom he is said to have counselled to put Bruce to death. Bruce met Comyn at the monastery of the Minorites, at Dumfries, charged him with treachery, and stabbed him, February 10, 1306. Bruce and Comyn were at this time the two rival claimants for Scotland—Comyn as the grandson of Devoiguilla, having the same claim which John Baliol had successfully established in 1292.

Conadh Cerr (d. 629) was the son of Eocha, who apparently resigned the kingdom of Dalriada in his favour, 627. In this year Conadh fought at the battle of Ardeorran in Ireland on the side of the Irish Dalriads; and two years later was defeated at another battle in Ireland, fighting against the Cruithnigh and his own father, who was now apparently king of the Galloway Picts.

Confirmatio Cartarum (1297) was the name given to an important document in which Edward I, under pressure from the barons led by the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk, and the clergy led by Archbishop Winchelsey, confirmed and extended the constitutional rights established in the two preceding reigns. It was obvious that the Great Charter, in the mutilated condition in which it had been left in 1225, was not sufficient guarantee against arbitrary taxation on the part of the king. Early in 1297 Edward, in sore need of funds for the war with France, and at odds with both clergy and baronage, seized the wool of the merchants; and a few months later he prevailed upon such of the barons and commons as were still in London to make him an irregular money grant. When the king had departed for Flanders at the end of August the earls appeared under arms in London. They drew up a series of new articles to be added to the Great Charter, and these the regent was obliged to concede; the king confirming his son's act at Ghent in November. The articles were seven in number:—(1) The charters are confirmed, and are to be kept in every point without breach. (2) Any judgment given henceforth contrary to the points of the charters aforesaid by the justices, or by any other royal ministers, to be undone, and holden for naught. (3) Copies of the charters are to be sent to the cathedral churches of the realm, and read twice a year to the people. (4) The bishops are to excommunicate all who break the charters. (5) The exactions by which the people have in former times been aggrieved are not to be a precedent for the future. (6) For no business henceforth will the Crown take such manner of aids, tasks, or prizes but by the common assent of the realm, and for the common profit thereof, saving the ancient aids and prizes due and accustomed. (7) Forasmuch as the commonalty of the realm have been sore grieved with the maltote on wools, the king undertakes that in future he will impose no such levy without their common assent and goodwill, saving to him and his heirs the custom of wools, skins, and leather granted before by the commonalty.—The confirmation of the charters may be held to have carried a stage farther the work begun at Runnymede. It was not, however, until the statute of 1340, which provided that the community "be not henceforth charged or grieved to make common aid or to sustain charge but by common assent of the prelates, earls, barons, and other great men and commons of the realm of England and that in parliament," that the principle of "no taxation without consent" was definitely established.

Congé d'Élire—"leave to elect"—is a Norman-French phrase, signifying the sovereign's permission for the dean and chapter of a vacant see to proceed to the election of a bishop. In pre-Norman times the bishops were, as a rule, appointed by the king in the witenagemot, though there occasionally occurred instances of an election more or less free—as in the case of Helmstan, Bishop of Winchester (839). After the Norman Conquest the election became by degrees canonical, though even then it was held in the king's chapel, or so much under his influence as to be little more than nominally free. The dispute about investiture between Henry I and Anselm ended in a compromise, by which the sovereign was to confer the temporal power, while the election was to be made by the chapter. In 1164 a clause in the Constitutions of Clarendon mentions the custom that elections to bishoprics should be "by the chief clergy of the Church, assembled in the king's chapel, with the assent of the king"; whilst, in 1214, John, by a special charter, made a grant to the chapters of free canonical election, reserving, however, to the king the right of licence and approval. This charter was confirmed by Magna Carta, and again in 1351 by Edward III; and in spite of various attempts at interference on the part of the pope the Crown as a rule managed to secure the appointment of its nominees. In 1534 an act of Henry VIII provided that with the congé d'élire the king was also to send the name of the person he wished to be elected; and that if the election were delayed beyond twenty days after the issuing of the royal licence, or if any other than the royal nominee were chosen, the dean and chapter should incur the penalties of Præmunire (q.v.). It was also provided that after a delay of twelve days on the part of the chapter the king might fill up the vacant see by letters patent. The method of this act still prevails in England. In Ireland, before the Irish Church Act of 1869, the nominations were made by letters patent. [BISHOP.]

Congregationalism. The Congregationalists who emerged in England in the sixteenth century found their charter in the words of Jesus: "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." The fundamental idea of Congregationalism is its conception of the church: a church is composed of those who, believing in the Lord Jesus Christ, join together for worship, fellowship, and service. Since Hort's time it has generally been admitted by New Testament scholars that the apostolic churches were congregational, and that "the very origin and fundamental nature of Ecclesia as a community of disciples renders it impossible that the principle should rightly become obsolete." A group of Christian believers, with Christ in the midst, needs no other authority, being independent of all other civil and ecclesiastical organizations, deriving its power from the living Lord. It was this principle that was rediscovered by the Elizabethan Separatists. The translation of the Bible into the vernacular would inevitably have led to the discovery, sooner or later, but it was accelerated by the experiences of many devoted Christians in the sixteenth century. During the Marian persecution many English Protestants fled abroad: there they not merely saw that some of the things previously deemed necessary to worship and to the right constitution of a church were indifferent, but their difficulties, especially at Frankfort, led to discussions in which Episcopalian, Presbyterian, and Congregational ways of thinking began to emerge. On the continent too they learnt of Anabaptism, a name which, because of the excesses of some who bore it, was held in horror by many, but now stands as representing pioneers of civil and religious liberty, especially in regard to the freedom of religion from control by the civil power. It was in England, however, that events paved the way for the establishment of churches of a congregational order. During Mary's reign the "secret meetings" of Protestants for worship—in houses, ships, fields, woods—revealed to them the fact that sacred buildings, ministers, sacraments, prayer books, were not absolute essentials for true worship. Whatever might be the penalty, they refused to forsake the assembling of themselves together; the result was that, in Dale's words, "When Elizabeth came to the throne the blessedness of those secret meetings for worship would not soon be forgotten. Devout men and women had learnt that in a small company of Christian people, united to each other by strong mutual affection and a common loyalty to Christ, it was possible to realize in a wonderful way the joy and strength of the communion of saints; and that such an assembly, though it had only a weaver or wheelwright for its minister, might have a vivid consciousness of access to God through Christ, and might receive surprising discoveries of the divine righteousness of love." So it came about, when it became clear that queen and parliament were not to proceed with the reformation of the Church, keeping many "remnants of popery," and not accepting Calvinistic discipline as they accepted Calvinistic doctrine, that the memory of the blessings received in the assemblies a few years before decided men and women to proceed with reformation "without tarrying for any." Life precedes literature, and in London, some fifteen years before Robert Browne set forth Congregational principles so clearly that he who runs may read and understand them, there were gatherings of Christians who not merely joined in worship and fellowship, but elected ministers, elders, and deacons, and administered discipline. It is one of these London congregations, whose minister, Richard Fitz, died in prison (probably in 1571), that has the best right to the priority (see Dr. Albert Peel's "The First Congregational Churches, 1567-71"). In 1582 Robert Browne published three little books which stated the vital principles of Congregationalism, setting out that "the Kingdom of God was not to be begun by whole parishes, but rather of the worthiest, be they never so few": from him came the name Brownist (q.v.), by which the Independents were known for several generations. A Cambridge man, who had become convinced of the truth of Congregationalism, he established a congregation in Norwich, but had soon to flee to Middelburg, and then to Scotland. The Presbyterians and the Puritans strictly so-called (those who desired merely to purify the Church from what they considered Roman corruptions, without proceeding to separation) were all opposed to Browne's teaching. He was imprisoned many times, and ultimately conformed, though even in his long period of conformity he seems to have had a local church group in his house. Elizabeth and her advisers, especially Archbishop Whitgift, were determined to stamp out Nonconformity; the queen, while claiming that she desired no windows to look into any man's conscience, insisted that all her people should attend their parish churches to show that they were true subjects. Drastic legislation in 1593—in which year Sir Walter Raleigh said in parliament (probably much exaggerating) that there were 20,000 Brownists in the country—resulted in the deaths of Henry Barrow, a lawyer, John Greenwood, a preacher, and John Penry, an heroic young Welshman, all of whom had attended Congregational worship in London. The result of ruthless suppression was to drive the Separatists into exile, and from 1593 onwards, especially in the Netherlands, little Congregational communities were to be found abroad. From one of these, the flock at Leyden, under the pastoral care of the saintly and broadminded John Robinson, came the Pilgrim Fathers, who, headed by their elder, William Brewster, crossed the Atlantic in the Mayflower in 1620, establishing the Plymouth plantation, with William Bradford as governor from 1621. They were speedily followed by thousands of other colonists, including men of education and good standing. While the settlers of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Newhaven were not Separatist, when they came to found their churches in the new land, they looked to Scripture for their model, and discovered that the resultant churches were much like those of the Plymouth pioneers. In America Congregationalism thus for a time became a state religion, the franchise being limited to church members, the civil power calling synods, and taxes being levied on all for the support of the ministry.

Congregational churches had meanwhile again made their appearance in England, imprisonment making no difference to those who believed that wherever they gathered together in faith Christ would be with them and give His blessing. Gradually men of influence in the country attached themselves to the churches, especially when Independency (the name seems to have been first used about 1640) began to have political significance. In the Westminster Assembly of Divines (q.v.) the "Dissenting brethren"—a little group of Independents—pressed their arguments with such earnestness that all thinking men were constrained to consider their positions, which they put forward both by voice and pen. The fortunes of war made Independency, under its "chief of men," Cromwell, the controlling force in the land. Milton also had Independent views, as had many others of the leaders of the parliament and army. Cromwell, however, was far ahead of his time, and he could not secure that general tolerance of religious opinions which he desired, though during the Commonwealth there was a wider tolerance than at any preceding period. With the Restoration, Independency of course lost its power, while the Act of Uniformity in 1662 removed from the Church of England 2,000 of its ablest ministers, of whom perhaps 500 were Congregationalists. Many of these found employment in teaching—often contrary to law—and one of the most inspiring chapters in the history of Congregationalism is to be found in the work done in the Dissenting academies for the training of ministers in England, and in the establishment of Harvard and Yale across the Atlantic. In 1689 came the Toleration Act (q.v.), when Nonconformist worship was allowed. Many buildings were erected, and in 1730 there were about 360 Congregational churches in England. Congregationalism suffered from the general decline in religion in the eighteenth century, being rescued from a long period of decay by the Evangelical revival, though probably the establishment of Sunday schools was a contributory cause. The Methodist movement helped to humanize the life and theology of Congregationalism, and the hymns of Charles Wesley, combined with those of the Congregationalists Watts and Doddridge, gave a new reality to worship.

The nineteenth century began with 800 Congregational churches, and also with a Missionary Society (the London) for whose foundation and enterprise these churches were in large measure responsible. During that century the denomination grew in members and in influence. It united with other Nonconformists in strenuous and successful campaigns for the removal of the civil and religious disabilities which rested upon them. It also saw the constant struggle to reconcile the contending claims of autonomy and connexionalism. So rigidly did local congregations, especially in England, construe their independence, that they were very suspicious of all attempts at co-operation or at the establishment of inter-congregational associations. After several counties had formed unions to aid the weaker churches in their areas, the Congregational Union of England and Wales was formed in 1831. These county and national—and, since 1891, international—councils have advisory powers only, but their influence has steadily increased, especially since the beginning of the present century. To get the full value of union and of efficient administration, and yet to retain the initiative and freedom that spring from the autonomy of each church, is the primary and continual problem of the Congregational churches. It is only as they possess the sense that every church is the One Church outcropping in a particular locality that the spirit is attained by which these apparently conflicting claims can be met. This sense the churches of the first century had in unique measure: it is a sine qua non of the existence and constant progress of Congregationalism.

Originally Calvinistic in doctrine, Congregationalists have no binding creed. At times, both in America and England (Savoy Conference, 1658, and also in 1833) they have issued declaratory statements of faith, but it is a fundamental conviction that Christians should be willing "to walk together in all God's ways, made known, or to be made known to men." This freedom from credal bonds gives power of adaptation to changing circumstances, and ability to express the eternal gospel in the language of successive periods. Congregationalism has made little impression on countries outside England and the United States. In the former there are to-day about 5,000 churches, and in the latter about 6,000. It ought not to be overlooked that many other bodies, especially the Baptists, have Congregational views in regard to the government of the church.

Coningsby, THOMAS, EARL (d. 1729), was member for Leominster during the reign of William III. He was "a busy and unscrupulous Whig." He accompanied the king to Ireland in the capacity of paymaster-general. On the departure of William to England he was created one of the lords justices. He superintended and signed the Treaty of Limerick. During the next six months, by his unprincipled rapacity, and by the favour he showed to Roman Catholics, he succeeded in alienating all classes, and was recalled. In 1701 we find him voting for the Resumption Bill, although he had received considerable grants of Irish land. "He was," says Macaulay, "an unprincipled man: he was insatiable of riches; and he was in a position in which riches were easily to be obtained by an unprincipled man." After the death of Queen Anne, Coningsby was created a peer of Great Britain (1719).

Connaught. The ancient kingdom of Connaught, originally called Olnegmacht, comprised, roughly speaking, the present counties of Galway, Mayo, Sligo, Roscommon, Leitrim, and Cavan, afterwards added to Ulster. According to tradition, when the Scoti established themselves in Ireland, their great chief, Tuathal (d. about A.D. 160) reigned over Munster, Leinster, and Olnegmacht, and in the great division of the country between his grandson Con, or Cond, "of the hundred battles," and the rival king, Mogh of Munster (whence came the terms Leith-Cuinn, "Con's half," for north Ireland, and Leith-Mogha, "Mogh's half," for south Ireland), the district now known as County Clare, which had originally belonged to Olnegmacht, was transferred to Munster. About this time the name of the kingdom was changed from Olnegmacht to Connaught. In the reign of King Laeghairé, Connaught was converted to Christianity by St. Patrick (about 433). In the time of the so-called Irish Pentarchy, Connaught was a fairly compact kingdom, owing allegiance to the Ard-Riagh, or chief monarch of Ireland, usually chosen from the kings of Meath. Its power was at its height in 561, when Fergus defeated the Ard-Riagh Diarmid at the battle of Sligo; but soon afterwards the kingdom split up into principalities, and continued through the Danish invasion, in which the nobles unpatriotically sided with the invader, though they afterwards changed sides and aided Brian Boru in winning the great battle of Clontarf (1014) (q.v.). Soon after this, the great sept of the O'Connors of Roscommon became prominent in Connaught, and began to wage civil war with the O'Neills of Ulster and the O'Briens of Munster. Turlogh O'Brien drove the reigning O'Connor from his kingdom in 1079, but Turlogh O'Connor overran the whole of Munster in 1118, and followed this up by taking Dublin. His son, Roderic O'Connor, claimed the title of Ard-Riagh of Ireland, and was crowned with great pomp in Dublin in 1166. Soon afterwards he drove Dermot Macmurrough, King of Leinster, from his kingdom, whereupon the latter sought help from Henry II of England, and the English invasion followed. Roderic, a man of indolent disposition, made little attempt at resistance, but did homage to Henry in 1175, when the sovereignty of Ireland was reserved to him with the exception of Dublin, Meath, Leinster, Waterford, and Dungarvan. His son, Cathal, pursued the same policy on John's visit to Ireland in 1210. Henry III, however, by a great breach of good faith, granted the country, in 1225, to Richard de Burgh, and after a terrible struggle he succeeded in holding his own against the O'Connors, who were, as usual, split up into several factions; and the sept was almost annihilated in the reign of Edward II, when Felim O'Connor joined Edward Bruce, and was defeated by his kinsman Rory, supported by the Burghs and Berminghams at Athenry (1316) (q.v.). About the middle of the century the Burghs of Connaught, the younger branch, threw off their allegiance to the English crown, and Connaught was divided between their leaders, while they changed their name at the same time to that of Burke. The race rapidly degenerated; they adopted Irish manners and intermarried freely with the O'Connors, in spite of the Statute of Kilkenny (1366) (q.v.). The power of the latter revived, so that by the commencement of the reign of Henry VIII they still claimed to be kings, and had extended their dominions to within twenty miles of Dublin. Their strength was, however, checked in the reign of Edward VI by Sir Edward Bellingham, who built a castle at Athlone to curb Connaught. In the reign of Elizabeth the Burkes suffered a sterner punishment; they had remained quiet during the Ulster and Munster insurrections, but at last, in 1576, when the hated Sir Nicholas Malby was appointed president of Connaught, they arose in rebellion. The whole of the country was in return laid waste by fire and sword, and the unfortunate race nearly exterminated in that and the following years. In 1566 Connaught ceased to be a kingdom, and was divided into counties by act of parliament. Clare, or Thomond, originally part of Connaught, was soon afterwards added to it again, but at the Restoration it once more became part of Munster. [BURKE; O'CONNOR.] In the reign of Charles I an Inquiry into Titles in Connaught was made at the instance of Wentworth, afterwards Lord Strafford, when lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The idea was first mooted in 1634, but was laid aside in order to conciliate the Irish parliament. As soon, however, as they had voted the necessary supplies, Charles broke his promise of making sixty years' possession a bar to the claims of the Crown, and, in 1635, issued a commission to inquire into defective titles in Connaught, wishing to dispossess the landlords and colonize the country on the plan which James I had pursued in Ulster. After the juries had been warned what the consequences of contumacy would be, the commission went to work, and soon declared that the lands of the Burkes about Athlone—in fact, nearly three-fourths of the province—belonged to the Crown. For this the foreman of the jury, Sir Lucas Dillon, was permitted to retain some of his own lands. In most cases the landlords had no title-deeds to show, and those who had were forced to pay large fines for their confirmation. In Galway alone the jury refused to find for the king; they were fined the sum of £4,000 each and imprisoned, when the sheriff, on whom a penalty of £1,000 was imposed, died. The Transplantation to Connaught was effected during the Protectorate. Cromwell determined, in 1653, to confine the Irish nation to the desolated province of Connaught, and declared that they must transplant themselves thither within seven months on the penalty of death. There they were to be enclosed by a cordon of soldiers, to whom a strip of land, a mile wide, running round the coast and the Shannon, was assigned. The population was now reduced by war and banishment to about 850,000, and for them 800,000 acres were set apart. By a summary process the estates of the Catholic gentry were confiscated, according to their degree of complicity in the Irish rebellion and their resistance to the Protectorate, in various proportions, from one- to two-thirds, which were handed over to adventurers and Parliamentary soldiers, while they were forced to accept an equivalent across the Shannon. After the appointed time had passed, an Irish gentleman was hanged for refusing to transplant, and several hundreds, with their families, were sent as slaves to Barbados. Many others were removed bodily, with what they could save of their possessions, to Connaught. The utmost severity was used in the process, noble ladies, for instance, being compelled to go on foot, and all being reduced to the greatest misery. Some of the sons of the banished owners wandered about their old estates, living by outlawry and the hospitality of their fathers' tenants. A sum of £20 was laid on the heads of these "Tories," in 1657, and their extermination decreed, together with that of two other "beasts," the wolf and the priest. After the Restoration an attempt was made (1661) to soften these conditions, the result of which was that it was declared that all Catholics who were innocent of rebellion should be restored to their estates. Those, however, who had accepted lands in Connaught were forced to abide by their bargains, and of those who returned from exile but few obtained any redress.

Conservators of the Peace,

THE, were the predecessors of our modern justices of the peace. Little is at present known of their history. Their origin is usually traced to the proclamation of Archbishop Hubert Walter in 1195 appointing knights to receive from everyone above fifteen years of age an oath to the effect that they would aid in the preservation of the peace in certain specified ways. These knights were to receive all persons arrested and hand them over to the sheriff. In the thirteenth century knights of the shire were frequently employed by the Crown in police and administrative work. In 1230 and 1252 men were appointed in each county to enforce watch and ward and the assize of arms. In 1264 Simon de Montfort appointed custodians to preserve the peace of the realm; and the precedent was followed by Edward I after the Civil War. In 1277 each sheriff was ordered to have a good man elected in full county court to attend especially to the conservation of the peace (custos pacis); and the enforcement of the Statute of Winchester in 1285 was entrusted to custodians or "conservatores." Under Edward II the office gradually took form, and immediately on the accession of Edward III statutory provision was made for the appointment of guardians of the peace in all counties (1 Ed. III, s. 2, c. 16). Next year they were empowered to punish all who resisted or disobeyed their orders (2 Ed. III, c. 6), and in 1330 (4 Ed. III, c. 2) their powers were still further enlarged to enable them to receive presentments, and to send those presented before the justices of jail delivery—the sheriffs being forbidden to release such persons by writ of mainprize, if they were not by law mainpernable. Finally in 1344 the persons assigned to keep the peace were empowered, together with "other wise and learned in the law," to hear and determine felonies and trespasses (18 Ed. III, st. 2, c. 2). In 1361 there were assigned in every county "one lord and with him three or four of the most worthy in the county with some learned in the law" to keep the peace, to arrest and imprison offenders, to imprison or take surety of suspected persons, and to hear and determine felonies and trespasses done in the county (34 Ed. III, c. 1); and in 1363 these were ordered to hold their sessions four times a year. It is generally held that it was after the statute of 1361 that the "keepers" first became known as "justices" of the peace; but it is probable that they might legitimately have been so described in 1344 or even earlier.

Consols is the usual abbreviation for the government stock, properly entitled Three per Cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities. It originated in the year 1751, when an act was passed consolidating several separate stocks bearing interest at 3 per cent. In 1787 the public debt was further consolidated by the union of the Aggregate, General, and South Sea Funds. By the act 56 Geo. III, c. 98 (1816), it was united with the Irish Government Fund. The National Debt (Conversion) Act of 1888 reduced the interest to 2½ per cent. and provided for a further reduction to 2¼ per cent., which took place in 1905. [NATIONAL DEBT.]

[ORSINI QUESTION.]

Constable (derived from the Latin comes stabuli, count of the stable) was originally an office in the Byzantine court. The name was borrowed by the Frankish kings; and in the Carolingian epoch a comes stabuli was at the head of the imperial stables, the marshals serving under him. In England the title is used in several different senses.

(1) It might be loosely applied to any high military command. Thus during the Norman and Angevin periods we hear of constables of castles, of garrisons, of troops, and even of ships; while the unit of the feudal host was the "constabularia" of ten men.

(2) The Lord High Constable first appears about the time of Stephen as one of the great household officers; and the first high constable who is at all prominent in history is Miles of Gloucester, one of the chief supporters of the Empress Matilda, who created him Earl of Hereford in 1141. The high constable may be considered to have succeeded to the duties of the officer who, before the Conquest, was known as "the staller"; he was "quartermaster-general of the court and army." From the "Dialogus de Scaccario" (q.v.) we learn that he was also, in the time of Henry II, one of the officers of the exchequer, where he helped the treasurer to check the accounts of the king's household servants. As was the case with the other great officers of the royal household, the office of lord high constable had, before the end of the reign of Henry II, become an hereditary dignity. It passed to the family of Bohun, through

Humphrey de Bohun, who married the daughter and heiress of Miles of Gloucester; and on the extinction of that line in 1372 it was held by Thomas of Woodstock (d. 1397), who married the heiress of the last Bohun, Earl of Hereford. With the accession of the house of Lancaster (1399), the office ceased to be hereditary. The Earl of Northumberland was made constable by Henry IV in 1399, but the office was taken from him in 1403 and given to the Duke of Bedford. Subsequently the Duke of Somerset was made constable in 1450, but there seem to have been considerable gaps between many of the appointments. The lord high constable, together with the marshal (q.v.) had by the time of Edward I acquired great powers in the management of the feudal army; he superintended the mustering, billeting, and formation of troops, took care that those who owed service by their tenure sent the proper number of men, and during the campaign held court for the trial of military offences. In 1297 Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, together with Bigod the marshal, refused to take charge of an army destined for Guienne, availing themselves of the legal quibble that they were only bound to serve when the king in person was present, and they gained their point. From this date also the judicial functions of the lord high constable became important; besides administering martial law, he was, with the marshal, whose functions are by no means distinct, the presiding officer of the Court of Chivalry (q.v.), and, as such, decided questions of honour and heraldry. These powers became considerably enlarged, and tended to encroach on the jurisdiction of the courts of common law, and were strictly limited in 1389. Edward IV, however, revived and increased the powers of the constable's court for the purpose of punishing the Lancastrians. Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester, was empowered to take cognizance of all cases of high treason, "to hear, examine, and conclude them, even summarily and plainly, without noise and show of judgment, on simple inspection of fact." Richard III bestowed the office on Henry Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, partly, perhaps, with the idea of making it hereditary once more, for Buckingham was descended from the Bohuns. His son Edward was appointed to act as constable at the coronation of Henry VIII in 1509, and in 1514 claimed the office as his by hereditary right, but his downfall and death ended the claim of the Staffords. Ever since, the office of lord high constable has only been conferred by the Crown pro hac vice, as at a coronation. The Duke of Wellington officiated in that capacity at the coronations of George IV, William IV, and Victoria.

(3) The Lord High Constable of Scotland can be traced back to the time of David I. In Scotland the duties of the office consisted in commanding the army while in the field, in the absence of the king, and, in conjunction with the marshal, judging all transgressions committed within a certain distance of the king's palace, known as the "chalmers of peace." In 1321, when Sir Gilbert Hay was made Earl of Errol, the office was made hereditary in his family. It was expressly reserved by the treaty of Union, and by act of parliament in 1747. It is now, however, purely honorary.

(4) The High and Petty Constables were in the Middle Ages the representatives and executive agents of the hundred and the townships respectively. It is probable that in their developed form they absorbed the older officials of their districts—viz., the reeve or headman of the hundred, and the head-boro or tithingman of the township. The first mention we have of them eo nomine is in a writ of Henry III (1252), which provides for the appointment in every vill of two constables, and in every hundred of one chief constable, to enforce the assize of arms and take cognizance of matters relating to the conservation of the peace. The Statute of Winchester (1285) ordered the selection in every hundred and franchise of two constables to make the view of armour, and to oversee the operation of the system of watch and ward; and these duties were enforced and enlarged by a series of enactments in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. With the decay of the older communities of township and hundred, and the development in the sixteenth century of new centralized institutions, the office of constable underwent important modifications. The right of appointment, which had originally vested in the hundred court, the town, or the leet, passed to the justices of the peace, whose executive agents the constables in effect became. Through them the hundred and vill were linked up with the activities of the new civil unit of the parish, which, in its turn, was subordinated to the organized control of the J.P.s. Thus by a process of adaptation the high and petty constables of the mediæval period were gradually and silently transformed into officials of a modern state. The high and petty constables continued to be the executive legal officers in the counties until the organization of a county police force between 1839 and 1859. The office of high constable was abolished by the High Constables Act of 1869, and that of petty constable, except in so far as it was incorporated in the county police system, by the Parish Constables Act of 1872.

(5) Special Constables are peace officers sworn in by the justices of the peace to act on special occasions, when the ordinary police force is thought to be inadequate. Their appointment is regulated by an act of 1831 (1 and 2 Wm. IV, c. 41), which was amended and supplemented in 1914 (4 and 5 Geo. V, c. 61) and 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V, c. 11).

Constance OF BRITTANY (d. 1201) was the daughter and heiress of Conan, Count of Brittany. She was married to Geoffrey, son of Henry II, by whom she had two children, Eleanor and Arthur. After Geoffrey's death, in 1186, she obtained the guardianship of her son and the government of the duchy, but was soon afterwards compelled to marry Ranulf, Earl of Chester, who made himself so hated in Brittany that on Henry II's death, in 1189, he was driven out, and Constance restored to power. In 1196 she was seized by a body of troops under her husband, and imprisoned for eighteen months; her conduct during this period in asserting the rights of the Bretons was most adverse to the interests of her son, in addition to which she had quarrelled with her powerful mother-in-law, Eleanor, as well as with her husband, from whom she obtained a divorce in 1199. She now married Guy, brother of the Viscount of Thouars, by whom she had three daughters, from the eldest of whom, Alix, sprang the Dukes of Brittany who played such an important part in the French wars of Edward III's reign.

Constance OF CASTILE (d. 1394) was the elder daughter of Pedro the Cruel of Castile. In 1371 she became the second wife of John of Gaunt, who inherited, through her, claims to the crown of Castile.

Constantine [MACFERGUS] (d. 820), expelled Conall, King of the Picts, and obtained the Pictish throne (789 ?), having in all probability authority over Dalriada also. In 796 some monks from Lindisfarne visited his court, and for them he is said to have founded the church of Dunkeld, which he made the religious centre of Scotland in place of Iona. The reign of Constantine is chiefly memorable as marking the date of the first historical attacks of the Norsemen on the British shores. It was in 793 that they harried the holy island of Lindisfarne, and a few years later seized upon the western islands, and slaughtered the monks of Iona. By these pirates, who henceforward for several centuries continued their ravages, nearly all communications between Ireland and Scotland were in time broken off.

A. B. Scott, "Pictish Nation," 1918.

Constantine (d. 879), son of Kenneth MacAlpine, succeeded his uncle Donald as King of Alban, 863. His reign is chiefly remarkable for a series of conflicts with the Norsemen, under Olaf the White, King of Dublin. Olaf's son, Thorstein the Red, is said to have conquered Caithness and Sunderland, "and more than half Scotland." When Fingall drove the Dubhgail out of Ireland, the latter invaded Scotland, and defeated the Scots king at Dollar and Inverdoret, at which last battle Constantine was killed.

Constantine (d. 952), son of Aedh, reigned over the kingdom of Alban, 900-43. He was a man of vigour and an experienced warrior. In 904 he cut to pieces in Strathearn an invading body of Danes, under Ivar. Soon afterwards at an ecclesiastical council held at Scone he seems to have united the Pictish and the Scottish Churches under the Bishop of St. Andrews, thus apparently ending the supremacy of Dunkeld, which had succeeded that of Iona. In 908 he procured the election of his brother Donald to the throne of Strathclyde, and in 918 joined the Northumbrians against the Norsemen, whose advance was checked by the allied armies at the battle of Corbridge-on-Tyne. Under the year 924 the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" tells us that amongst other nations the Scots chose Edward the Elder for father and lord. But these peaceful relations cannot have lasted very long, for in 933-4 we find Edward's successor, Athelstan, invading Scotland, and penetrating as far as Dunotter, and ravaging the coasts of Caithness with his fleet. Constantine, in retaliation, joined with the Norsemen and the Britons of Strathclyde in an attempt to wrest Northumbria from the English king, but the united forces were defeated at Brunanburh (q.v.), 937. In 942 or 943 Constantine resigned his crown, and became a monk in the monastery of St. Andrews, where he died in 952.

Constantius Chlorus, Cæsar of the West under Diocletian and Maximian (292-306), ruled over the provinces of Spain, Gaul, and Britain, and seems to have spent much of his time in this country. He defeated the pretender, Allectus (q.v.), in 296, and reunited Britain to the Empire. He died at York in the year 306. He was the father of Constantine by Helena, whom tradition describes as of British birth. Actually she seems to have been a Bithynian woman of humble origin.

Constitution, THE IRISH, OF 1782. In 1779 the Irish Volunteers (q.v.), whom the carelessness of the government and the undefined state of Ireland had allowed to become formidable, had succeeded in frightening the government into repealing the trade restrictions of the Revolutionary Settlement period. The movement was continued, and, under the direction of Grattan, aimed at legislative independence. In 1781 Lord Carlisle, the new viceroy, was instructed to resist all efforts at legislative independence, but nevertheless, notice was given of bills for the repeal of Poyning's Act (q.v.) and of the Mutiny Act. The repeal of the first, placing the Irish parliament more or less in the position of the English parliament, could not be resisted, and was carried in December 1781. The repeal of the Mutiny Act, however, was not carried, though moved by Grattan. When parliament again met, in February 1782, the Volunteers assumed a very threatening attitude, and the patriot party, backed by the resolutions of Dungannon, and aroused by the mention of Ireland in some unimportant acts passed in England, proceeded, through Grattan, on February 22, 1782, to move a sort of declaration of independence, but they were beaten by 137 to 68. But, though the resolutions were lost, the principle on which they were based had been admitted by everyone. The parliament was now adjourned, and when it met again, in March, the North ministry was overthrown, and the Whigs were in office. On April 17 Grattan was content to move an amendment in the address demanding complete independence, and the House then adjourned to wait for an answer from England. On May 17 resolutions were passed in the English parliament conceding the repeal of Poyning's Act and of the statute 9 George I and a biennial Mutiny Bill. On May 27 the Irish parliament received the news, and immediately voted £100,000 and 20,000 men for the war. Flood indeed attempted to declaim against England's concessions as insufficient, but failed, and the House resolved "that the right of legislation of the Irish parliament in all cases, internal and external, had been already asserted by Ireland, and fully admitted by England." The constitution of 1782 was thus conceded. But it made corruption on a large scale necessary, set up an anomalous relationship between the two kingdoms, and hastened the Union as achieved in 1800.

Constitutions of Clarendon. [CLARENDON.]

Consuls are persons empowered to take charge of the trading and commercial interests of British subjects in foreign towns. They were introduced in the sixteenth century, but it was not till the end of the seventeenth that it became customary to appoint them regularly. Their duties are to give advice and assistance to British traders; to settle their disputes where possible; to guard the legal rights of British subjects under foreign jurisdiction; and to report on the trade of the country in which they are resident. By the Consular Marriage Act (12 and 13 Vict., c. 68) (1849), consuls are empowered to celebrate marriages between British subjects resident in their district. They can take evidence on oath as to crimes committed on British ships, and are empowered to send home the offenders for trial; and they are also to exercise a general superintendence over British shipping, so as to see that the Merchant Shipping and other acts are not violated. In some cases British consuls are also diplomatic agents or chargés d'affaires, empowered to communicate with the foreign offices of the states in which they are stationed, and in this case they are called Consuls-General.

Conventicle Act, THE (1664), enacted that anyone over sixteen years of age present at an unlawful assembly or conventicle was to incur fine or imprisonment. A conventicle was defined as an assembly of more than four persons, besides the members of a family, met together for holding worship not according to the Church of England. In 1670 the act was amended, and the penalties greatly lessened, but a severe fine was imposed on anyone who lent his house for such meetings. The Conventicle Act was repealed by the Toleration Act of 1689.

Convention, THE (1689), is the name given to the parliament which met after the flight of James II to settle the succession. It met on January 22, 1689, on the authorization of an interim assembly summoned by William in December. It placed the administration and the disposal of the revenue in the hands of William of Orange pending the settlement of the kingdom. The Commons then proceeded to declare the throne vacant, and to vote that it was inconsistent with the safety of the kingdom that it should be governed by a popish king (January 25 and 26). The Lords, after much discussion, negatived the resolution that the throne was vacant, Danby's party asserting that the crown had, on James's abdication, devolved on Mary. Disputes thereupon broke out between the two Houses. After a conference the Lords yielded, and a resolution was passed that the Prince and Princess of Orange should be declared King and Queen of England. On February 12 the Declaration of Rights was drawn up, and next day the crown was tendered to and accepted by William and Mary jointly. As soon as the new monarchy was established, the question was broached whether the Convention should be turned into a parliament. A bill declaring the Convention a parliament passed the Lords, and after a sharp debate was accepted by the Commons. It contained a clause requiring members of both Houses to take the oaths to the new king and queen. The military and financial settlement of the kingdom was carried out by the parliament thus constituted, which also in December 1689 converted the Declaration into statutory form as the Bill of Rights (q.v.).

Convention Bill, THE, passed by the Irish parliament in 1793, declared the assemblage of persons calling themselves representatives of the nation, under any pretence whatsoever, illegal. Fitzgibbon carried it, in spite of the violent opposition of Grattan and the Duke of Leinster.

Convention of Estates, or CONVENTION PARLIAMENT, THE (1689), was the name given to the Scottish parliament which assembled on March 14, 1689, after the Revolution. On April 4 the Estates passed a resolution declaring that King James VII, "being a professed papist, did assume the regal power and acted as king without even taking the oath required by law, and hath by the advice of evil and wicked councillors invaded the fundamental constitution of this kingdom, and altered it from a legal limited monarchy to an arbitrary despotic power, and hath exercised the same to the subversion of the Protestant religion, and the violation of the laws and liberties of the nation, inverting all the ends of government, whereby he hath forfeited the right to the crown, and the throne is become vacant." On April 11 the Estates adopted the Claim of Right, which set forth the fundamental liberties of the kingdom of Scotland, that no papist could be King of Scotland, that the Scottish Church was Presbyterian, and finally declared that William and Mary were King and Queen of Scotland. Two days later (April 13) a number of resolutions, called the Articles of Grievances, were voted. Under this head were condemned the committee of the lords of the articles, the maintenance of a standing army in time of peace, and the marriage of the king or queen to a papist. These set forth a number of acts done under the authority of bad laws which the Estates desired to have repealed. The convention exercised the executive authority in Scotland till the crown had been duly offered to and accepted by William III, when it became a parliament.

Convention Parliament, THE (1660), is the name given to the assembly which established the Restoration of Charles II. It assembled April 25, 1660, on the authorization of the reconstituted Long Parliament, which dissolved itself on March 10. It immediately accepted the Declaration of Breda (q.v.), and passed the famous resolution to the effect that "according to the ancient and fundamental laws of the kingdom the government is and ought to be by king, lords, and commons." Charles was formally proclaimed on May 8 and entered London twenty-one days later. After his return the discussions of the convention turned chiefly upon the questions of the amnesty, the settlement of the claims of property which had changed hands, the settlement of the Church, the army, and the royal revenue. In regard to the first, an amnesty was voted for all but regicides and four others. In regard to the second, an act was passed restoring confiscated Crown and Church lands, but confirming in their possession those who had acquired Royalist lands by purchase during the interregnum. The army was disbanded, with the exception of a small bodyguard which Charles was allowed to retain. The Crown revenue was fixed at £1,200,000 a year, raised partly from tunnage and poundage, which was now granted to the king for life. After much discussion, the settlement of the Church was left open when the parliament was dissolved on December 29, 1660. In addition, the Convention Parliament re-enacted several of the more useful measures of the Commonwealth period. Among these were the Navigation Act of 1651 and the act abolishing military tenures (1656). The king received as compensation for the feudal incidents of which he was thus deprived, an annual payment of £100,000 raised by an excise on beer.

Convocation is the name given to the general assembly of the clergy of the kingdom. The organization of the Church gave its councils great importance in early times, and under the Norman kings this conciliar activity was still further developed. The Church had its synods of the nation, the province, and the diocese; they were attended by prelates, chapters, archdeacons, and the parochial clergy. In general history, these synods became important as clerical taxation was introduced. As this became customary, diocesan representatives were sent to the provincial convocations for the purpose of giving their assent to taxation. The first definite instance of representation in convocation is found under Archbishop Stephen Langton in 1225. In 1283 a rule was laid down that each bishop should summon to convocation two proctors of the clergy of his diocese and one proctor from each cathedral or collegiate church, who were to have full power of consenting to such measures as the community of the clergy might think fit. This was the constitution of the convocation of the province of Canterbury. That of the province of York, dating from 1279, contained two proctors from each archdeaconry. Besides these elected members were bishops, abbots, priors, deans, and archdeacons, as ex-officio members.

The jealousy between the two archbishops, and the difficulty in reconciling their claims, led, in the twelfth century, to quarrels. National Church councils became almost impossible, and ecclesiastical questions were discussed separately by the two convocations. Such matters as concerned ordinary discipline were decided for themselves. On other matters they presented petitions to the king, which were called gravamina.

When Edward I, in 1295, organized more completely the parliamentary representation of the several estates, he wished also to incorporate the clergy with the parliamentary system. For this purpose he summoned to parliament, by separate writs addressed to each bishop, the proctors of the chapters and the parochial clergy, together with bishops, deans, and archdeacons personally. Thus the convocations were summoned as spiritual councils of the archbishops, and the proctors were further summoned to parliament by the clause of the king's writ to the bishops, known, from its first word, as the "præmunientes" clause. In this way the two convocations were to be worked into the parliamentary system, while retaining their position as spiritual councils besides.

The clergy, however, showed great reluctance to enter into this arrangement. Probably they thought that they were sufficiently represented by the lords spiritual, and did not wish to be drawn into parliamentary disputes, in which their own privileges might suffer. The Crown in vain addressed letters to the archbishops urging them to compel the attendance of the clerical estate. After 1340 the Crown acquiesced in the rule that clerical taxes should be granted in convocation, and in the fifteenth century the attendance in parliament of clerical proctors died away. The duty of voting taxes led to the summons of convocation at the same time as parliament, but this was from motives of convenience, and did not affect the independence of convocation.

In the course of time the convocation became divided into two Houses. This arrangement, at first only occasional and for discussion of specific matters of business, became gradually permanent and a prolocutor was appointed to preside over the meetings of the Lower House. But the clergy never achieved any independence of the Upper House, beyond the right of a negative over all final decisions of that House, and the prolocutor was the deputy of the archbishop, not his equal.

In the weakness of the clergy before the royal power, convocation was used by Henry VIII to bring about the separation of the English Church from the Church of Rome. The clergy were informed that they had incurred the penalties of the Act of Præmunire by recognizing Wolsey's legatine authority, which had been recognized by the king himself. Iniquitous as was this penalty, the clergy were helpless against the king, and convocation, in 1530, assented to a large subsidy to appease the royal wrath. In the bill which granted it the royal supremacy was admitted, with the proviso "as far as Christ's law allows." The Act of Submission, 1533, practically abolished the legislative powers of convocation. It established that convocation "is, always has been, and ought to be, summoned by royal writ"; there was to be thenceforth no legislation without the king's licence, and a revision of the existing canon law was committed to a mixed commission of clergy and laity.

Henceforth, during the sixteenth century, the convocation of the province of Canterbury was recognized as expressing the opinions of the clergy, and worked with parliament in framing the formularies and laws of the Church. The Prayer Book and the Articles received the sanction of convocation before being submitted to parliament. In 1604 convocation drew up a new body of canons, which were sanctioned by the king, but were not ratified by parliament. These canons remain as the basis of ecclesiastical law for the clergy, but are not legally binding on clergy or laymen except where they incorporate previous laws.

After the Restoration convocation was summoned, in 1661, to revise the Prayer Book and remodel the canons. In this matter it did little; but this assembly is remarkable as being the last convocation which granted a clerical subsidy. During the Commonwealth the clergy had been taxed with the laity, and there seems to have been a general agreement that this method was more convenient. Accordingly, this clerical privilege was abolished by a private compact between Lord Chancellor Clarendon and Archbishop Sheldon. The important constitutional change was made without any parliamentary authority (1664). Convocation thenceforth ceased to grant taxes and to have any political importance. The clergy, being merged in the estate of the Commons, became electors for members of the Lower House.

In 1689 William III was desirous of extending the limits of the Church, and of introducing alterations which would allay the scruples of Dissenters. A commission was appointed to draw up a scheme which was to be submitted to convocation. Convocation sat in two Houses: the bishops in the Upper House, the other officials and proctors in the Lower. The struggle of parties took place over the election of a prolocutor, or president, of the Lower House, and those opposed to any change were in a considerable majority. After this the Lower House showed such decided difference of opinion from the Upper that nothing could be done, and convocation was soon prorogued. It was not summoned again for ten years (1700), when the differences between the Upper and Lower House were still more openly shown. [A long controversy raged between the two Houses in which the champions of the Lower House strove to maintain the independence of their House, arguing from a fanciful parallel between the two Houses of parliament and those of the convocation. Though beaten in the field of argument, the Lower clergy carried on a vigorous offensive against the bishops in the actual sessions of the convocation.] Finally, the Lower House refused to submit to the archbishop's prorogation, and adjourned by its own authority. The next convocation, in 1702, resumed the question of the archbishop's right of prorogation, and the conflict between the two Houses continued. At length, in 1717, the writings of Hoadly, Bishop of Bangor, excited great wrath amongst the clergy, and gave rise to what is known as the "Bangorian controversy." As it was clear that the Lower House of convocation would censure Hoadly, who was a favourite with the government, convocation was prorogued by royal writ, and was not again summoned for business till 1852. It is true that it met formally till 1741, when the Lower House agreed to admit the president's right of prorogation, but it refused to receive a communication from the Upper House. Being judged incorrigible, it was not again called together till its revival in 1852, a revival due to the increased interest in ecclesiastical affairs.

The convocations of the two provinces now meet with the sessions of parliament. They are summoned by a writ from the Crown to the archbishops. In the Upper House of each convocation sit the archbishop and bishops; in the Lower House, the deans, archdeacons, with proctors elected to represent the cathedral chapters and the beneficed clergy.

[M. C.] [N. S.]

[In December 1919, by the passing of the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act, the members of the two Houses of convocation of both provinces were incorporated in the constitution of the national assembly. In this assembly were to sit an Upper House composed of archbishops and diocesan bishops of both provinces, and a Lower House of Clergy, identical in personnel with the Lower Houses of the convocations of Canterbury and York, together with a House of Laity. The setting up of an assembly thus constituted, with power to prepare measures for the consideration of parliament, has inevitably affected the prestige of the convocations. None the less the convocations retain their authority as the provincial synods of the Church, whilst the national assembly exists to facilitate the dispatch of business between the Church and the parliament and would need reorganization if the Church were disestablished. In the procedure relating to the revision of the Prayer Book great care has been exercised to safeguard the rights of convocation. The proposals of the House of Bishops were presented to a joint synod of the convocation of both provinces sitting together, and the Lower Houses of Canterbury and York then separated for detailed consideration of and representation concerning the proposals laid before them. After the Lower Houses had presented their several representations, the bishops formulated their final proposals, and laid them before the Lower Houses of both provinces sitting together. The two convocations then voted on the question of placing the proposals before the national assembly. An affirmative vote was given, and the revised Prayer Book was duly submitted to the assembly. After being accepted, the Book was laid before parliament. Had it received the sanction of both Houses, it would have been again brought before the convocations for final synodical approval before being presented to the King.]

Conway, HENRY SEYMOUR (1721-95), was the second son of the 1st Lord Conway. After serving in the army, in 1741 he was returned to parliament for Higham Ferrers.

In 1757 he was appointed second in command of the Rochefort expedition, under Sir John Mordaunt. In 1761 he commanded the British troops in Germany, in the absence of the Marquis of Granby. At the end of George II's reign, Conway had been appointed groom of the bedchamber, and he was continued in that office by the new king, until his independent conduct and his opposition to the ministry on the question of general warrants cost him alike this post and all his military commands. On Rockingham's accession to power, Conway was appointed joint secretary of state with the Duke of Grafton, and leader of the House of Commons; and, unfortunately for himself, was persuaded by "his evil genius," Horace Walpole, to hold his ground, until he could no longer retreat with credit in 1768. During the later years of that period the policy of the cabinet towards the American colonies had been directly opposed to Conway's views. On the king's demand for Wilkes's exclusion from parliament, he "confessed that he had not the courage to face the consequences of a step which would make every second Englishman a rebel at heart, and convert London into a hostile capital." He accordingly resigned the seals, but acted as an unpaid member of the cabinet until the return of Lord Chatham and the resignation of Lord Camden, when he refused any longer "to provide respectability for the whole administration." When the Marquis of Granby was dismissed from the command of the army his place was offered to Conway, and declined. In 1772 he was appointed governor of Jersey. Ten years later he became commander-in-chief of all the forces. In the same year he brought forward a motion, praying that his majesty would terminate the war with the colonists. This was lost by only one vote; and when he brought forward the same motion a few months later he carried it against Lord North by a majority of nineteen. In the following year he retired into private life.

Conyers, SIR JOHN (fl. 1469). In 1469 the north of England was the scene of a series of risings. An insurrection took place in Yorkshire, apparently in the Lancastrian interest, led by Robert Hilyard, called Robin of Holderness. This rebellion was suppressed by Lord Montagu, and Hilyard was slain at York. In the meantime, Sir John Conyers, taking advantage of the discontent existing among the commons of the north, had adopted the name of Robin of Redesdale, and raised a force, estimated at 60,000 men. They published a manifesto charging the king with misgovernment, and demanding reform. This revolt was probably instigated by Warwick; it was certainly approved, supported, and made use of by Clarence and the Nevilles. The king's forces were defeated at Edgecote, near Banbury, the king's adherents, such as William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, Humphry Stafford, Lord Rivers, and others, seized and beheaded, and the king himself became the prisoner of the Archbishop of York, and was obliged to issue a general pardon.

Cook, CAPTAIN JAMES (1728-79), the famous navigator, first gained notoriety in Canada (where he did good service at the siege of Quebec, 1759), and subsequently surveyed the coast of Newfoundland. In 1768, being sent to the Pacific for the purpose of observing the transit of Venus, he discovered New Zealand and New South Wales (April 1770); and four years later made a second voyage of discovery, in which he again visited New Zealand. His conduct to the natives at first was such as to excite their hatred, but in his subsequent voyages he invariably followed a conciliatory policy. On Cook's third voyage, undertaken with the view of discovering a north-west passage to India (July 1776), he visited the Sandwich Islands, and pushed his explorations to the western coast of America. He was murdered as he was returning from this voyage by the natives of Hawaii, in Karakakoa Bay. Captain Cook's ability as a surveyor and explorer is the more noteworthy from the fact that he began life as a common sailor, and was entirely without education.

Cooke, SIR ANTHONY (1504-76), a man of great learning, was selected as preceptor to Edward VI when Prince of Wales. In 1553 he was committed to the Tower on suspicion of being concerned in the plot to put Lady Jane Grey on the throne. He was restored to favour, however, on the accession of Elizabeth.

Cooke, WILLIAM, in 1552 was made a judge of the Common Pleas. He is said to have been one of the witnesses to the will of Edward VI, altering the succession in favour of Lady Jane Grey; but there is some doubt as to whether he actually signed the document. He died in 1553.

Cooper, ANTHONY ASHLEY, 1ST EARL OF SHAFTESBURY (1621-83), was the son of John Cooper and Anne, daughter of Sir Anthony Ashley. He was educated at Oxford, and in 1640 entered parliament. At first he espoused the cause of the king, and on the outbreak of the Civil War he was placed in command of Weymouth, but being superseded in this office he went over to the Parliament, by whom he was placed in command of the forces in Dorset. He sat in the Barebones' and the first Protectorate parliaments, but subsequently had some quarrel with Cromwell, and was excluded from the parliament of 1656. He was a member of Richard Cromwell's parliament, and on the restoration of the Long Parliament he was made one of the council of state. He was one of the deputation sent over to The Hague to invite Charles II to return, and was elected to the Convention Parliament. In 1661 he was made chancellor of the exchequer and created Lord Ashley. In 1667 the Cabal ministry, of which he was a prominent member, was formed, and in 1672 he was made Earl of Shaftesbury and lord chancellor. All the wrong-doings of the Cabal ministry have been attributed to him, but it is now clearly proved that he had no share in advising the closing of the exchequer, while in foreign policy his wish seems to have been to preserve the Triple Alliance. The last lay lord chancellor, as a judge, he atoned for lack of knowledge of law by great impartiality and acumen. The passing of the Test Act occasioned the downfall of the Cabal administration in 1673, and Shaftesbury at once joined the opposition and commenced intrigues with Monmouth. In 1677 he brought himself into collision with the Crown on the question of the prorogation of parliament. He was in consequence sent to the Tower, and remained there for twelve months. The year 1678 is memorable for the pretended Popish Plot, of which Shaftesbury has been accused of being the inventor; and whether this be so or no, he was certainly one of the chief supporters of the violent attack upon the Catholics, and especially upon the Duke of York. In 1679 he was made president of the council, devised by Temple for carrying on the government, but only held office for six months, his strong support of the Exclusion Bill rendering him objectionable to the king. It was during this brief tenure of office that he got the Habeas Corpus Act (q.v.) passed, which was generally known at the time as Lord Shaftesbury's Act. In 1680 he made an attempt to impeach the Duke of York as a popish recusant, but he was foiled by the judges suddenly dismissing the grand jury. In 1681 he attended the Oxford Parliament with a large body of followers, many of whom were armed; and this violence, together with the palpable lies disseminated by Oates and other informers, did much to destroy his influence, and Charles committed him to the Tower. He was indicted for high treason, but the grand jury ignored the bill, and he was released. He now plotted with Sydney, Russell, and others to effect a change of government; but the conspiracy being discovered, he fled to Holland in November 1682, where he died two months later. Shaftesbury is the Achitophel of Dryden's satire, where he is thus described—

"For close designs and crooked counsels fit, Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit;
Restless, untired in principles and place,
In power displeased, impatient of disgrace."

Macaulay practically accepts Dryden's character, but Ranke considers that Shaftesbury

Cooper, ANTONY ASHLEY, 7TH EARL OF SHAFTESBURY (1803-85), was a direct descendant of the 1st earl. He entered parliament in 1826, and devoted his life to the amelioration of the condition of the lower classes, and several times carried through bills for their relief. [FACTORY LEGISLATION.]

Co-operation. The aim of co-operation may be said to be to enable workers to work "not in the interest of, nor in order to enrich, one individual, or a few, but in the interest of the general body of those who are concerned, both as workers and as consumers of the ordinary necessities of life" (Acland and Jones). The societies that have as yet been formed with this view are of three kinds. (1) The Distributive Societies, or Retail Stores. They sell goods for ready money only, and at the ordinary market prices. The profits at the end of every quarter are divided amongst the members according to the amount of their purchases. (2) The Wholesale Societies—one in England (founded in 1864), and one in Scotland (founded in 1868). They supply the retail stores with goods. Their managing committees are elected by the stores. (3) Manufacturing or Productive Societies and Federal Corn Mills. These societies, with some exceptions, are combined in a Co-operative Union, founded in 1869. It is the object of this union to abolish false dealing in any shape or form, and "to conciliate the conflicting interests of the capitalist, the worker, and the purchaser." The union holds an Annual National Congress, at which matters that concern co-operation are discussed—such as the best method of voting in societies, the check system, education, store management, surplus capital, co-operative journalism, etc.

"Co-operation," it has been said, "considers profit to belong to the public, and not to any one section of it, whether they are employed in selling goods over the counter, keeping the accounts, buying the goods, or making them." The co-operative movement is thus an effort on the part of labour to emancipate itself from the bondage of capital. This effort is seen assuming organic shape in the early part of last century, when several co-operative stores were founded in England and Scotland. These, however, on a close inspection, can in no way be distinguished from joint stock companies, for the profits were divided according to the capital invested. Of such societies there were by 1830 upwards of 200 in existence, besides co-operative mills. In 1844 the Rochdale Pioneers introduced its distinctive feature into the co-operative movement, and divided profits on the amount of purchases. The example set by this society, together with the beneficial legislation—such as the repeal of the Corn Laws, the Public Libraries Act, and the abolition of the Newspaper Duty—of the next dozen years, gave a new impetus to co-operation, and by 1862 we find 450 societies in existence, with a membership of 90,000, a capital of £450,000, annual sales £2,350,000, and profits £166,000. Two years afterwards the Co-operative Wholesale Society had sprung into existence, and became the mainstay of the whole system. In 1869 the National Co-operative Congresses began. It was at the first of these congresses that the Co-operative Union was formed, and its aim of reconciling the interests of the capitalist, the workers, and the purchaser, "through an equitable division among them of the fund, commonly known as profit, was soon after formulated."

[Great advances and many changes have occurred in the co-operative movement in the last quarter of a century. In the United Kingdom consumers' co-operation, as opposed to profit-sharing by producers, seems to have won the day. In 1923 the total membership of 1,314 retail distributing societies was 4,569,256. The sales reached a total of £165,000,000. The Co-operative Wholesale Society (springing from foundations laid in 1863), which is now one of the largest trading and manufacturing concerns in the world, is the biggest miller in the country, and in addition produces clothing, footwear, textiles, furniture, and a large number of domestic articles. To establish its position it has ventured to push its activities into the field of raw materials, and now owns thousands of acres of corn-land, tea-plantations, a cattle-market, and palm-kernel depots in West Africa. In 1923 it had 1,192 member societies and its wholesale distributive trade amounted to £66,000,000. The Co-operative Wholesale Society's Bank, which does business not only with the societies themselves, but also with trade unions and friendly societies, is run in the interests of its customers, who receive profits in the form of dividends on their balances. It has been compelled to proceed on conservative lines, and seems to have introduced no new principles. Producers' co-operation has had a less remarkable history. It has been very successful in the boot trade and in other industries where conditions have been exceptionally favourable. Large-scale organization seems to be difficult of achievement. Guild Socialists, who have taken the lessons to heart, have advocated producers' control of industry on a more complex basis, but so far little experimentation has been possible. An attempt to organize a producers' building organization on the Guild Socialist model in Birmingham failed to succeed through lack of working capital. Agricultural co-operation has made great advances in Ireland on the models provided by successful experiment in Denmark. This has largely been the result of the educational work undertaken by the Agricultural Organization Society (founded in 1894). Co-operative creameries manufacture butter and cheese from milk and cream supplied by their members, and market these and other products for them. Farmers' societies are organized for the purchase of agricultural requirements at wholesale prices. Farmers' co-operative societies in England have attempted the marketing of dairy products, but with little success, the wholesale trade being at present firmly controlled by combinations of retail suppliers.]

Coorg. A province of India on the Malabar coast, between Mysore and the sea. At the close of the eighteenth century the Raja of Coorg was practically an independent prince. He had been imprisoned by Tippoo on the annexation of his country, but had contrived to escape, and to wage a successful guerrilla warfare in the hills of his own country. The assistance which he rendered to Lord Cornwallis in the second Mysore War procured the recognition of the freedom of his country at the Peace of Seringapatam. He died in 1809, and was succeeded by his brother, who bequeathed the crown to his son, in 1820. This prince ruled so badly and with such ferocity and cruelty, while exhibiting great hostility to the English, that when, in 1832, his sister and her husband fled for their lives, and revealed his barbarities to the British resident at Mysore, the latter, after in vain remonstrating with the raja, proclaimed him a public enemy. In 1834, after a gallant resistance, Coorg was subdued and annexed to the Madras presidency. It is now one of the most prosperous of the Indian coffee-growing provinces.

Coote, Sir Eyre (1726-83), first saw service against the Jacobite insurgents in 1745. On the outbreak of the Seven Years' War, the hostilities, which had died out after the recall of Dupleix, were renewed in the Carnatic. General Count Lally was sent to India with a powerful fleet and army. At first he was successful: he captured Fort St. David, besieged Madras, and retook Arcot in 1758. The arrival of Admiral Pocock and the British fleet prevented an assault on Madras, and the next year Colonel Coote took the command. He recaptured Wandewash, and compelled Lally to fight a battle in the neighbourhood of the town, in which the French were completely routed. Coote, in 1760, gradually deprived Lally of all his conquests, and finally blockaded and captured Pondicherry, which was razed to the ground. In 1769 he was made commander-in-chief of the company's army, and the following year returned to England. The disasters of the British in 1780, during Warren Hastings's Mahratta War, rendered it necessary to send out General (now Sir) Eyre Coote, to take the command in Bengal. The news of Hyder Ali's invasion of the Carnatic induced Hastings to send Coote to Madras. In January 1781 he began his advance. Hyder had captured Arcot, and was besieging five other forts. Coote pushed on to Cuddalore and Porto Novo. Hyder resolved to risk an engagement, and took up a strong position, which he began to fortify. A long and arduous engagement ensued near Porto Novo (July 1, 1781), which lasted six hours, and at the end the British were completely victorious, with the loss of only 300 men, while Hyder, who had lost 10,000 men, was compelled to raise the siege of Trichinopoly. Seven weeks later Hyder was again completely routed at Parambakkam, August 27, 1781. Another victory, on September 27, allowed Coote to retire unmolested into winter quarters. In 1782 the arrival of the French fleet under Suffrein brought Hyder again into the field, and Coote in vain endeavoured to bring on a general action. The French were victorious everywhere, and Hyder ravaged the Carnatic to the very gates of Madras. In October Sir Eyre Coote's shattered constitution obliged him to return to Bengal, and surrender his command to General Stuart. In 1783, April 26, two days after his return to Madras, once more to undertake the conduct of the Mysore War, the veteran died.

Copenhagen, THE BATTLE OF, or Battle of the Baltic (April 2, 1801), resulted in the breaking up of the northern coalition against Great Britain, which had been one of Napoleon's most cherished schemes. After safely passing Kronberg Castle, Nelson persuaded Parker to commence the attack without delay. Two days were spent by Nelson in sounding the King's Channel, which lies between Copenhagen and a large shoal, and is only three-quarters of a mile broad. Along the land side of this channel the Danes had ranged nineteen ships and floating batteries. Everything being in readiness, Nelson made the signal for action early in the morning of April 2. The pilots entirely lost their presence of mind, and the Agamemnon, the second ship, went aground, as did the Bellona and the Russell. Nelson, in the Elephant, came next, and profiting by their example, took a new course, and so guided the rest of the fleet. The action began at ten o'clock. Riou, with the frigates, at once attacked the Crown Batteries, and gallantly maintained the unequal contest until he was killed. The battle raged for three hours without any apparent advantage being gained, and Sir Hyde Parker made the signal for recall. Nelson, affecting not to see it, continued the action, and about two o'clock the greater part of the Danish fire ceased. It was impossible, however, to take possession of the ships that struck, because they were protected by the batteries on shore. Nelson, wishing to save further bloodshed, sent ashore a flag of truce, saying that he must be allowed to take possession of the prizes, if only for the sake of the wounded men on board of them; and during the next day, Good Friday, the work still went on. The following days were spent by Nelson in maturing the negotiations, and on April 9 he succeeded in concluding an armistice for fourteen weeks, his object being to gain time to attack the Russians. The opportune death of the Tsar Paul rendered any active hostility with that country unnecessary, and the armistice resulted in a treaty between Great Britain and the northern powers.

Copenhagen, BOMBARDMENT OF (September 2, 1807). The British government had learnt in the summer of 1807 of the existence of certain secret articles in the Treaty of Tilsit (of July 7, 1807), between the Tsar and the Emperor Napoleon, by which the Danes and the other Baltic powers were to be induced or compelled to lend their fleet to the French for service against Britain. The danger appeared so imminent that the government determined to seize the Danish fleet, though Great Britain and Denmark were nominally at peace. Accordingly, twenty-seven ships of the line, with 20,000 men on board, under the command of Lord Cathcart and Admiral Gambier, sailed for the Baltic, passed the Sound, and anchored off the island of Zealand. The British commanders demanded that the Danish fleet should be given up to them to be held as a deposit till the end of the war. This the Danes refused. On August 16 the British troops disembarked and invested the town, and under the command of Sir Arther Wellesley fought a sharp engagement with the Danish at Kioje, whom they completely defeated. On September 2 the bombardment began, and was continued for three days, till eighteen hundred houses were destroyed, and the city was on fire in several places. On the 5th the Danes surrendered, and agreed to give up their fleet, which, accordingly, to the number of eighteen ships of the line, besides smaller vessels, was conveyed to England. The triumph, great as it was, was received with doubtful feelings in Great Britain, as the imminence of the danger to the country was hardly understood, and the affair looked like an arbitrary and dangerous violation of the rights of neutrals. After an animated debate in parliament both Houses supported the government by a majority of more than two to one.

Copenhagen Fields, MEETING IN (April 21, 1834). On the conviction of the Dorset labourers for administering illegal oaths, the labour unionists summoned a meeting in Copenhagen Fields, London, on April 21, with the object of overawing the ministry. A plan was also formed for the violent seizure of Lord Melbourne, the prime minister, and for other illegal acts. Due warning being, however, given to the government, preparations were made. Melbourne did not meet the deputation of the union; troops were held in readiness, the public offices defended with artillery, and 5,000 householders sworn in as special constables. Melbourne's under-secretary received the deputation, and informed them that it was illegal for a petition to be presented by 60,000 men. The crowd, seeing the preparations made to receive them, withdrew quietly, and no disturbance followed.

Copley, JOHN SINGLETON, BARON LYNDEHURST (1772-1863), was the son of the eminent painter, John Singleton Copley. He was born at Boston in America, then an English town, and educated in England, at first by a private tutor, and afterwards at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, 1804; was made serjeant-at-law, 1813; and first became prominent from the ability he displayed as one of the counsel who defended Watson and Thistlewood on the charge of high treason, 1817. He entered parliament as member for Yarmouth, Isle of Wight, 1818, having in the same year become king's serjeant and chief justice of Chester. He afterwards sat for Ashburton and the University of Cambridge. He was soon looked on as the most rising lawyer of the Tory party, and, a convenient opportunity presenting itself by the removal of Sir Robert Gifford to the attorney-generalship, Copley was appointed solicitor-general (1819) and knighted. While holding this office he was engaged for the Crown in two memorable cases; the trial at the Old Bailey of the Cato Street conspirators and their ringleader, his former client Thistlewood, and the proceedings against Queen Caroline in the House of Lords (1820). In both affairs Sir John Copley displayed remarkable eloquence, judgment, and forbearance. He became attorney-general in 1824, and master of the rolls in 1826. He at first energetically opposed the Catholic claims, but afterwards sided with those who felt the absolute necessity of Catholic emancipation being carried. He took office in the cabinet formed by Canning in 1827. He was appointed lord chancellor for the first time (April 20, 1827), and created Baron Lyndhurst on the 25th of the same month. When his party went out of office in 1830 he retired with them, but was appointed lord chief baron of the exchequer early in 1831. In the House of Lords he opposed the Reform Bill with all his energies and eloquence, and was the virtual leader of the Tory opposition. He declared the measure to be detrimental to the rights of the peoples, and inconsistent with the prerogatives of the Crown. He again took office as lord chancellor, under Sir Robert Peel, in 1834, and retired in 1835. In 1841 Sir Robert Peel again returned to power, and Lord Lyndhurst held the chancellorship for the third time. He finally resigned in 1846. He continued none the less to take an active part in the debates of the House of Lords.

Copyhold is a species of customary tenure which had its origin in villenage. [The early copyholder received his name because the terms of his tenancy were set down in a copy (which he held) of the court roll of his manor. He was originally a tenant at the will of his lord, a position which might be regarded as singularly precarious, but he was protected by the qualification that he held "by copy of court roll according to the custom of the manor." Even so, where local custom was against him (e.g., where it was not customary for copyhold to be for life or lives, or by inheritance) the tenant had no redress on eviction. The historical evolution of copyhold tenure has for long been an obscure subject, but modern investigations have traced its emergence from tenure by villenage. During the period of manorial transformation in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, of which commutation of labour services for money rents is one of the most interesting features, and the Black Death and the Statutes of Labourers the important events, the semi-servile labouring tenant was becoming a copyholder. With the progress of commutation, dues became more clearly defined in numerical terms. Confirmation could be obtained by reference to the manorial rolls instead of to tradition, and, according as local custom varied, the copyholder (the conditions of whose tenure still bore signs of its servile origin) held his land for a term of years or of lives or by inheritance in his family. As villeins, his ancestors could make no appeal against unfair treatment to the Common Law courts. Similarly the copyholder had no protection against the lord of the manor, such as one whose tenure was free could claim. But the courts of Chancery, of Star Chamber, and of Requests acted in the sixteenth century in defence of the persecuted customary tenant, if, on petition to them, he could prove that the lord was acting in defiance of manorial custom. In those localities where inheritance was an established custom the sixteenth-century tenant found himself in a favourable position, as prices rose while rents could not be raised against him. But his less fortunate neighbours, whose leases might be only for a limited number of years, were subject to the prevailing policy of rack-renting by which the landlords sought to compensate themselves for their increased charges. Even copyhold by inheritance was discovered to be vulnerable where no customary limit was placed upon the fine which was levied on the occasion of the tenant's death or on alienation. Contemporary literature is full of references to the indignation caused by attempts made by landlords to recoup themselves for the lost unearned increment when such opportunities presented themselves, and Mr. Tawney's inquiries have shown that in certain groups of manors there is "a steady upward movement" in the fines levied "during the third and fourth decades of the century of a little over 100 per cent., a rather less rapid rise between 1549 and 1559, and another rise of 100 per cent. between 1559 and 1569. . . . The advantage of a fixed rent is in fact neutralized by the movable fine."

In the sixteenth century the copyholders not only comprised the preponderating section of customary tenants in England, but they formed the principal body of landholders in the country. No doubt the constant pressure on the part of landlords on many estates to convert their tenants' copyhold into socage or leasehold had a considerable effect in reducing the area under copyhold, but at the beginning of the seventeenth century Coke could still say that the third part of England was held under this species of tenure. Common law made certain advances in the regulation of copyhold tenure, and certain generalizations came to be made; but whilst with the passage of time the copyholder made a practical advance in the direction of free ownership, the fact that the fee simple remained with the lord of the manor left the tenant subject to various technical and often vexatious restrictions, and as long ago as the end of the seventeenth century Roger North proposed the abolition of copyhold.] Though the copyholder is independent of the will of the lord, yet the freehold being in the lord subjects the former to some disadvantages. For the lord has a right to the minerals beneath and the timber upon the soil, though he cannot, unless the custom of the manor allow, come on the land to exercise these rights without the copyholder's leave. There are species of tenure, such as customary freeholds, which resemble copyhold. All questions as to the freehold in any such tenures should be decided by ascertaining "whether the well-known rights of freeholders, such as to cut timber and dig mines, are vested in the lord or in the tenant." It is in the power of copyholders freely to alienate their lands. In the process of alienation the old character of the tenure becomes apparent, for it is effected by first of all surrendering the property to the lord, or, instead of him, to his steward, and is completed by the admission of the new tenant. Other incidents may pertain to it, according to the custom of the manor. [The heriot on the death of the tenant remained as an incident of the tenure, and there has been one famous instance of the lord's claim to heriot in the shape of a race-horse worth £2,000 to £3,000.] By the Copyhold Acts (15 and 16 Vict., c. 51, s. 7, and 21 and 22 Vict., c. 94, s. 21), the tenant or the lord, by making application to the Copyhold Commissioners, could secure a compulsory enfranchisement of copyhold upon equitable terms. [The Law of Property Act, 1922, made provision for the conversion of all remaining copyhold land into freehold on New Year's Day, 1926. Certain privileges of common, etc., and obligations attaching to the customary tenure were to be preserved. The lord lost his right to escheat.] [LAND TENURE; COMMON LANDS, OPEN FIELDS, AND ENCLOSURE; COMMUTATION.]

Copyright Acts. The first of these was 8 Anne, c. 19, which gave an author the copyright of his works for fourteen years, with extension, if he or his representative were living, for a further term of fourteen years. By the decision of the House of Lords in 1774 (in case of Donaldson v. Beckett), this statute was held to have done away with any common-law right which the author might have in his work beyond the prescribed term of years. By the act 54 Geo. III, c. 146, the author was granted copyright for the term of twenty-eight years, and for the residue of his life should he live beyond that period. By the act of 1842 (5 and 6 Vict., c. 45), the copyright of a book was to endure for the life of the author, and for seven years afterwards. If this term expired within forty-two years of the first publication, the copyright of the author or his assignees was to be extended to that term of years. Copies of all books were to be deposited in the library of the British Museum, and, if required, in the Bodleian Library, in the libraries of Cambridge University, Trinity College, Dublin, and of the Faculty of Advocates, Edinburgh. Dramatic, artistic, and musical copyright has been protected by 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 15, 8 Geo. II, c. 13, 38 Geo. III, c. 71, and 5 and 6 Vict., c. 45. Under the Musical Copyright Act, 1906, the printing or selling of pirated music was made punishable. Copyright law now depends mainly on the Copyright Act of 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V, c. 46), which defines its subject as "the sole right to produce or reproduce the work or any substantial part thereof in any form whatsoever." Copyright lasts for fifty years after the death of the author.

Corbeil, WILLIAM OF, Archbishop of Canterbury (1123-36), was an Augustinian canon, who at the instance of the Bishop of London became prior of St. Osyth's (Chieh) in Essex. On the death of Archbishop Ralph in 1122, a contest arose between the regulars and seculars as to whether his successor should be a monk or a clerk. In the end the parties compromised by electing Prior William, who, as a canon regular, might be regarded as occupying an intermediate position. The quarrel between the sees of Canterbury and York continued during his primacy, and to establish his supremacy William got himself appointed papal legate. His appointment was the precedent for the later custom of making the Archbishop of Canterbury the "legatus natus" of the Roman see. He was zealous in enforcing the celibacy of the clergy, and after Henry's death supported the claims of Stephen to the throne. He appears to have been a weak and somewhat ineffective man, in whose character even his panegyrist could find little to commend.

Cork was built in the sixth century, and was in ancient times the principality of the McCarthys. In 1172 it received a garrison from Henry II, who also, in 1185, granted a charter to the town. In 1492 the citizens were conspicuous as supporters of Perkin Warbeck (q.v.). Later it was taken by Cromwell (1649) and Marlborough (1690). In 1849 one of the Queen's Colleges was established in the city.

M. F. Cusack, "History of Cork," 1875.

Cork, RICHARD BOYLE, 1ST EARL OF (1566-1643). [BOYLE.]

Corn Laws is the name generally given to the various acts of parliament regulating the exportation and importation of grain, and especially wheat. They have been passed with two objects, which have prevailed to a different extent at different times: to secure a plentiful supply of cheap corn at home, and to keep up the price of corn produced in England. There have also been laws to regulate the traffic in corn by the corn dealers, and to prevent the practices called engrossing, forestalling, and regrating.

[In the Middle Ages "the idea that British corn might be cheapened by bringing the granaries of Europe into competition with home supplies had either not suggested itself, or been rejected as impracticable." There was, in fact, no restriction on imports; and it was in the interests of the consumer, too, that export of corn was prohibited except under royal licence, although consideration of revenue may not have been without weight. During the fifteenth century it was lawful to export corn without licence when the prices were below a certain figure, and in 1463 importation of wheat was prohibited when the price did not exceed 6s. 8d. per quarter; other grain imports were regulated at proportionate rates. This was the beginning of a policy of moderate protection for producers which was employed side by side with a policy of consumer's protection until the Restoration, when the agricultural interest began to exert a stronger influence on legislation. The corn-law policy of the Tudors is difficult to follow by strict attention to statutory enactments. On the whole it may be said that the government was anxious to export corn, but that it took care that the statutory price, below which such exportation should be allowed, should be low enough to necessitate the application for a licence and the payment of a fee for exemption. The statutory limitations when compared with current prices suggest the conclusion that a great deal of the Tudor corn trade was undertaken with licensed exemption. Corn importation on a small scale proceeded with fair regularity, unhampered by restriction, for the rise in prices brought the average above the minimum established by the act of 1463 (repealed in 1624). From 1660 the national corn law policy became much more definite. Acts of 1660 and 1663 minutely regulated both export and import of wheat, rye, oats, barley, malt, peas, and beans. Under the second of these acts wheat might be sent abroad when the price was below 48s. It might also be imported, but a duty of 2s. per quarter was charged when the price was below 48s. An act of 1670 "for the Improvement of Tillage" added considerably to the import duties, when the price did not exceed 53s. 4d.]

An entirely new system was adopted on the accession of William III. In the supposed interests of agriculture and of the landowners, the exportation of corn was not only permitted, but encouraged by bounties. This legislation [which followed a tentative experiment on similar lines already tried in 1673] did not have the effect which was expected, and the price of corn continued to be very low. When, after the Peace of Paris, in 1763, the commerce and manufactures of the kingdom largely increased, and when the increase was coincident with a growth of population, the export of corn diminished, and the restrictions on imports were felt as a hardship. This led to Burke's act of 1773, by which foreign wheat was allowed to be imported at a nominal duty of 6d. whenever the home price was at or above 48s. a quarter, and the bounty and the exportation were together to cease when the price was at or above 44s. Corn might be imported, at any price, duty free, in order to be again exported. This act led to a large importation of corn, which did no injury to the agricultural interests, but only served to maintain the increasing manufacturing population. At this time, also, large quantities of waste land were taken into cultivation, without any fall of agricultural prices. In 1791, under the pressure of the landed interest, the law of 1773 was repealed, and there was substituted for it an arrangement by which a limit of 54s. for importation, at 6d. a quarter, was substituted for 46s.; between 54s. and 50s. there was a middle duty of 2s. 6d. a quarter, and below 50s. a prohibitive duty. [A modified and slightly preferential rating was adopted for Ireland and the colonies.] The bounty was continued as before, and exportation without bounty was allowed to 46s. [The effect of the Revolutionary Wars was to send up prices and produce a condition of scarcity which almost amounted at times to famine. At one moment wheat reached the panic price of 155s. per quarter. The peculiar conditions of war compelled the government to suspend the operations of its corn-law policy, and for a time bounties were actually offered on imports. After the fall of Napoleon the laws were made frankly protective. In 1814 all restrictions on export disappeared; and by the act of 1815, although no duties were charged on incoming corn, the limit of the price for importation was fixed at 80s. [for foreign wheat, 33s. for barley, and 22s. for oats]. It was hoped that this regulation would maintain the price of wheat at about the same standard; but still greater fluctuations followed. The effect of this legislation was to raise the price of corn very largely, and to force a wide extent of land into arable cultivation which was not suited for it. Another act was passed in 1822, intended to lessen the disastrous effects of the act of 1815; but it never came into operation. The attempt to regulate the price of corn by act of parliament was so disastrous that the council was authorized to issue orders to suspend the operation of the acts, and to permit the importation of foreign corn under circumstances of necessity. This fact, with others, gradually convinced agriculturists that the Corn Laws were based on a mistaken principle; and in 1827 Canning carried resolutions in the House of Commons pointing to a more liberal policy. A bill, founded on these resolutions, passed the Lower House; but, owing to the change of ministry and the opposition of the Duke of Wellington, the bill was given up. Charles Grant, in 1828, carried resolutions similar to those of Canning, and they eventually became law. The grievance of the Corn Laws was always found to vary with the prosperity of the seasons, and the bad seasons which followed each other from 1837 to 1842 gave rise to the agitation by which the Corn Laws were abolished altogether. In 1842 a measure was introduced by Sir Robert Peel which still maintained the vicious principle of a sliding-scale of duties, although the scale was less onerous than those which preceded it. This did not diminish the agitation for the repeal of the Corn Laws, and the argument of the repealers was strengthened by the fact that the alteration of the tariff in 1842 which allowed the importation of live cattle and fresh provisions, did not affect the price of these articles to the disastrous extent which had been anticipated by the agriculturists. In 1843 the principle of the Corn Laws was virtually abandoned, by allowing corn to be imported from Canada at a very small duty. It was now possible to import corn from America through Canada, and therefore there seemed to be no reason why direct importation from America should not be allowed. In his budget of 1845 Sir R. Peel abolished the duties on 430 articles out of 813 then taxed. This was a virtual abandonment of the principle of protection. In the same year the harvest was very bad, and the potato crop in Ireland failed entirely. It was then impossible to avoid the temporary suspension of the Corn Laws, and it was a question whether it was not better to abolish them altogether. The country was deluged with the free trade tracts of the Anti-Corn-Law League. Sir Robert Peel was convinced that protection was no longer tenable; but his cabinet would not follow him. Lord Stanley resigned, and the ministry broke up. Lord John Russell was unable to form a cabinet, and Peel was induced to take office again. It was known that he would meet parliament in 1846 pledged to support the cause of free trade. The agitation for the repeal of the Corn Laws had begun in Manchester towards the end of 1836. In a season of financial pressure, it appeared to some of the most influential manufacturers of that thriving town that the only remedy for the evil lay in free trade, and that by artificially keeping up the price of corn the manufacturing interests of the country were sacrificed to the supposed benefit of the agricultural interests. The year afterwards the Anti-Corn-Law League was formed. Among its most prominent members from the first were Cobden and Bright, who in a great measure sacrificed their worldly prosperity to the work of converting their countrymen to their principles. Large sums of money were collected for the purposes of the league. The Free Trade Hall was built in Manchester. In 1843 the Lords acknowledged that the league was a great fact; it was compared in debate to the wooden horse by which the Greeks were secretly brought into Troy. At the end of 1845 it was stronger than ever in men, money, and enthusiasm. When parliament assembled in 1846 the Queen's Speech and the address in reply to it gave indication of the coming change. Sir Robert Peel rose immediately afterwards, and avowed honestly the alteration in his opinion. He said that he had observed during the last three years (1) that wages do not vary with the price of food, and that with high prices we do not necessarily have high wages; (2) that employment, high wages, and abundance contribute directly to the diminution of crime; (3) that by the gradual removal of protection, industry had been promoted and morality improved. Disraeli took the opportunity of violently assailing the minister for his change of opinion. In February Peel announced a fixed duty on corn for three years, and after that its entire abolition. The free traders attempted to get rid of this delay; but they were beaten by a large majority, and the bill passed. There was a fear lest it might be rejected in the House of Lords, but the Duke of Wellington secured its passing. [From June 1846 to January 1849 the duties of imported wheat were very moderate. For the next twenty years a registration duty of 1s. only remained and then this too was abolished.] In 1902, owing to a heavy deficit on account of the South African War, a Registration Duty of 3d. per cwt. on imported corn was imposed, and of

5d. on imported flour, but the duty was abolished in the following year.

Cornavil, or CORNUILL, THE, were an ancient British tribe, inhabiting, it has been conjectured, an area roughly corresponding to the modern counties of Warwick, Worcester, Stafford, Salop, and Chester. Rhys considered them to belong to the Brythonic, and not the Goidelic, stock. [CELTs.]

Cornbury, EDWARD HYDE, VISCOUNT (1661-1724). [HYDE.]

Cornelis, THE CAPTURE OF (August 1811), was effected during the war of the French Revolution. Cornelis, in Java, was an entrenched camp between two rivers, one of which was not fordable, while the other was defended by extremely formidable redoubts and batteries. It was resolved to carry it by a coup de main, and Colonel Robert Gillespie was selected for that purpose. On August 26 his column reached the redoubt at dawn, and, feeling that delay would be dangerous, he did not wait for his rear division, but attacked at once, and carried the redoubt with the bayonet. Seizing the bridge, he attacked and captured a second redoubt, and with his full force vigorously assaulted the enemy's reserve, which was posted with powerful artillery in front of the barracks and lesser fort. They broke and fled, and the place fell into the hands of the British. [AUCHMUTY.]

Cornwallis, CHARLES, 1ST MARQUIS (1738-1805), entered the army at an early age, and served under the Marquis of Granby in 1758. He entered parliament for Eye, and was appointed constable of the Tower in 1770. He served in the American War of Independence, and won much distinction at the battle of Brandywine and the siege of Charleston. He was appointed to the command of the British forces in South Carolina, and in 1780 won the victory of Camden over Gates, the following year defeating Greene at Guilford Court House. In 1781, blockaded at Yorktown by the American army and the French fleet, he was forced to surrender. A violent controversy took place on his return, between Cornwallis and Sir Henry Clinton, as to the party deserving of blame for the disaster. In 1786 he went to India as governor-general, and commander-in-chief of the Bengal army. His administration lasted from 1786 to 1793, and is remarkable for the Mysore War; the arrangements with Oudh, Arcot, and the Nizam; the negotiations with Sindhia and the Mahrattas; the Permanent Settlement; and a series of important judicial and revenue reforms. In 1790 Tippoo's attack on Travancore caused Lord Cornwallis to conclude the Triple Alliance with the Mahrattas and the Nizam, and the campaign began on the Malabar and Coromandel coasts. In 1791 Lord Cornwallis determined to take the command himself, and marched straight to Bangalore, which he captured March 21. Tippoo had hastened back to defend his capital. The Nizam's force and the Mahrattas were wasting their time in sieges in the north. On May 13, 1791, was fought the battle of Arikeri, in which Tippoo was beaten. In March 1792 the Treaty of Seringapatam (q.v.) was signed, ending the war, and leaving Tippoo with reduced territory and prestige. As an administrator, Lord Cornwallis devoted himself to the correction of abuses.

He increased the salaries of the public servants in order to give them the possibility of acquiring a competence by economy, and made war on all frauds and speculation. On his return to England he was employed in 1794 as a diplomatist in Flanders, and carried on fruitless negotiations with the emperor at Brussels. In 1795 he was appointed master-general of the ordnance. In 1798 he became lord-lieutenant of Ireland during the violence of the Irish rebellion. In 1801 he returned to England, and was selected as the British plenipotentiary to negotiate the Peace of Amiens. On July 29, 1805, he arrived in India as governor-general, pledged to reverse the policy of Lord Wellesley. His avowed policy was to end the war; to break up the system of subsidiary alliances; and to bribe the minor princes of Hindustan to give up their alliance with us by resigning to them jagirs out of the lands south and west of Delhi. In spite of the remonstrances of Lord Lake he proceeded up the Ganges with the intention of carrying this plan out, but his health failed rapidly. He resigned the government to the senior member of the council, Sir George Barlow, and died at Ghazipur, October 5, 1805.

Coromandel Coast. The popular name applied to the east coast of the Deccan. It is supposed to be a corruption of Cholamandalay, in the region of the ancient Chola dynasty. The Coromandel coast extends from Cape Calimere to the mouth of the Kistna, and is within the territory of the Madras presidency.

Coronation. This rite is of great antiquity. In England it seems to have been in general use, even before the union of the several kingdoms; and a coronation service of uncertain date, but as old at least as the eighth century, is still extant. The "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" represents Offa's son, Egfrith, as having been "hallowed to king" in 785. In the same authority we find distinct records of the consecration of Edgar, Ethelred II, Edward the Confessor, and Harold II, to the kingly office with the same rite. And the two essential parts of the ceremony, the placing of the crown on the king's head, and the anointing, had then been fully established; but to neither had any exceptional sacredness been yet assigned; at most they were but symbols of the divine approval of the choice the people had made. The ritual used at Ethelred II's coronation has survived, and contains both these and the form of oath taken by the king. By this he promised three things—to hold God's Church and the realm in peace, to forbid rapine and injustice, and to judge justly and mercifully. The place varied; though generally Kingston-on-Thames, in Edgar's case it was Bath, and in Edward's Winchester. Since the coronation of Harold, however, it has been the abbey church at Westminster.

With differences of detail the ceremonial has not materially changed since the Conquest. The form of asking the clergy and people present for their voices lasted till Henry VIII's time, but is now a mere presentation of the sovereign to the spectators. The chief variations have been in the oath. Till 1308 this pledged three things only—peace and reverence to God and Holy Church, justice to the people, and the removal of bad and upholding of good laws. But at Edward II's coronation it became more comprehensive and precise, and took the form of question and answer. Besides the three things above mentioned, the king promised to keep and defend “the laws and righteous customs which the community of the realm should have chosen.” For centuries no vital alteration was made in the body of the oath, though liberties were taken in Tudor and Stuart days with its wording.

The existing form was settled at the Revolution of 1688. By it the sovereign undertakes (1) to govern “according to the statutes in parliament agreed on,” (2) to cause “justice in mercy to be executed,” and (3) to maintain “the Protestant reformed religion established by law.” It follows the declaration against transubstantiation, deemed necessary to prove that the sovereign is not a Roman Catholic.

This ceremony has long lost its importance. Once it marked the beginning of the new reign. It afterwards came to be regarded as giving the king a sacred character, making him the Lord's anointed, against whose authority it was an impiety to raise one's hand. But it is now a mere pageant. [J. R.]

Coronel, THE BATTLE OF (November 1, 1914), was a naval engagement fought off Chile early in the Great War between five British vessels under Admiral Cradock and five German vessels under Admiral von Spee. The fight was primarily between the Scharnhorst and Gneisenau and the cruisers Good Hope and Monmouth. The loss of the latter vessels was avenged by Admiral Sturdee on December 8 at the battle of the Falkland Islands (q.v.).

Coroner, THE, is first specifically mentioned in the articles of the eyre issued by Richard I in 1194, providing for the appointment in each county of three knights and one clerk to be “keepers of the pleas of the Crown”; but it is probable that the office was of much earlier origin. It was created as a check upon the powers of the sheriff and to safeguard the pecuniary interests of the Crown. The coroners, of whom there were usually four for each shire, were elected in the county court, and in the thirteenth century had to be resident within the county and of knightly status. They held office for life or during good behaviour. Their duties were originally wide. The Charter of 1215 expressly forbade them to hold the pleas of the Crown, but they exercised many functions in connexion with the administration of the criminal law. They received and entered appeals for felony, received the declarations of approvers, recorded outlawries, heard the confessions and abjurations of felons who had taken sanctuary, and were the principal agents in bringing criminals of all sorts to justice. If the sheriff were in default or were a party to a suit, the coroners executed the royal writs, and in the county court their activity was little inferior to his own. From their special obligation to safeguard the rights of the Crown arose their duty of holding inquests as to wrecks, royal fish, and treasure trove—to which the king was by his prerogative entitled; and as to unexplained deaths—which might bring the Crown revenue in the form of fines, deodands, or forfeitures. The juries empanelled for the purpose of these inquests consisted generally of representatives of four or more neighbouring townships, sometimes associated with representatives of the hundred. The coroners kept a roll of their transactions, which was surrendered to the justices at the opening of the eyre, and which enabled them to check the verdicts of the juries of the hundred and to discover defects in the local administration of justice. In modern times many of the former duties of the coroner have become obsolete. Since the Coroners Act of 1887, the chief functions of his court have been to hold inquests in cases of unexplained deaths, and of the concealment of treasure trove, and of these the former is by far the more important. Coroners are now appointed in the counties by the County Councils (Local Government Act, 1888, s. 5) and in the boroughs by the Borough Councils (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, ss. 171–4).

Corporation Act, THE (1661), was passed by the first parliament of Charles II with the intention of destroying the power of the Dissenters in the towns. By this statute it was enacted that all officers of corporations should take the sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England, within twelve months of their election to office; and on their election should take the oaths of supremacy, allegiance, and non-resistance, and abjure the Solemn League and Covenant. The Corporation Act was repealed in 1828, though long before that date it had become a dead letter.

Corporations, or bodies corporate, formed for the continual maintenance and enjoyment of certain privileges, or the holding of certain property in perpetuity, are of two kinds:—(a) Corporations sole, which consist of one person, such as the king or a bishop, who in the eye of the law never die; and (b) Corporations aggregate, which consist of a number of persons so bound together as to be by law considered as one individual, and which by the constant introduction of fresh members have a continuous existence. Both sole and aggregate corporations are divided into ecclesiastical and lay. The former division comprises such corporations as a bishop, or the chaplain of a cathedral, and the latter being again sub-divided into (a) civil corporations, such as the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham; the municipal corporations, and private corporations of the nature of joint-stock companies; and (b) eleemosynary corporations, which are charged with the duty of administering the bounty of the founder, as in the case of the various colleges at the universities, and the hospitals.

Corrichie, THE BATTLE OF (1562), was fought near Aberdeen between the forces of Mary, Queen of Scots, led by Moray, and some Highlanders, headed by the rebellious Earl of Huntly. Huntly was killed, and his son, Sir John Gordon, was captured and executed.

Corsned was a species of ordeal in which the accused had to swallow a large piece of bread or cheese. If this were performed freely and without hurt, the accused was pronounced innocent; but if it stuck in his throat, guilty. With the introduction of Christianity, the host was used for this purpose. [ORDEAL.]

Corunna, THE BATTLE OF (January 16, 1809), between the British and French, was fought during the Peninsular War at the close of Sir John Moore's retreat from Madrid, pursued by Soult. After a march in which the severity of the elements and neglect of discipline were more disastrous to the troops than the pursuit of the French, Moore, on January 11, took up a position round the town of Corunna, and, having occupied the road to Santiago de Compostella with his best troops, awaited the arrival of the British transports from Vigo. On the 14th the ships anchored in the bay, and before daybreak on the 16th the cavalry (the ground being impracticable for cavalry operations), the sick and wounded, and all but nine pieces of artillery, had been embarked. Soult had 16,000 infantry and cavalry, including a strong force of artillery, while Moore had only 14,500 infantry. The battle was begun with a fierce attack by the French on the village of Elvina, which they carried, only, however, to be in turn driven out by General Baird's division. While the battle was still doubtful, Moore ordered up the reserve, under General Paget, to oppose a flank movement directed against the British right. This was most successfully effected; and almost simultaneously the whole of the British line began to gain ground, until at nightfall they had everywhere driven the French from their positions. During the following night a retreat was effected to the shore, and the embarkation of the troops was carried out with but little loss. The casualties on both sides were fairly equal—about 900 men.

Cosgrave, WILLIAM THOMAS (b. 1880), Irish politician, became a Sinn Féin member of the Dublin Corporation in 1913 and joined the Irish revolt of 1916 as an extremist, as a result of which activity he was imprisoned at Frongoch until July 1917. He became member for Kilkenny on his release, and was minister for local government in the first Irish Republican ministry. On the death of President Griffith in 1922 he became acting chairman of the provisional government under Michael Collins (q.v.). Ten days later he succeeded Collins as president, and represented Ireland at the Imperial Conferences of 1923 and 1926.

Coshery was an ancient Irish custom, by which the chief had the right of using the houses and taking the provisions of his tenantry for himself and following at his own discretion. The Norman barons, not unnaturally, adopted so advantageous a custom. After the final confiscation of Irish land by Cromwell, the descendants of the ancient chiefs long led a precarious existence by such means, and numerous statutes failed to put a stop to it.

Cottenham, CHARLES CHRISTOPHER PEPPYS, 1ST EARL OF (1781-1851). [PEPPYS.]

Cotter, JAMES (1690-1719), the son of Sir James Cotter, a distinguished supporter of James II, was, in spite of the Irish Court of Chancery, brought up as a Catholic in England. In 1713 he headed an attack on the Protestant voters in Dublin. He was the idol of the Irish Jacobites; and his execution for rape in 1719 brought about a savage persecution of the Quakers, who had been instrumental in securing his punishment.

Cottingham, FRANCIS, LORD (1578-1652), of a Somersetshire family, was for many years one of the English diplomatic agents at Madrid. He accompanied Prince Charles to Spain, took part in negotiating the marriage treaty, and lost the favour of his patron, Buckingham, by supporting it. In 1623 he was created a baronet, and in 1628 a privy councillor. In the following year he was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, and sent as ambassador to Spain, where he concluded a treaty which developed (January 2, 1631) into an agreement for the partition of Holland. On his return he was raised to the peerage, and became, in 1635, master of the Court of Wards. Clarendon describes him as Laud's chief opponent in the council. To avoid impeachment by the Long Parliament for his share in the fiscal oppressions of the previous ten years, he resigned both his offices. During the Civil War he sided with the king, and, in consequence, took refuge in France. In 1652 he was appointed, together with Clarendon, ambassador to Madrid, and died, in 1653, at Valladolid. During his first stay in Spain he turned Roman Catholic, reverted to Protestantism on his return to England, and became a Catholic again in 1652. Clarendon praises his self-control and power of dissimulation.

Cotton, Sir John Hinde (d. 1752), was one of the small band of Jacobite politicians who formed part of the opposition to Sir Robert Walpole's ministry in the reign of George II. In 1740, when the Jacobites were concocting a plot, we find him described as "doubtful of others, but answering clearly for himself"; and he arranged to remain in London as the channel of communication with James's friends. In 1742, after the fall of Walpole, his appointment to the admiralty board was pressed by the Duke of Argyll, but the king absolutely refused to raise him to that office. In 1744, however, in spite of the reluctance of George, he was taken into the administration. In 1745, the French minister, Cardinal Tencin, a friend of the Stuarts, demanded that as a pledge of his sincerity he should resign office, but this he declined to do. He was, however, soon afterwards dismissed, and continued to lead a small body of Jacobites in the Lower House.

Cotton, Sir Robert Bruce (1570-1631), was a distinguished antiquary and collector of manuscripts. He assisted Camden in his labours on the "Britannia." On the accession of James I he was knighted, and frequently consulted by the privy council on constitutional points. He was one of those who suggested to James I the idea of creating baronets, and was himself raised to this rank in 1611. Sir Robert wrote numerous antiquarian tracts and pamphlets. But his chief title to remembrance is due to the magnificent manuscript library he collected, which passed to his heir intact, and was acquired by the nation in 1706. After being partly destroyed by fire in 1731, it was placed in the British Museum in 1753.

Cotton, Stapleton, 1st Viscount Combermere (1773-1865), took part in the last Mysore War. He served with distinction through the Peninsular War, was commander of all the allied cavalry after 1810, and decided the fortune of the day at Salamanca by a grand cavalry charge. In 1814 he was created Baron Combermere. In 1817 he was made governor of Barbados. In 1825 he was appointed commander-in-chief in India, and accomplished the reduction of Bharatpur at the close of the Burmese War. He was created Viscount Combermere of Bharatpur, February 1827.

Cotton, Sir Willoughby (1783-1860), was commander-in-chief in Jamaica during the slave rebellion of 1831-2. The insurrection was crushed owing to his promptness of action, whilst his leniency to the offenders was in marked contrast to the unwarrantable cruelty with which the negroes were usually treated. His clemency drew upon him the hatred of the planters.

Cotton Famine, THE, 1862. The outbreak of the American Civil War, which was followed by a total blockade of the Confederate coast, was productive of very disastrous results in England. The cotton supply, on the manufacture of which the greater part of the Lancashire operatives depended for a livelihood, failed, and in consequence the Lancashire mill-owners began to work short time, and finally to close the mills entirely. A certain amount of work was kept up and many large fortunes were made by running the blockade of the Confederate ports and bringing out cotton; but the general result was that two millions of people were to a great extent reduced to destitution. The Cotton District Relief Fund was inaugurated in July 1862 and nearly two millions were subscribed within a twelvemonth. By the Relief Act passed in August 1862, loans were granted to the guardians of the poor for the purpose of instituting relief works. The famine ended in the summer of 1865.

Council of State was the name given to the assembly elected on February 14, 1649, immediately after Charles I's execution. It received a combination of military, diplomatic, police, and judicial powers that in the aggregate gave it a greater control over the state and a wider exercise of executive power than the kings had ever had. Appointed by the "Rump," the Council of State was dissolved by Cromwell after his coup d'état against the Parliament. A new Council of State was established in 1659, as the successor to the temporary "Committee of Safety" in the exercise of the executive power; but on the second expulsion of the Rump by Lambert it gave way to the more famous "Committee of Safety," which acted as the mouthpiece of the army. The army scheme for the permanent government included a Council of State that never sat. Revived again when Monck restored the Rump, it naturally found no place when the Restoration brought back the old constitution.

Councils, CIVIL. (1) THE NATIONAL COUNCIL. (a) In Anglo-Saxon Times. The Witenagemot. In Anglo-Saxon England the king was advised by the witenagemot (council of the wise). Some attempt has been made to derive this gathering of magnates from an earlier assembly of the whole body of freemen; but of the existence of such a popular council (folk-moot) there is no reliable historical evidence. The witenagemot was consolidated in proportion as the kingdom was consolidated; and when the West-Saxon monarchs became kings of all the English they gathered together the "wise men" of the whole realm into one great council. For the details of the constitution, power, origin, and activity of the witenagemot the reader is referred to the article under that head. It is enough here to observe that it was an essentially aristocratic assembly, composed of the chief ecclesiastical and temporal magnates of the kingdom; and that its authority, which was theoretically great, depended in practice upon the strength of the king for the time being. It has been called "the parliament, senate, privy council, supreme court of justice, civil service, and cabinet in one," and historians have waxed eloquent over its possession and exercise of legislative, judicial, deliberative, taxative, and executive powers. Actually, however, the sphere of the central government in Anglo-Saxon England was so strictly circumscribed that the functions of the witan were far less important in fact than in appearance. Though sometimes described as a "national council" in the sense that it included the natural leaders of the people, the witan comprised no element of direct popular representation.

(b) In Norman and Angevin Times. The Great Council. The accession of William I produced no sudden revolution in the constitution of the national council. The Great Council of the Norman reigns was, at least in some important respects, a continuation of the witenagemot, whose powers and prerogatives it inherited. But feudal influences, the analogy of the council of Normandy, and the changed condition of the country, soon effected modifications both in theory and in practice. In the first place, the council was feudalized. True, the bishops and earls sat in it as they had sat before the Conquest, but they owed their presence now rather to their position as holders of great fiefs under the Crown than to their official status as magnates of the realm. Meanwhile the inherited powers and privileges of the assembly, though still theirs in theory, paled into insignificance with the rise of the Norman and Angevin despotisms, to which revolt in arms rather than opposition in council was the appropriate check. By the twelfth century the "Concilium magnum" had become a regularly organized feudal assembly. It is probable that the liability to attend was regarded in theory as incumbent upon all tenants-in-chief of the Crown. Actually, however, convenience dictated that only the greater royal vassals, or those whose presence was at any given moment desired by the king, should be summoned. Clause 14 of the Charter of 1215, which provides for the individual summons of the greater barons, and for the general summons through the sheriffs of the lesser, probably reflects the baronial ideal of a feudal assembly; but it is unlikely that the attendance of the latter class was more than nominal. While the council was thus becoming merely baronial in complexion, it was being superseded in many of its functions by the development of new and more efficient consultative bodies out of the administrative system which centred round the Curia Regis (q.v.). Its formal consent was still invariably given to the great legislative and executive measures of the Crown, and we even hear of resistance to the royal will—of which there is no record in Anglo-Saxon times; but even the small space left by Henry II for external checks could not be satisfactorily filled by a body out of relation with a people who rather reposed confidence in the Crown, and was representative mainly of the crushed baronial party which Henry had subdued. Yet the absence of a more adequate representation of the nation lent something of a national character even to this feudal council. Such an assembly gave us Magna Carta, and so well did the baronage fulfil their new part of national representation that throughout Henry III's reign an opposition at once popular and baronial found in it its appropriate mouthpiece. But the gradual growth of a directly representative parliament brought the old council into comparative disuse. Edward I's completion of the parliamentary system at once annihilated the political importance of feudalism and of the feudal Great Council. Superseded as a national assembly by parliament, and as a consultative and executive body by the Royal Council, the Great Council remained as a survival throughout the Middle Ages. Often it was hardly to be distinguished from a parliament, as, for example, the council which sanctioned so many of Edward I's laws. Often it was no more than an "afforded" assembly of the "Concilium ordinarium," strengthened for important business by the addition of spiritual and temporal magnates, and other "wise men," selected at discretion. Such an assembly was not uncommon in the fourteenth and early part of the fifteenth centuries (e.g., in 1379), and Richard II's evil councillors were accused of inducing the king to summon councils composed of certain lords without the assent or presence of the "Lords of the Great Council." But these assemblies may largely be regarded as attempts to bridge over the distinction between the Royal Council and the council of the nation, and give to the former body that prestige which historical continuity and full baronial support could in a large measure afford. No such assembly was convoked in Tudor times, and Charles I's summons of a Great Council at York in 1640 was the last instance of its being called together.

(2) THE ROYAL COUNCIL. Besides the Great Council, or the Common Council of the nation, there must have existed, as soon as organized government began, a smaller council of the royal ministers and confidants, by whose advice and co-operation the government was carried on. The small numbers generally attending the witenagemot before the Conquest, and the lack of definite centralized authority, make this assembly very hard to discern in Anglo-Saxon times: but with the reigns of the sons of William I, the Curia Regis (q.v.) comes into importance; and from this general court there gradually developed by a process of differentiation not only the courts of judicature, but also the organized Royal Council of the Middle Ages. The exact relation of the Curia Regis to the Great Council has been much disputed, but it is clear that they were not entirely separate organizations. The Royal Council was in a sense but a specialized form of the Great Council. The active despotism of the Norman and Angevin kings greatly stimulated the growth of the Royal Council: for when the king had so much on his hands he must have the help of clerks and ministers, who always tended to become his advisers. The existence of such a Royal Council is dimly foreshadowed by the act of Henry II in 1178, when that monarch reserved the decision of knotty judicial or financial cases to a small circle of "sapientes," or councillors. But under Henry II we have the merest reference to its action—none to its constitution or powers. The personal retinue of Richard I, the foreign councillors of John, may well have been organized in a similar body; but it is not until the minority of Henry III that the real history of the Royal Council begins. The regent, the legate, the great officers of state constituted that "supremum concilium," traces of whose activity are to be discerned in every department of government. In this body the hated foreign courtiers exercised their influence. Against it the Great Council of the realm fought with increasing success. Thrice oaths were imposed on this council and baronial nominees added to it; but it continued to maintain its existence through the crisis, and after acting as a practical Council of Regency during Edward I's absence in Palestine, received from that king definition and organization.

The special characteristic of the Royal

Council was its permanence. It was always sitting, always occupied in the continuous business of the court. Its usual name was the "Concilium perpetuum," or "Concilium ordinarium," in opposition to the "Concilium commune," or "Concilium magnum," already discussed. Besides its constant sessions for executive business, it held terminal sittings to help the king in receiving petitions and hearing suits. Its functions were so wide as to be practically incapable of definition. Nothing was too great, nothing was too small, to escape its interference. It advised the king, executed his resolutions, shared in his judicial and appellate powers. The ordinary members of the council were—the chief ministers, the judges, some of the bishops and barons, and a few other royal confidants summoned by royal writ, and bound by a solemn oath of office. The power of the Royal Council was always growing; but it acquired a special prominence during the weak reign of Richard II; and it is from the history of the fifteenth century that we can first get a really clear and definite idea of the functions of a body whose whole previous history it is impossible to trace but obscurely. Under Richard II and the Lancastrians the Royal Council, the engine and mouthpiece of the prerogative, gradually begins to subserve constitutional ends. The strong and organized parties of the time are represented upon it. Parliament asserts control over it, and the recognition by the Lancastrian monarchs of the right of parliament to nominate its members is a remarkable anticipation of the cabinet government of modern times. In 1406 parliament protest their great regard for the "Lords of the continuous Council," in language almost anticipating a vote of confidence in a modern ministry. In turn caressed by king and parliament, the council acquired more and more authority. Under Henry VI it became a virtual Council of Regency, and its members practically held the royal authority in commission. This enhanced their authority, but broke their connexion with parliament. After 1437 the king resumed absolute power of nomination. Efforts to remedy this state of things led to no result: and under Edward IV and the Tudors, it assumed as the "Privy Council" the character of an "irresponsible committee of government," the agent of the prerogative, and the representative of the royal pleasure. It sent forth outshoots, such as its judicial committee, the Star Chamber; and many of the anomalous councils that in the sixteenth century withdrew half England from the cognizance of the common law were in close relation to it. The temporizing policy of a Henry VIII and an Elizabeth, which allowed some divergence of opinion amongst its supporters, kept up at least the semblance of government by discussion. Its elaborate organization into committees under Edward VI illustrates the width of its ramifications.

The Privy Council having attained the height of its power, it will be convenient to summarize its functions. The great variety and extent of its activity has already been noticed. Its claim in 1427 "to have the execution of all the powers of the Crown during the king's minority needs only," says Stubbs, "to be slightly altered to make it applicable to their perpetual functions." The only limit to their usurpations was the common law; and this, while but partly confining their judicial activity, left the whole field of general politics open to their aggressions. They had a very large share in all executive business. Their power of passing ordinances (q.v.) gave them a practical share in legislation; and the confidence, indifference, or impotence of parliament allowed them taxative functions of the greatest importance. They lent money to the king on their own security, or used their influence over rich lords or merchants to negotiate loans. Sometimes they got direct authority from parliament to levy taxes, sometimes, especially during the sixteenth century, they did so of their own authority. Wherever no positive law checked them they pushed their way. Even in judicial matters, despite the common law and the jurisdiction of the Chancery, they were still, as in 1178, the advisers of the Crown on knotty points, and the arbiters of private disputes.

Rigorous under the Tudors, the powers of the council became oppressive under the Stuarts; but besides the ever-increasing parliamentary check, the tendency of the council to become unwieldy, by the inclusion of a very large number of nobles and officials, led to a habit of transacting great secrets of state in an unauthorized and informal cabal, or group of "cabin counsellors"; a system which was complained of early in the seventeenth century, and accepted unwillingly towards its end. The Cabal of 1667, though in profession a committee of the Privy Council for foreign affairs, was in some respects an anticipation of the modern cabinet. Sir William Temple's plan of reform in 1679 proved abortive, and the definite recognition of cabinet [CABINET] government by William III made the Privy Council again a constitutional check, that Conservatives desired to maintain in power as a safeguard against the new-fangled and illegal ministerial assembly. The Act of Settlement (q.v.) of 1701 contains several clauses which tried to effect the restoration of the Privy Council to its old constitutional position under the Plantagenets and Tudors; but they had little result. The council remained as it does to this day a body of great dignity and importance, into which all statesmen of position were formally admitted, and whose members were distinguished by the appellation of "right honourable." But the nature of its composition, and its unwieldy dimensions, prevented its being generally summoned as a whole for the transaction of general business. Councils in the presence of royalty are still frequently held, but they consist of a very few councillors, and transact formal business. The Privy Council office exercises the functions of a department of the executive. The president and vice-president of the council are ministers. An important function is still discharged by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which acts as a court of appeal in ecclesiastical causes and for India and the colonies. But as a whole, and as a deliberative assembly, the privy council is practically obsolete.

(3) LOCAL COUNCILS. Besides the above, councils were appointed at various times in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries to govern parts of the kingdom remote from the centre of authority, or imperfectly united to it. They were modelled generally on the Privy Council, both in constitution and functions, and often exercised a jurisdiction of certain oppressiveness and doubtful legality. Such were the Council of Wales and the Marches, established by Edward IV in 1478, at Ludlow, to govern the southern and border districts of Wales, which until then had uncontrolled enjoyment of Palatine privileges. This court, though losing its chief reason for existence when Henry VIII incorporated Wales with England, and, limited in its jurisdiction in 1640, was not abolished until the 5th of William and Mary. Similar was the Council of the North, finally established at York after the revolt of 1539, famous through Strafford's tenure of the presidency, and abolished with similar councils in the first session of the Long Parliament. The Council of Calais was of older foundation, and continued until the loss of that town under Queen Mary. The Stannaries Court, which extended its special function of governing the estate of the Duchy of Cornwall, and superintending the mines there, to general business, and had become one of the most oppressive engines of prerogative, was at the same time deprived of its capacity for aggression. The Council of the Palatinates of Chester, Lancashire, etc., were mere continuations of the old feudal courts of these franchises, continued after their incorporation with the Crown.

(4) COUNTY, DISTRICT, AND PARISH COUNCILS. Under the Local Government Act of 1888 most of the administrative work previously entrusted to justices of the peace in England and Wales was devolved upon elective County Councils. The magistrates, however, share with these authorities the control of the police. A supplementary act was passed in 1894 creating Parish and District Councils.

Councils, ECLESIASTICAL, are of the following kinds :—

(1) GENERAL, or ECUMENICAL COUNCILS,—i.e., assemblies of the Catholic Church from every nation. To these, bishops from Britain were sent from the time of the Council of Arles in the fourth century to the Councils of Constance and Basel in the fifteenth. Their decrees were accepted in England as a part of the law of the Church, though in later times, as the case of the Council of Basel shows, hardly without some ratification from the royal authority. The greatest interest was at various times shown by the English Church in these councils, and their acts often profoundly affected the course of English history. But their influence is too indirect to necessitate any detailed treatment of it in a work on English history.

(2) NATIONAL COUNCILS. Of the details of the history of the pre-English British Church we know little; but when Archbishop Theodore completed the systematic organization of the English Church that the failure of Augustine's mission necessitated, one of his chief cares was to arrange for the assembling every August of a council of the whole Church over which he was metropolitan. The Councils of Hertford and Hatfield (q.v.), in which most of his reforms were arranged, were themselves precedents for the future action of the Church. These councils can only by anticipation be called national, for as yet the English nation was not in existence, but they exerted a most beneficial influence on the development of national unity by habituating subjects of hostile but neighbouring states to meet under the peace of the Church to discuss amicably matters of common interest. Their common place of meeting was some border town such as Clovesho, an unknown spot near London, where Mercia, Wessex, Kent, and Essex met together at a point. They were constituted mostly of bishops, though abbots often, and diocesan clergy once, figure among the members; and, as the line between Church and State was as yet but slackly drawn, kings, ealdormen, and other temporal magnates frequently attended them. But the assertion of the independence of the archbishopric of York by Archbishop Egbert created a jealousy between that see and Canterbury that made these national councils, which had never met with the regularity prescribed by Theodore, very few in number. They practically ceased with the decline of all conciliar activity in the tenth century; and though revived after the Conquest, when a papal legate could summon a national council with an authority which neither archbishop could gainsay, the vindication of the archiepiscopal powers of the see of York by Thurstan revived the old jealousy that made the union of both provinces in a common assembly ridiculous or abortive. The legate councils of Otto in 1237, and Ottobon in 1268, are the chief later exceptions to this rule.

(3) PROVINCIAL COUNCILS.—The rarity and practical cessation of national councils left room for the full development of the synods of the two provinces of Canterbury and York; even if the comparative unimportance of the northern province did not often invest the councils of the southern with a practically national character. The thirteenth century saw the completion of the systematic representation of the provincial synods, to which the name Convocation (q.v.) became gradually applied. They play an important part in both the ecclesiastical and civil history of England.

(4) DIOCESAN COUNCILS, which were exhaustive assemblies of the clergy of the individual sees, were occasionally summoned, and even—

(5) ARCHIDIACONAL COUNCILS are occasionally heard of. But these later varieties were of inferior importance, and never originated business of any weight.

Counties, THE ENGLISH. The word "county" is due to the Norman invaders' identification of the old English "shire" with their own "comitatus," the district of a count. But the shire had had a very different history from the Frankish comitatus. In the first place, the forty counties of England differ considerably in their origins. The southern counties are, no doubt, much the older, and are still identical with the original shires of Wessex. Some have supposed that they represent the successive settlements established as a result of each advance of the West Saxons westwards. Wiltshire, for instance, has been imagined to have originated with some few hundred Saxon families who towards the end of the fifth century drove back the Britons from this district, attained to an independent individuality as the "folk" of the Wilsætas, and finally coalesced with neighbouring "folks" in Dorset, Hampshire, Berkshire, etc., to form the "shares" of divisions of the kingdom of the West Saxons. A more recent view is that the southern shires represent more or less exactly the realms of the various sub-reguli who divided the West-Saxon kingdom among them from time to time during the seventh century; or that they were simply the districts administered from important royal vills such as Honiton and Wilton, Dorchester or Somerton. At any rate, the West-Saxon shire is characterized by a primitive independence, having its own "folk-moot," its own ealdorman, and its chief town, the name of which is cognate to the shire name (Wilsætas, Wilton). This had been the history also of Sussex, Surrey, Essex, Middlesex, and even Jutish Kent, when these, with others, were amalgamated into the kingdom of Wessex. But the Midland shires, on the contrary, are obviously artificial areas, and do not correspond to the original "folks" of the Mercians, South Angles, Mid-Angles, etc. They were probably marked out when the district was reconquered from the Danes by Alfred's successors in the tenth century. In the case of the East-Midland shires it is hardly possible to doubt that they represent simply the holdings of the Danish armies, which Edward the Elder subdued. Bedford, Northants, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Derby, Nottingham, and Leicester, for instance, were Danish units of organization. The origin of the West-Midland shires, on the other hand, was probably the result of the grouping of lands for administrative purposes around the "burhs" created by Ethelfleda in the course of her advance. Sometimes the older divisions which were submerged by the political reorganization of the tenth century seem to be preserved in the bishoprics; the diocese of Worcester, for example, corresponded to the old kingdom of the Hwiccas, and was far more extensive than the modern Worcestershire. The shire system then, which was indigenous to Wessex, spread thence to the midlands at a later date. In the north only Yorkshire and Durham appear as shires in Domesday Book; Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmorland were not formed into shires till the reigns of William Rufus and Henry I. The origin of one shire, Rutland, still remains an unsolved problem. Furthermore, not till long after the Norman Conquest was it certain that there would not be other shires formed, for the district of Richmond was often called a shire, as also were Hallamshire and Northamptonshire, etc. The number of shires which sent representatives to parliament was during the Middle Ages thirty-seven; for Cheshire and Durham were not incorporated till 1535 and 1673 respectively, and Monmouth added to the English shires also in 1535. The boundaries of shires—as, for example, in Essex and Norfolk—are usually the natural lines of rivers and hills; and probably in many cases would be explained if we could only trace the ancient forests and marshes, as on the western border of Notts; in other cases again—as in the sinuous northern boundary of Wilts, which seems to cross and recross the Thames with a sort of methodical irregularity—there must have been accidents of local formation, tribal relations, or personal circumstances, which we can hardly now hope to trace. The anomalous fragments belonging to one shire, but outlying in another, had often a great historical interest; such as the hundred of West Meon, in Sussex, but belonging to Hants, a striking survival from the settlement of Jutish Meon-was soon absorbed by the West Saxons of Hants. These have in many cases been consolidated and rectified. When we come to compare the social characteristics of the several counties, we find that in wealth and population the southern and eastern parts of England preponderated during the Anglo-Saxon times, as in political superiority. With the rise of the woollen manufacture after the thirteenth century, the balance of population spread towards the eastern counties, and along the banks of Thames and Severn. At last, the application of steam-power to manufacture opened out the coal and iron fields of the north and west, and reversed the long predominance of the plains over the hill districts. As to the relative prevalence of feudal sentiments, it is to be noticed that the home counties after the Norman Conquest continued to be divided among smaller landlords than the great lordships of the midlands and the north; it is therefore the barons of the north and centre who are conspicuous in the series of revolts under the Norman kings, in the struggles of Henry II's and Henry III's reigns, in Magna Carta, and in the opposition led by the house of Lancaster against the Plantagenets; and during the Wars of the Roses one striking element in the array of the trading and popular forces against the feudal—the array, that is, of Kent, London, the eastern and "home counties," against the less advanced northern and western border lands. The same division is to be found during the next century in comparing the Protestant risings (such as Wyatt's) with the reactionary Pilgrimage of Grace supported by the gentry of Lincolnshire, Yorkshire, and the north. To take another instance: the socmen, whom Domesday shows so numerous in the eastern counties, and whose presence points to the revived spirit of freedom that the Danes brought in, bequeathed their bold traditions to the revolted peasantry of 1381, and to the Puritan yeomen of the Eastern Association two centuries later. But this tenacious individuality of the shire comes out in still minuter distinctions. Kent, Cheshire, Durham, in particular, had each its own legal customs or social traditions; each, in fact, its own inner history. Charles II in his flight was once detected by his horse's shoes having been made in four different counties. It is only the developed means of communication of our own day, and the operation of broad economic laws, that have begun to obliterate such distinctiveness.

Counties, THE IRISH. The history of the shiring of Ireland is involved in more obscurity than the history of the shiring of England, though not for the same reason in the two cases. In England the division into counties was the result of a slow process of growth, the history of which is hidden in the remote past. We can trace only some of its stages. But the shiring of Ireland was purely the result of the English conquest. The persons who undertook it were strangers, were aliens in the country, ignorant of its language and most of its local traditions. The Irish shires are therefore distinct, formal, and legal divisions, not local and popular ones. This being the case, it might have been supposed that it would have been an easy matter to trace the stages by which these divisions came into existence. And perhaps this would not have been difficult if there had remained to us more of the State papers relating to Irish affairs. But it is well known that an immense number were destroyed, during the different periods of Irish rebellion. Especially was this the case with the papers which relate to the early period of Anglo-Norman rule. There were in reality two conquests of Ireland, one in the reign of Henry II and his immediate successors, another in that of Henry VIII and his successors. For during a long intermediate period (almost from the death of Henry III) the country lapsed into an independence almost as complete as if it had never known English rule. Now, although we cannot distinctly trace all the steps of the shiring of Ireland, we must unquestionably refer it to these two periods of English supremacy, and what was not done during the first we may feel sure was not accomplished in the interval between it and the second. Up to the end of the reign of Henry III English law was administered regularly to the English subjects throughout the greater part of Ireland. Justices in eyre travelled for jail delivery in the same way that they did in England. The country, therefore, must have been divided into districts, which in every way corresponded to the English shires. Of course this division of Ireland was a gradual process, beginning with the districts first conquered, and gradually extending. Nor, so far as concerns the present county divisions, does the process seem to have extended beyond Leinster and Munster. The other two provinces were treated as each one county. Thus very early we read of sheriffs of some of the counties of the Pale (q.v.)—a sheriff of Dublin, for example, is mentioned in a document of the year 1201, or not more than thirty years after the first landing of the Earl of Pembroke. This, however, does not prove the existence of the division now known as the county of Dublin, for the city of Dublin was constituted a county before the county was formed. But it proves the existence of so much of county government in this year as is implied by the existence of a sheriff. As a matter of fact, the "county of Dublin"—evidently here distinct from the city—is mentioned only six years after, in 1207. The county of Kildare is first mentioned in 1249; Wexford (Wesford) in 1251; Kilkenny in 1252, but more clearly in 1279; of Louth (also called Uriel), the sheriff is spoken of in 1290; but it is not distinctly called a county before the year 1301. Wicklow, though it is nowhere called a county in the early documents, cannot have been behind the other places of the Pale. Meath is the only exception to the general rule of a very early shiring of the counties round Dublin. It seems only to have been settled during the thirteenth century, and it is generally referred to in the papers of that age as de Lacy's country. In 1297 we read of the lands held in Meath, "without the boundary of any county," which implies that at this date only a part of it had been shired. Three counties of Leinster, by their English names, imply a late formation—Longford, King's County, and Queen's County. The last two did, of course, receive their names in the reign of Mary and Philip, as the names of their capitals—Philipstown and Maryborough—sufficiently indicate. But before this time they were known as Offaly (also called "O'Connor's country") and Leix ("O'Moore's country"), and there is no evidence that their boundaries were in any way changed with their names. Longford seems to have been a later division, as we might expect from the smallness of its size. We find incidental mention of it in a document of the year 1207; but there is no evidence to show that the county came into existence before the sixteenth century. Munster was divided into counties almost as early as was Leinster, for all its counties except one are distinctly mentioned as such in documents of the thirteenth century, viz., Cork first called a county in 1207 (shired in 1210 and again under James I), Limerick in 1245, Waterford in 1251, Tipperary in 1275 (created a county palatine in 1328), and Derry in 1281. Of Clare we do not happen to have any early record; but we need not suppose that it was much behind the others. It is the one county of Munster which has an English-derived name, as it was called after the de Clares, Earls of Gloucester, etc., who settled in the country, and was for a long time known as "de Clare's country." After the return of Ireland to practical independence, and the relapse of the northern families to the condition of native chieftains, the country may be said to have been practically unshired over its greatest part. Jail deliveries were restricted to the four counties constituting what was now known as the Pale, viz., Dublin, Kildare, Louth, and Meath. It seems that at the beginning of the reign of Henry VIII there were only parts of five counties which remained faithful to the English crown—Uriel (Louth), half of Dublin, half of Meath, half of Kildare, and half of Wexford. Of course the counties which had been already constituted continued to bear their old names, but the jurisdiction which made them really shires had ceased. In the document from which these particulars have been taken Ulster (Wolster) and Connaught are called counties. It is, however, the case that as early as 1260 we hear of the county of Down, and in 1283 of the sheriff of Antrim, and in 1290 of the sheriff of Roscommon. In 1296 Sligo is known in the State papers of Elizabeth as "O'Connor Sligo's country." This is in 1565. Five years later we find an order in council concerning the shiring of Ireland, but no details are given as to what new counties were constituted. The completion of the work did not take place till 1607, after the famous rebellion and flight of Tyrone and Tyrconnel, which led to the Plantation of Ulster. In a State paper of this year we find a proposal, which was shortly carried into effect, for dividing the whole of Ulster into shires. In this paper there are three old counties mentioned—Louth, Down, and Antrim—and it is proposed to create six new, viz., Armagh, Tyrone, Coleraine (Londonderry), Monaghan, Fermanagh, and Donegal. The addition of London to the older name of Derry is the most evident remaining trace of the Plantation of Ulster, recalling as it does the settlement of that part by a colony from London. That settlement was begun in the year 1607. In the list of James I's parliament of 1611 the names of the counties of Ireland stand almost as at present, save that Carlow is still called by its earlier name of Cathelagh, and that Cavan is absent from the number. In short, it may be stated that from the time of John until the opening of the Tudor period the process of shiring was almost at a standstill; and that its completion by the end of the reign of James I was largely the work of the three Elizabethan viceroys, Sussex, Sydney, and Perrot.

Counties, THE SCOTTISH. The history of the erection of the counties of Scotland as they now exist is involved in much obscurity. The boundaries in some cases were not definitely fixed till the beginning of the last century. It was part of the anglicizing policy of the sons of Malcolm and Margaret to divide their kingdom into sheriffdoms after the English model; therefore, in Scotland, the sheriff was not the gerefa of the already existing shire, but an officer appointed by the Crown, for whom a district had to be appropriated. The boundaries of these districts were for long vague and undetermined. They must be divided into two distinct classes—those of the Highlands and those of the Lowlands.

(1) Lowland Counties. At the time when sheriffs were introduced, Scotland south of the Firths consisted of three distinct provinces—Lothian, Galloway, and Strathclyde. Lothian formed part of the English kingdom of Northumbria, and was held in fief by the Scottish kings. It is represented by the counties of Berwick, Roxburgh, Peebles, and the Lothians—i.e., Edinburgh, Haddington, and Linlithgow. Each of these counties takes its name from the chief town within its bounds. From incidental mention in charters and other documents, we gather that each of them had a sheriff in the time of David I or his successors, but there is no certain evidence of their first institution. The extent of these counties would seem to have been determined by existing local divisions. Thus Peebles is known as Tweeddale before its erection into a county. Ettrick Forest becomes Selkirk, and Teviotdale and Liddesdale form Roxburgh.

Strathclyde has been divided into the present counties of Ayr, Lanark, Renfrew, and Dumbarton. Ayr was formed of the districts of Kyle, Cunningham, and Carrick, which was separated from Galloway by William the Lion. The first sheriff of Ayr was appointed in 1221, but the three districts were ruled severally by baillies, who in many points acted as sheriffs. Lanark, which was made a sheriffdom in the time of David I, was divided into two parts, the over ward and the nether ward of Clydesdale; Lanark being the seat of justice of the one, and Rutherglen of the other. Renfrew was erected by Robert III into a barony, with rights of regality, for his son James. It first appears as an independent sheriffdom in 1414. Dumbarton, formerly the Lennox, or Vale of Leven, first appears as a sheriffdom in the reign of William the Lion. Galloway was divided into the sheriffdoms of Dumfries and Wigton. The sheriffdom of Dumfries nominally included the districts of Nithsdale and Annandale, and that half of Galloway which forms the modern county of Kirkcudbright. A sheriff is mentioned in the time of William the Lion, and it is distinctly recognized as a shire at the time of the death of Alexander III. But as Annandale on the one hand, and Kirkcudbright on the other, were both stewardries, the jurisdiction of the sheriff must have been virtually limited to Nithsdale. Wigton, the remaining part of Galloway, was certainly a sheriffdom by the end of the thirteenth century, but powers of regality were joined to the earldom by David II. In every county there were regalities and baronial jurisdictions, and hereditary constables of royal fortresses, and baillies of the lands belonging to religious houses, whose powers clashed with those of the sheriff. The office almost invariably became hereditary in the family of the most powerful man of the district, and tended more to swell his consequence than to maintain law and order, till the act of 1747 abolished hereditary jurisdictions.

(2) Highland Counties. In the Celtic kingdom north of the Firths, where the clan system prevailed, the country was divided into vaguely defined districts, whose several mormaers or earls, while professing a nominal allegiance to the King of Scots, each claimed to represent the royal authority within his own territory. The introduction of sheriffs was therefore very gradual, and was not completed till the sixteenth century. In many cases the powers of the sheriff were conferred upon the local chief, who had thus the right of "pit and gallows," or power of life and death, within his own territory. These powers were only done away with by the abolition of hereditary jurisdictions in 1747. The boundaries of the Highland shires were not definitely fixed till the beginning of the last century. Previously their limits were marked more by custom and tradition than by law, and Arrowsmith's map, published in 1805, is the first in which the counties are defined accurately.

Counties, THE WELSH, are mainly administrative divisions of the Mercian rather than the West Saxon type. They are consequently of late origin, and in most cases receive their name from the shire town. In a country so well subdivided off by natural boundaries as Wales, their limits have, however, in certain cases, coincided so far with these that they represent real dialectic and physical distinctions. Moreover, some counties correspond, if roughly, with ancient tribal or local divisions, and still more to the ancient ecclesiastical divisions of the land. But despite these exceptions, the Welsh shires are in the main artificial "departments" rather than natural "provinces"; they are "shires" rather than "gauen."

The Welsh counties fall into three classes according to the period of their creation—viz., (1) ancient palatine counties, (2) the counties formed by Edward I, (3) the counties formed by Henry VIII, who also finally fixed the limits of the other two classes.

(1) Ancient Palatine Counties—i.e., Pembrokeshire and Glamorganshire. These represent the two greatest "Marches" which the conquering activity of the Norman barons of the twelfth century established all over western and southern Wales. In the west, the districts thus conquered were largely included in the indefinite limits of the English border counties, Cheshire, Shropshire, and Herefordshire, whose earls under William I acquired regalian privileges. Up to the thirteenth century, and even the sixteenth, large districts now in "Wales" were included locally within these counties, although their inclusion was but nominal, so long as the lesser lords retained palatine powers, even after the Crown had annexed the earldoms themselves. Another class of lordships marchers were never included within these counties, but although independent, were not of sufficient importance to be regarded as equivalent to counties. The lordships of Denbigh, the "honour" of Montgomery, the lordships of Brecon and Gower, were among others of this description. But Morganwg, the conquest of Fitz-Hamon, and the inheritance of Robert of Gloucester, and the great house of Clare, though never formally constituted an earldom or county palatine, was so virtually. Its lords were always earls, either of Gloucester or, as later, of Pembroke. They had fullest regalian rights and privileges, as much as the Palatine Lords of Cheshire and Durham had, and they were the greatest family of the realm. So early as 1146 we read of the "comitatus" (shire-moot) of Cardiff, and in 1148 Earl William speaks of his "vice comes" (sheriff). Pembroke was more definitely created an earldom in 1138, and became organized on the model of an English county. The boundaries of both were narrower than those of the modern shires; Gower, for example, was a separate lordship, although much of Gwent was within the lordship of Morganwg. Similarly Dewisland and Kemes were outside the Pembroke Palatinate. The modern boundaries were assigned by Henry VIII adding to the old nuclei the adjoining marcherships.

(2) Edward I's Counties—viz., Anglesey, Carnarvonshire, Merionethshire, Cardiganshire, Carmarthenshire. After the conquest of Llewelyn, Edward I divided the district which acknowledged his sway, and to which the title of the "Principality" is rightly confined, into districts called shires, but which rather bear to the regular shire the relation of a United States Territory to a State, than fully represent the self-governing district forming an integral factor of the body politic of England. In the districts more immediately subject to Llewelyn, the shires of Anglesey, Carnarvon, and Merioneth were erected. They so far regarded old lines that they consisted of an aggregation of cantreds and commots. A sheriff in each shire, with coroners and bailiffs in each commot, were appointed. A county court was to be held once a month, and the sheriff's tourn twice a year, at which all the inhabitants were to be present. Sheriffs, etc., were also appointed for more southern regions, where the power of the Welsh princes at least nominally extended, one to hold his court at Cardigan and Llanbadarn, another at Carmarthen, though the powers of the marchers must have limited the area of their jurisdiction to narrower bounds than modern Cardiganshire and Carmarthenshire. A sixth new county was formed in Flint, which consisted of the western and more exposed portion of the Chester Palatinate, but which remained in a sort of half dependence on Cheshire. The rest of Wales remained in the hands of the marchers.

(3) Henry VIII's Counties—viz., Denbighshire, Montgomeryshire, Radnorshire, Breconshire, and Monmouthshire. Henry VIII's incorporation of Wales with England involved the division of the whole county into shire-ground. Hence, by the 27 Hen. VIII, the local self-government, of which the shire was still the base, was introduced into the whole land. The lordships marchers lost their palatine rights, and were either (e.g., Gower, as above) incorporated into existing counties, or aggregated into new ones. Besides the new shires of western Wales, the boundaries of Cheshire, and still more of Shropshire and Herefordshire, were readjusted; and the old Welsh counties of Edward I, and the still older palatinates, were assimilated to English shires; and the power of returning to parliament one member for each county, and one for the amalgamated boroughs (except in mountainous Merioneth) was conferred. Monmouthshire had two members given it, and was treated as a part of England, so far as the words England and Wales had now an antagonistic meaning. Its enclosure under Charles II in an English circuit completed its severance from Wales.

The chief statutes creating Welsh counties are 12 Ed. I, Statutum Wallie or the Statute of Rhuddlan, and 27 Hen. VIII, c. 24, 26. See also 26 Hen. VIII, c. 4, and 27 Hen. VIII, c. 5, 7, 24, 26. A summary will be found in "Reeve's History of English Law," ii, 93-9, and iv, 195-205. For Pembrokeshire and Glamorganshire the "Description of Pembrokeshire" written in 1603 (MS. Harl., No. 6250), c. 24, fol. 240 seq., is valuable. For the Marches see Pennant's "Tour in Wales," Appendix ii. For Glamorganshire, Mr. Clark's papers on The Land of Morgan, in the "Archæological Journal," are useful. The Welsh county histories are not, as a rule, good. Jones's "Breconshire" is perhaps the best. See also T. F. Tout, "The Welsh Shires" (cf. Cymmrdol); J. G. Edwards, Early History of Cardigan and Carmarthen, in the "English Historical Review."

[T. F. T.]

Counties Palatine are so called from the fact that their lords exercised regalian rights, i.e., enjoyed franchises or jurisdictional rights of exceptionally large dimensions, comparable to those exercised by the king himself. The earl of a county palatine could pardon treasons, murders, and felonies; while all writs were in his name, and offences were said to be committed against his peace, and not against that of the king. Under William I four such franchises—Chester, Durham, Kent, and Shropshire—seem to have existed. These regions appear to have been selected for peculiar treatment (as exceptions to the Conqueror's general practice in avoiding the creation of powerful feudal lordships) as being especially liable to attack—Chester and Shropshire from the Welsh Marches, Kent from France, and Durham from Scotland. The disturbed state of the borders rendered it an easy task for an earl, who was as powerful as a sovereign in his own territory, to extend his frontiers at the expense of his enemies. Kent ceased to be a palatine earldom after the death of Odo of Bayeux, and the palatinate earldom of Shropshire disappeared after the collapse of the rebellion of Robert de Belesme under Henry I. In 1351 Lancaster was created a palatine earldom by Edward III. Chester also ranked as a palatinate, with its own courts, judges, and staff of officers, constable, steward, and the rest; it had its parliament, consisting of the barons of the county, and was not until 1541 represented in the parliament of the kingdom. The lords of the Welsh March were possessed of jura regalia of a most extensive nature, and enjoyed, in virtue of the "custom of the March" which grew up in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, virtual independence from royal control. During the sixteenth century the various palatinate jurisdictions were, with the exception of Lancaster and Chester, which were held by the Crown, and of Durham, gradually assimilated to the rest of the country.

The palatine jurisdiction of Durham remained, however, with the bishop until 1836, whilst the jurisdiction of the Palatine Courts at Lancaster, with the exception of the Chancery Court, were transferred to the High Court of Justice by the Judicature Act of 1873.

County Court. "The Anglo-Saxon shire mote was in a very real sense the cornerstone of the English legal system. Both before and for a long time after the Norman Conquest it was the most important court of general jurisdiction, the great channel through which flowed the stream of folk-right descending from the past." Before the Conquest the shire-moot has the caldorman and bishop at its head, "to declare the law, secular and spiritual," but gradually its newer aspect of dependence on a central power is embodied in the shire-reeve, or sheriff, who convenes the court and connects it with the king. This official supplanted the caldorman and bishop, and after the Norman Conquest he becomes the chief minister in the county. Originally the county court dealt with both civil and criminal matters, but by the end of the twelfth century its independent action had been curbed, though it had gained ground in certain directions by its more direct connexion with the Crown. From Henry II's reign much of its jurisdiction was gradually transferred to the king's courts (i.e., the King's Bench and the Common Pleas, and to the itinerant justices). But it still dealt with civil cases not exceeding forty shillings in value, with cases of distraint and with outlawry. In some instances it could only act after the receipt of a royal writ, in others no writ was necessary. Inquests were taken there, sometimes "in the full county court." Both for presentment of criminals and for decision of civil cases (at least as to land) the Crown always used "recognitors," that is, called on the shire to co-operate, and to make record of its proceedings. Its help was called upon also for such matters as view of armour, choice of coroners (and at certain periods of sheriffs), for the publication of charters, statutes, and ordinances, for exacting oaths of allegiance, and later for the election of knights and burgesses to parliament. It had, in fact, by the middle of the thirteenth century become the chief medium of local administration, and there is evidence which suggests that it performed in the shire financial system functions not unlike those which the Exchequer exercised in the central administration. There were two great county courts each year, and the ordinary sessions took place once a month or once in six weeks. By this date attendance was a duty imposed on certain landholders who owed suit to the county court, or "the county" as it was more usually called: in addition the presence of the reeve and four men from each vill, of twelve burghers from each borough, and twelve men from each hundred was required for certain purposes. The sheriff presided and under him was the coroner, who had more extensive functions than has the modern official. The proceedings were duly recorded on Plea Rolls of the county court, some of which have now been discovered.

In 1258, at Oxford, among the other grievances set forth, the barons complained that the attendance required of them at the county court was increasing. By the Statute of Merton they won their point—that their attendance might be by attorney; while the Statute of Marlborough, 1267, exempted all above the degree of knights unless specially summoned. Already individual exemptions had been so largely granted that by 1258 there was a scarcity of knights for the “inquests” of the court; and in 1293 a qualification of 40s. freehold was required for service as a juror. The county court also formed a group of local representatives from which a small body of knights could be chosen to act for the whole shire, and stand between the Crown and the county in the business of government. Thus, in 1194 four knights act for the whole shire to elect the grand jury of each hundred; under Henry III four knights of each shire come to Westminster to discuss the interpretation of articles in Magna Carta; and knights from time to time assess, or assess and collect, taxes. From this it is a short step to the election of knights to represent the shire in parliament. In later times the rapid growth of the justices of the peace stripped this court of most of its functions, except that of electing and instructing the representatives sent to parliament, perhaps after discussion of the grounds of its summons as stated in the king's writ. Under Edward III it was still dealing with a large number of cases at each court. It was particularly during the Tudor period that these justices—a non-elective body of landowners—completed the process by which they had stripped the old shire-court of its powers—judicial, police, military, and fiscal. The statutes of the early fifteenth century, which attempted further to regulate the relation between parliament and the shires in the interests of the gentry, were aimed to check the misdoing of the sheriffs (1406), and to ensure the election of knights or squires and the exclusion of maintainers; and in 1430 it was declared that the right of voting belonged only to freeholders of 40s. and upwards. One side of the old principle of local government—viz., co-operation with the Crown by unpaid local work—remained; but the other side of it—the principle that this work is shared by the freemen of the shire—was long lost to view; and the quarter and petty sessions, aided by a few permanent officials, and relieved by the central power's larger assumption to itself of local duties (as in the regulation of prisons), supplanted the county court.

The county court for general purposes now only exists for the election of coroners, and (in theory) for the proclamation of outlawry and publication of acts of parliament. But the shire retains its own officers, lord-lieutenant, and sheriffs, justices, coroners, and chief constable; through the justices it managed its own police, high roads, and bridges, and imposed rates until the Local Government Act of 1888 (51 and 52 Vict., c. 41) established county councils. These bodies have taken over the administrative duties of the magistrates, except that the latter retain a share in the control of the police, and are a court of appeal in licensing questions. The administrative counties, however, differ slightly from the historic areas. The county courts, under paid judges, set up in 1846 for better dispatch of the lesser judicial business, vary in number according to the needs of each county. Their institution has been a great success. But in size and functions they are more like hundred courts revived and centralized; and historically their name is a misnomer.

Court Leet. [LEET.]

Courtenay, EDWARD, EARL OF DEVON (d. 1556), was the son of Henry Courtenay, Marquis of Exeter, who was the son of Sir William Courtenay and Catherine, daughter of Edward IV. After the execution of his father in 1538, for conspiring in favour of Reginald Pole, he was sent to the Tower, and confined there until his release by Mary, in 1553. Whilst still in prison he was spoken of as the probable future husband of the queen. On the announcement of Mary's determination to wed Philip of Spain, a strong party gathered round Courtenay, and urged him to marry the Princess Elizabeth and to declare her queen, whilst they undertook to rouse the country, and to gather together a sufficient number of men to ensure success. The chief of the conspirators were Sir Thomas Wyatt, Sir James Crofts, and the Duke of Suffolk. The plot was, however, betrayed to Gardiner by Courtenay, and the rebellion was easily crushed by the courage of the queen. Courtenay, mistrusted and despised for his weakness, was sent back to the Tower, and shortly afterwards exiled. He died at Padua in 1556.

Courtenay, WILLIAM (1342 ?–96), Archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of Hugh Courtenay, Earl of Devon. He studied at Oxford and was appointed chancellor of the university in 1367. Two years later he was elected Bishop of Hereford, and although under age, was consecrated by papal permission in the following year. He became Bishop of London in 1375. He strongly opposed John of Gaunt and Wyclif, and it was before Courtenay that the latter appeared in 1377. In 1381 he was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury, and chancellor, but the latter office he held only for a few months. In 1382 he again attacked Wyclif, obtained a condemnation of his views by a specially-appointed council of learned ecclesiastics, obliged the university of Oxford to withdraw their support from him, and compelled several of his leading disciples to make a public recantation. Courtenay, though opposing Wyclif's views, was also a strong opponent of papal aggression and played a part in the passing of the Statute of Præmunire in 1393. He also resisted the attempt of parliament to tax the clergy without their consent, and the king was compelled to allow the money to be voted by convocation. The election of Courtenay marks an epoch in the history of the Church; he was the first of the aristocratic primates, and after his time the see of Canterbury and many other bishoprics were conferred upon members of noble houses, instead of being given as a reward to ministers or judges, or as a recognition of learning to some great scholar.

H. Wallon, "Richard II," 1864.

Courtenay, WILLIAM, EARL OF DEVON (d. 1511), was brother-in-law of Henry VII's queen, by his marriage with Edward IV's daughter, Catherine. When Perkin Warbeck, in the latter part of the year 1497, followed up his landing in Cornwall by the active siege of the city of Exeter, the Earl of Devon was foremost among the English nobles in a show of loyalty to Henry VII, and made a special effort to relieve the city before the arrival of the succours sent for that purpose by the king himself. In 1504, however, being implicated in the proceedings of the fugitive Earl of Suffolk by the evidence of one of Henry VII's spies, Sir Robert Curson, Courtenay was attainted, and deprived of his estates by the parliament of that year, under the Speakership of Dudley, and was kept a close prisoner in the Tower during the remainder of the king's life.

Courts of Law. [See THE INDEX.]

Coutances, WALTER DE (d. 1207), was one of Henry II's ministers, and became successively Bishop of Lincoln and Archbishop of Rouen. He accompanied Richard I on his crusade, but in 1191 was sent back to England by the king, for the purpose of superseding Longchamp. The archbishop held the justiciarship from 1191 to 1194, when he was summoned to join Richard in Germany. On the king's release he remained as a hostage for the payment of the ten thousand marks still owing for the king's ransom. In 1196, however, he quarrelled with Richard, and the king refusing to give way, he laid Normandy under an interdict, until a compromise was effected. He supported the claims of John in 1199, but on the loss of Normandy transferred his allegiance without scruple to Philip Augustus.

Covenant, THE. It was the old Scottish custom for those who were united in any great cause to bind themselves together by a bond to stand by one another to the death in support of their cause. Such a bond was the Covenant which plays so large a part in the history of the Reformation in Scotland. It was originally a private bond, by which the barons who upheld the first preachers of reform bound themselves together for mutual support and the destruction of popery in 1557. In 1581, when there was a general dread of the revival of popery, a similar bond, entering more into detail concerning the superstitions and religious errors that were to be combated, was drawn up by the Protestant ministers. The king, James I, was the first to sign it, and his example was followed by the courtiers and then by the people. This is generally known as the First Covenant. In 1638, when Charles I tried to force the English liturgy on the Church of Scotland, the popular indignation found a vent in a revival of this Covenant, with a clause added to it directed against the bishops. The enthusiasm about it was universal. It was signed through the length and breadth of the land, by high and low alike, and from this time the "Covenant" became the watchword and war-cry of the Presbyterian party. In 1643, when the English parliament sought Scottish aid, the Scots demanded that the mutual engagements of the two nations should be confirmed by a pact to which both nations should be sworn. Accordingly the Solemn League and Covenant was drawn up by Henderson, amended by Vane, adopted by the Westminster Assembly (q.v.), passed by the parliament, and ordered to be subscribed and sworn to by the nation. But the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, in 1643, though they approved the Covenant, disappointed the Scots, who hoped to see it imposed on the whole English nation. When Charles II, on the invitation of the Estates, came to Scotland to claim the kingdom in 1650, he was compelled to sign the Covenant before he was allowed to land, and the signature was repeated at his coronation. Notwithstanding this, after the Restoration, by the king's order, the Covenant was burned by the common hangman in London, and an act abjuring and condemning it as an unlawful oath was passed by the privy council of Scotland in 1662. The extreme Presbyterian party were greatly disappointed that the act of 1690, approving the confession, did not enjoin the renewing of the Covenant. The Covenant was not merely a declaration of belief, but a solemn engagement binding its adherents to force their belief upon others.

The name of Covenanters was first taken by the popular party after the renewal of the Covenant in 1638, and borne by them throughout the Civil War. But it is more generally associated with the insurgents of the reign of Charles II who took arms in defence of the Presbyterian form of church government. As the Covenantan had by that time been denounced as a seditious oath, those who persisted in maintaining it were naturally looked upon as rebels against the government. They were, however, treated with unwarrantable severity. When, in 1662, the act was passed for the re-establishment of Episcopacy, the Presbyterian ministers who refused to acknowledge the bishops were ejected from their parishes. Round these "outed ministers," as they were called, the Covenanters rallied and gathered in crowds on the hill-sides or any lonely place, to attend their ministrations. These meetings, called "conventicles," were denounced as seditious, and to frequent them or to hold any "intercommuning" with any persons who frequented them, was forbidden on pain of death. These severe measures provoked the Covenanters to take up arms in defence of their religious opinions, and led to a rebellion so widespread that it almost amounted to a civil war. The first serious action between the king's troops and the Covenanters was in the hill-country on the borders of the counties of Ayr and Lanark. Here, at Drumclog (q.v.), a farm near Loudon Hill, a party of armed Covenanters who were gathered at a conventicle were attacked by a body of dragoons under John Graham, of Claverhouse, and gained a victory over their assailants (1679). After this success, the numbers of the insurgents increased so rapidly that the government became alarmed, and an army, 15,000 strong, was sent against them under the command of the Duke of Monmouth. He defeated them on the banks of the Clyde, at Bothwell Bridge (q.v.), where 1,200 were made prisoners, June 22, 1679. In consequence of a treasonable protest called the Sanguhar Declaration (q.v.), put forth by the Covenanters, all persons who wished to free themselves of suspicion of complicity with them were required to take what was called the Abjuration Oath (q.v.), and the soldiers who were sent to scour the country in search of rebels were empowered to kill anyone who refused to take the oath. The sufferings of the Covenanters were extreme. Numbers of them were put to death with great cruelty, but suffering only strengthened their resolute spirit, and it was not until after the accession of William, when the "outed ministers" were restored to their pulpits, and adherence to the Covenant ceased to be a crime, that the Covenanters abandoned their attitude of defiance. But some extreme Covenanters refused to acknowledge a king whose acceptance of Episcopacy in England was, they thought, treason against the divine right of presbyters. They formed the earliest dissenting Presbyterian sects in Scotland. [CAMERONIANS.]

Coventry (Warwick) seems to have owed its importance to the magnificent Benedictine abbey founded by Leofric and his wife, Godgifu, in 1043. The town became a prosperous trading centre. In 1345 Edward III gave Coventry a corporation, mayor, and bailiffs, empowered to hold pleas and keep the town prison. In 1452 it was created with the surrounding hamlets a county of itself. The beautiful abbey church was almost destroyed by Henry VIII; but several fine specimens of mediæval ecclesiastical architecture remain. It was at Coventry that the "Unlearned Parliament" met in 1404. In the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries Coventry was an important centre of the cloth and woollen trade. Its citizens were strongly Parliamentary in the Civil War; and to punish them their walls were levelled after the Restoration. The town returned two members to parliament from the reign of Edward I until 1885, when the number was reduced to one.

M. D. Harris, "Story of Coventry," 1911.

Coventry, SIR JOHN (d. 1682), was the grandson of Lord Keeper Coventry and nephew of Sir William Coventry (q.v. below). He became a member of parliament in 1667. Three years later, when, having somewhat freely expressed his opinion about the royal mistresses, he incurred the displeasure of the court, he was set upon by a band of ruffians sent by Monmouth, half-murdered, and his nose slit with a penknife. This outrage led to the passing of an act against unlawful maiming and wounding, which was known as the Coventry Act (1670).

Coventry, THOMAS, 1ST LORD (1578-1640), son of Sir T. Coventry, judge of the Common Pleas, in 1616 was chosen recorder of London, and in 1617 was made solicitor-general, being advanced four years later to the attorney-generalship. In 1625, chiefly through Buckingham's interest, he was made lord keeper, and in 1628 was created Lord Coventry. He has been accused of advising some of Charles's most arbitrary acts, among them the refusal of the summons to Lord Bristol, and the imprisonment of the Earl of Arundel, though it has been objected to this that he was only "the messenger of the king and the organ of the House." In 1635 and 1636 he enjoined the judges in their charge to the grand juries to urge the people to pay the ship-money with cheerfulness, but he took no part in the trial of Hampden for refusing to pay his share. One of his last acts was to advise the king to summon parliament, but he died before the assembling of the Short Parliament.

Clarendon, "History of the Rebellion," 1702-4.

Coventry, SIR WILLIAM (1626-86), was the youngest son of Lord Keeper Coventry. In 1662 he was appointed commissioner of the admiralty; in 1665 he was knighted and made a privy councillor; and in 1667 he became a commissioner of the treasury. Having quarrelled with the Duke of Buckingham, he challenged him to fight a duel, for which he was banished from the court, and retired into private life. He was the author of several political tracts, the most interesting of which is "The Character of a Trimmer," published in 1688.

Coverdale, Miles (1488-1568), was one of the earliest English reformers. He is said by Foxe to have assisted Tyndale in his translation of the Pentateuch, and in 1535 he issued a translation of the Bible in his own name. He was on close terms of friendship with Cromwell, and in 1538 was sent by that minister to Paris to bring out the translation known as the Lord Cromwell's Bible, or the Great Bible. Before the work was finished an edict was issued forbidding its prosecution; and Coverdale was obliged to return to England to complete his undertaking. In 1540 he edited the second "Great Bible," or Cranmer's Bible, of which a reprint was issued in 1562. On Cromwell's fall Coverdale went to Tübingen, and travelled in Denmark and other continental countries. He returned to England in 1548 and was appointed chaplain to Edward VI. In 1551 he was made Bishop of Exeter, but was removed from his see and imprisoned by order of Queen Mary. He was subsequently released at the instance of Christian of Denmark, to whose territories he repaired. After several years spent among the continental reformers of Germany and Switzerland he returned to England on the accession of Elizabeth, and assisted at the consecration of Archbishop Parker, though, owing to his Calvinistic views, he did not again obtain his see. In 1563 he was collated by Grindal to the living of St. Magnus, London; but when, three years later, the government decided to enforce a stricter observance of the liturgy he resigned the benefice although he continued his preaching in secret. He died in 1568 at the ripe age of eighty.

"Selections from Coverdale's Works" (2 vols., Parker Society), 1844-6.

Cowell, John (1554-1611), was a Cambridge civilian who became master of Trinity Hall and reader in Civil Law. In 1607 he published a work called "The Interpreter," which was an explanation of legal terms and theories. The book gave great offence to the common-lawyers. At the instigation probably of Coke, a great enemy of Cowell, an inquiry into the character of the book was ordered by the House of Commons in 1610, and the king was advised to suppress it, because of the unconstitutional doctrines it contained on the subject of the royal prerogative and the rights of the people. The book was burnt by the common hangman.

Cowper, William, 1st Earl (d. 1723), was born at Hertford. After studying at the Temple, he was called to the bar in 1688, and from this time rose rapidly in his profession.

On the landing of the Prince of Orange, he raised a troop of horse in his support. His abilities as a Chancery barrister soon attracted Somers's notice, and in 1695 he was returned to parliament for Hertford. In 1696 he supported the bill for the attainder of Sir John Fenwick. In 1702 William Cowper lost his seat for Hertford, owing to the unpopularity caused in the borough by the trial of his brother Spencer for murder. In 1705, on the dismissal of Sir Nathan Wright, he became lord keeper and commissioner of the Scottish Union. In 1706 he was raised to the Upper House, and became the first lord chancellor of Great Britain; but the sentence pronounced by him in this capacity on Sacheverell was influenced by party spirit, and unworthy of his reputation. In opposition to the rest of the ministry, he was in favour of making peace with France during the last years of the Succession War; and he vigorously opposed Marlborough's request to be made captain-general for life. On the fall of the Whigs, Cowper resigned, in spite of the solicitations of Harley, who wished for a composite ministry. On the accession of George I, he received the great seal, and was favoured with the king's entire confidence. His sentences on the rebels of 1715 have been censured as too severe. He was one of the chief advocates of the Septennial Act (q.v.). In 1718 he resigned office, probably because George accused him of espousing the Prince of Wales's side in his quarrel with the court. He promptly became leader of the opposition, and withstood almost alone the Peerage Bill, and the bill of pains and penalties against Atterbury. In his later years he was accused, probably without reason, of tampering with the Jacobites.

Cox, Richard (1500-81), Bishop of Ely, made dean of Christ Church and of Westminster by Henry VIII, was one of the tutors of Edward VI, the others being Sir John Cheke and Sir Anthony Cooke. During the reign of Mary he was compelled with the Protestants to take refuge at Frankfort; but returned to England on the accession of Elizabeth, by whom he was made Bishop of Ely (1559). It was a remonstrance from Bishop Cox against the injustice done him by the bestowal of his land on Sir Christopher Hatton that drew forth the celebrated letter from Queen Elizabeth: "Proud prelate, you know what you were before I made you what you are. If you do not immediately comply with my request, by God I will unfrock you." Cox is described as "an honest but narrow-spirited and peevish man."

Coyne and Livery was an ancient right or custom in Ireland which enabled the lord or chief to quarter his soldiery on his tenants, and to exact pay and provender for horse and man. It was adopted by the Anglo-Norman settlers, who sought to add to their feudal rights the prerogatives of Gaelic chiefs; and became so general that even the loyal Butlers enforced it. The custom was intensely unpopular with the English tenantry and was the subject of constant complaints by the Irish parliament. It was forbidden by the Statute of Kilkenny, 1366 (q.v.), and again in 1409-10, but the difficulty of providing for the defence of the Pale inclined the government to connive at the system and it was not finally abolished until 1603. Spenser complains of its abolition as a wrong done to the Irish landlord.

Craggs, JAMES, THE ELDER (d. 1721), was postmaster-general during the earlier years of George I's reign. He was accused with his son of frauds in connexion with the South Sea Company, and died while the accusation was still pending. He is said to have committed suicide.

Craggs, JAMES, THE YOUNGER (d. 1721), second son of James Craggs the elder, was a Whig politician. During the reign of Anne he was employed in minor diplomatic business. He was consulted by Marlborough on the question of the duke's obtaining the appointment of captain-general for life. In 1714, as the queen lay dying, he was dispatched to Hanover, with instructions to bid Lord Stafford to request the States General of Holland to guarantee the Protestant succession. In 1717 he became secretary at war, and, on the retirement of Addison, secretary of state (1718). He was accused of fraud in connexion with the South Sea Company, but died of small-pox on the day that the report was presented to the Commons.

Craig, GENERAL SIR JAMES (1748-1812), after greatly distinguishing himself in the American War of Independence, especially at the battle of Bunker Hill (q.v.), was appointed governor of Jersey in 1793. In 1795 he went out to the Cape, and held the post of governor for two years, when he was sent to India, where his military experience was much needed. In 1807 he became governor-general of Canada, and in that capacity rendered himself extremely unpopular. His measures were arbitrary in the extreme, and it is to his treatment of the assembly, and his refusal to grant any concessions or to consider the question of any redress of grievances, that the discontent which was so prevalent in Canada at this time was due.

Craig, JAMES, VISCOUNT CRAIGAVON (b. 1871) Irish politician, served in the Boer War, and became a member of parliament for County Down in 1906. He was treasurer of the household in the coalition government of 1916, parliamentary secretary to the ministry of pensions in 1919, financial secretary to the admiralty in 1920, and prime minister of Northern Ireland after the Government of Ireland Act in 1921. In the latter year he became also a privy councillor. He repudiated the treaty between Northern and Southern Ireland negotiated at the Downing Street Conference of 1922, but succeeded in restoring order in Ireland after a fresh period of bloodshed, and settled all outstanding points of difference by the agreement of December 3, 1925. He was created a viscount in 1927.

Craig, JOHN (d. 1600), was the friend and coadjutor of John Knox, on whose death he became for a time the acknowledged leader of the Kirk party, for whom he drew up the National Covenant in 1580. In 1584, however, on the Scottish Estates taking action to restrain the power of the clergy, Craig went over to the opposite side.

Craigmillar Castle, three miles from Edinburgh, was the scene of the supposed murder of the Earl of Mar, brother of James III, in 1479. It was burnt by Hertford, 1544, but afterwards rebuilt for Queen Mary, who spent a good deal of time there. It is said to have been at Craigmillar that Bothwell, Moray, Morton, and Maitland of Lethington formed their agreement to kill Darnley (1566).

Crampton Question, THE (1856), arose out of the Crimean War. British policy during the war included the raising of foreign corps in British pay, and John Crampton, the British minister at Washington, carried out Palmerston's instructions in this direction so thoroughly (even recruiting soldiers in the United States) that he was dismissed by President Franklin Pierce. A period of high tension ensued between the British and United States governments. Crampton became a K.C.B. for his services, though he was not sent back to Washington.

[GATHORNE-HARDY.]

Cranmer, THOMAS (1489-1556), Archbishop of Canterbury, the son of a Nottinghamshire gentleman, at the age of fourteen entered Jesus College, Cambridge, where he was, in 1510, elected to a fellowship. In 1523 he was ordained, and continued at the university, lecturing and teaching. Forced to leave the town to avoid infection in the sweating sickness of 1528, he was accidentally thrown into the company of Foxe and Gardiner, the commissioners engaged on the question of the royal divorce, and in course of conversation mentioned his own conclusion, that the marriage was not merely voidable, but void, being contrary to the law of God, and that its dissolution could therefore be pronounced by the English ecclesiastical courts without reference to Rome. The commissioners were greatly struck, and reported the matter to Henry, who lost no time in sending for Cranmer and ordering him to write a treatise in support of his thesis. Soon after we find him employed as legal adviser to two important embassies to the pope and the emperor respectively, which, though unsuccessful, were not fruitless. The papal mission discovered a singular consensus among Italian jurists in Henry's favour, while in Germany Cranmer's visits to the theologians proved more favourable to his own than to his master's suit, and before his return he was secretly married to Margaret Anne, a niece of Osiander, a prominent reformer. The marriage being uncanonical, though not illegal, put him entirely at the king's mercy when he became primate. Henry's plans had meanwhile been maturing; further delay would have ruined the legitimacy of Anne Boleyn's offspring, and on the death of Warham the archbishopric of Canterbury was offered to Cranmer. No sooner was the ceremony of installation over (March 30, 1533), than the new archbishop wrote the king a colusive letter, demanding, in the name of the nation, that the scandal should be terminated; and, the case being fairly brought before his court, gave judgment that the marriage was void ab initio, May 23, 1533. He had now performed his task, and withdrew into a literary retirement, which, broken only in 1536 and 1540 by the pronouncement of two more iniquitous sentences of divorce, lasted till the fall of Cromwell, a minister as little inclined to endure a rival as Cranmer to become one. From that date his greater prominence is attested by two plots formed by the reactionary party for his destruction, from which he was preserved only by the unswerving confidence of the king. Yet at no time can he be called a politician: his influence was wholly personal, and confined to Henry, on whose death he again sank into the background. But in this retirement Cranmer was laying the foundations of the new order of things. On his elevation to the primacy he had but two points of sympathy with the continental Protestants—reputation of the papal supremacy and the translation of the Scriptures. But the patristic studies with which he maintained the attack on the papacy gradually unveiled to him the features of a more apostolic and spiritual Christianity, whose truths he accepted, one by one, as conviction was forced upon his mind, till, in 1550, he published his book against Transubstantiation, wherein is maintained the Anglican doctrine of the Real, as against the Corporeal, Presence. Cranmer's reconstitution of the church services remains his real title to greatness. His was a formative, not a creative, intellect, and, while his revision of the old Uses may be ranked for beauty and dignity with the Authorized Version of the Bible, his attempt to replace the Roman Canon Law is a monument of mistaken energy. Throughout all these reforms, his appeal is not from superstition to reason, but from the Church corrupt to the Church pure; nothing illustrates his catholic position better than his own words before the commission at Oxford:—"If it can be proved by any doctor above 1,000 years after Christ, that Christ's body is there in the eucharist really present, I will give all over."

During Edward's reign Cranmer was concerned in two political acts of great importance. At the coronation the archbishop, on his own responsibility, altered the position of the coronation oath, putting it after the expression of the popular assent. This innovation, by destroying the conditional character of that assent, amounted to the assertion of absolute hereditary right. The second act was the signing of Edward's illegal device for the succession, which was, however, performed with the greatest reluctance, and on the assurance of the judges. It sufficed to secure his condemnation for high treason on Mary's accession. The new government seems at first to have had no desire to shed blood; but Cranmer, the pilot of the Reformation, could not seize the numerous opportunities of escape which were offered; he remained, either overrating his own strength or underrating the impending danger. With his two bosom friends, Latimer and Ridley, he was taken to Oxford (March 1554) to hold an academical disputation, having spent the preceding three months in the Tower. After a parody of controversy, all three were summoned before a synod of presbyters and condemned as heretics. His friends suffered before him: the archbishop's case was delayed by the necessity of application to the papal court, and by the desire of Cardinal Pole to ruin the cause of heresy by the recantation of the heresiarch. In the latter aim he succeeded. Cranmer was at first induced to accept the papal supremacy, not as a doctrine, but as a fact, and his defence once broken down, and honour lost, he was led on to sign a detailed abjuration of all his anti-papal convictions. Fortunately for the Reformation, the queen had resolved on his destruction, and to the public eye Cranmer died a martyr (March 21, 1556). How far repentance preceded the knowledge of his fate must be left to conjecture. At the worst, he should be judged by his life, not by one failure under an overwhelming temptation. He was a man of deep piety and honesty of purpose, and in private life his sweet temper exercised a peculiar fascination; but a certain moral weakness taints his whole career, and leaves his character one of the most difficult to estimate in history.

Crayford, in Kent, about thirteen miles from London, is usually identified with Creccanford, where, in 457 (?), the Britons were entirely routed by Hengest and Æsc.

Crécy, THE BATTLE OF (August 26, 1346), was fought between the English, under King Edward III, and the French, commanded by Philip VI. The English army had landed on the coast of Normandy, near La Hogue, on July 12, and Edward had then intended to cross the Seine, march through Picardy into Artois, and there join his Flemish auxiliaries, who had already crossed the French frontier. But when he arrived at Rouen he found the bridges over the Seine broken, and the French army on the opposite shore. Edward marched along the river almost to the suburbs of Paris, and burnt St. Germain and Neuilly, and at length (August 17) by a stratagem succeeded in crossing the river at Poissy, advanced towards the Somme, and crossed at Blanchetaque, near Abbeville. Not far from this town, at Crécy, he halted, and allowed the French to come up (August 26). The army was drawn up the following morning in three divisions or battles on the western slopes of the Maye valley. The first, under the command of the Black Prince, occupied the right, near the village of Crécy. The second division, under the Earls of Northampton and Arundel, held the slopes of the upper portion of the Vallée aux Clercs—a lateral depression running down into the Maye valley in a north and south direction—and had the village of Wadicourt on its left. The third division was held in reserve under the king, on some slightly rising ground in the rear, on which was situated a windmill whence Edward was able to watch the progress of the battle. The English men-at-arms left their horses in the rear; while the archers of the two forward battles were drawn up on the flanks at such an angle as to enable them to harass the advancing enemy by the discharge of converging volleys of arrows. According to Froissart, the whole army did not amount to more than 8,000 men; but this estimate is probably too low. The French forces are computed at the no less improbably high total of from 60,000 to 120,000. The French army marched from Abbeville at sunrise, and arrived at Crécy in considerable confusion. The battle was begun by the advance of a large body of Genoese, armed with crossbows. But the Genoese, whose bowstrings had been wetted in a recent storm, fell into disorder before the shooting of the English archers. The French cavalry, under the Duke of Alençon, then fell impetuously upon the English first and second divisions. After a desperate conflict, during which the king was more than once requested to bring up the reserves, the French cavalry retired in the greatest disorder, and Philip himself fled from the field. The French fought on in a desultory manner till night, and not till the following morning was it discovered that the French army was completely scattered and routed. The English losses were insignificant, but on the French side the flower of the French nobility had fallen. Among the dead were the blind king, John of Bohemia, and Louis of Nevers, Count of Flanders.

Detailed account of the battle is in Froissart, c. 126; and G. Wrottesley, "Crecy and Calais," 1898.

Creones, THE, were an ancient Celtic tribe, said to have dwelt on the west coast of Ross.

Cressingham, HUGH (d. 1297), was appointed treasurer of Scotland by Edward I in 1296, on Baliol's surrender of the crown of Scotland, at the same time that the Earl of Surrey was appointed guardian. His endeavours to execute the command of the English king that Scotland was to be reduced to a state of order incurred the hatred of the Scots, and the national party under Wallace made rapid strides. Cressingham was slain at the battle of Stirling, in which, although a clerk, he took an active part, and which was lost by the English in a great measure owing to his precipitancy.

Crevant, THE BATTLE OF (July 31, 1423), was won by the English and Burgundian troops, under the Earl of Salisbury and others, against a mixed force consisting primarily of French and Scots, with levies from Spain and Lombardy. The English were completely victorious. Sir John Stewart of Darnley, the leader of the Scottish contingent, was slain, and many nobles were either killed or taken prisoner. This victory, which was fought on the banks of the Yonne, near Auxerre, saved Burgundy from invasion, and greatly crippled the power of the French.

Crichton, SIR WILLIAM, chancellor of Scotland, was governor of Edinburgh Castle at the death of James I (1437). In his endeavours to get possession of the young king's person, he was brought into rivalry with Sir Alexander Livingston, from whom he carried off James II, only, however, to surrender him again on consideration of receiving certain lands as a reward. In conjunction with Livingston, he planned and carried out the murder of William, Earl of Douglas, and his brother. He was for some time at war with the Douglas family, who formed an alliance with Livingston, and was besieged by them in Edinburgh Castle, in 1445. In 1450, however, his old rival was attainted, and Crichton reigned supreme in the king's favour. He died in 1454, two years after James's assassination of James Douglas.

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Crimean War, fought between Russia on the one hand, and Great Britain, France, Turkey, and Sardinia on the other, began in 1854, and lasted till 1856. It is called the Crimean War because the main operation of it consisted in the attack made by the allied forces on the peninsula of the Crimea in the south of Russia. The dispute between Russia and Turkey had arisen ostensibly about the guardianship of the Holy Places, especially the Holy Sepulchre, in Jerusalem; but the root cause of it lay much deeper. Turkey, the old enemy of Russia, had gradually retired from the Balkan countries she had originally conquered, and, as her power decayed, had become more and more unfit to rule over Christian populations. Russia, who had emancipated herself from Tartar thralldom, was deeply interested in protecting the Slavonic races still under Turkish rule, which were of the same blood and origin as herself. She also had a natural desire to extend her power to the Dardanelles, and to open a way for her commerce into the Mediterranean. [VIENNA CONFERENCE.] The Emperor Nicholas I wrote of Turkey as "a sick man dying," and his plan for dividing his possessions included the formation of the Danubian principalities, Serbia and Bulgaria, into principalities under the suzerainty of Russia, and the occupation of Egypt and Candia by Great Britain. Constantinople was to be held neither by Russia, France, Great Britain, nor Greece. Sir Stratford Canning, the British ambassador at Constantinople, was an enemy of Russia. The Emperor of the French was desirous of a European war for the consolidation of his throne. On July 2, 1853, the Russian troops crossed the River Pruth, and occupied the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia. On October 23 war was declared, and on November 30 the Turkish fleet was destroyed in the harbour of Sinope. Lord Aberdeen, the British prime minister, strained every nerve to preserve peace, but Lord Palmerston, foreign secretary, declared that he would resign unless a strong course against Russia were adopted. The country gradually "drifted into war." On February 27, 1854, an ultimatum was sent by the government, which declared that unless the Russian troops retired behind the River Pruth before the end of April, their advance would be considered as a declaration of war. No reply was made, and after the abortive attempt at mediation by the powers, enshrined in the Vienna Note of July 31, the war took its course.

Austria and Prussia contracted an offensive and defensive alliance, by which they guaranteed each other's possessions in case of attack. They also prepared their forces in readiness for war. The alliance between Great Britain and France was signed on April 10. The plan of operations was very simple. As Russia could be attacked only in her extremities, and Great Britain could act only upon a sea base, there were not many places into which the two combatants could come into conflict. A fleet sailed into the Baltic, under Admiral Napier, with great expectations of success, which were not realized. On September 14 the allied forces landed in the Crimea. They consisted of 24,000 British, 22,000 French, and 8,000 Turkish troops. Their object was to capture Sebastopol, a powerful fortress, which the Russians had recently constructed at great expense. On September 20 the Russians were defeated by the allied armies at the passage of the Alma (q.v.). It might have been possible to take Sebastopol by a coup de main, but it was thought more prudent to besiege it from the south. A brilliant flank march was executed, and the harbour of Balaclava was occupied by the British as a base of operations. On October 25 was fought the battle of Balaclava, signalized by the famous charge of the six hundred light cavalry upon the Russian guns [BALACLAVA, THE BATTLE OF], and the far more effective charge of the heavy cavalry, under General Scarlett. On November 5 the British troops were attacked in the early morning by large masses of Russians, and held their ground with great steadiness until the afternoon. This was the battle of Inkerman (q.v.), in which the defenders lost 2,612 killed and wounded, and the Russians, it is said, 12,000. The winter tried the British troops severely. Notwithstanding the devotion of Florence Nightingale in nursing the sick, the supply of hospital accommodation was insufficient, and the commissariat broke down. This caused great indignation in England, and Lord Aberdeen was succeeded as prime minister by Lord Palmerston. In December the allied fleet in the Baltic was broken up, and returned home; and on March 2 the Emperor of Russia died. This caused but a slight hope of peace; the fleet returned to the Baltic on April 4, and the bombardment of Sebastopol began five days later. On June 7 the French succeeded in carrying the Mamelon, one of the Sebastopol forts, but an attack made by the allied forces on the Redan and the Malakhoff forts, on June 18, was unsuccessful; and on June 28 Lord Raglan, the British commander-in-chief, died. On August 16 the French distinguished themselves greatly in the battle of the Tchernaya. After a month's incessant bombardment, a final attack was made on the works of Sebastopol on September 8, the result of which was that the Russians evacuated the town and retreated to the north side of the harbour. They blew up their forts as far as they could, and left their wounded behind them. The news reached England on September 10. This practically put an end to the war in the Crimea. Before the end of the year negotiations for peace were begun by the friendly intervention of Austria. The French government were even more anxious for a settlement than the British. The points on which Russia found it most difficult to make concessions were the limitation of her power in the Black Sea, and the cession of a part of Bessarabia to Rumania. The provisions on these points were cancelled in 1871 and 1878 respectively. [BLACK SEA CONFERENCE; BERLIN TREATY.] The Peace of Paris (q.v.), which terminated the war, was signed on Sunday, March 30, 1856. The last British forces left the Crimea on July 12. The British lost 24,000 soldiers during the war, the French 63,500, and the Russians, it is said, 500,000. The war added £41,000,000 to the National Debt.

Crinan (CRONAN, d. 1045), lay abbot of Dunkeld, was a powerful and warlike chieftain, who married a daughter of Malcolm I, by whom he had a son, Duncan, King of Scotland 1034-40. Crinan was slain in battle (1045) whilst fighting against Macbeth.

Crofts (or CROFT), SIR JAMES (d. 1590), was made deputy of Ireland in 1551, his tenure of office being marked by the distress suffered by the country owing to the debasement of coinage. In 1554 he took arms against Queen Mary in Sir Thomas Wyatt's rebellion, and was sent to the Tower in consequence. Under Elizabeth, Crofts became commander on the Scottish border, and in 1560 crossed the border with the English expedition under Lord Grey. His mismanagement at the assault on Leith in 1560 caused the repulse of the English, and in consequence Crofts was deprived of his command and sent to London. He subsequently played a prominent part in parliamentary life. He was a commissioner at the trial of Mary Queen of Scots in 1586.

Cromer, EVELYN BARING, 1ST EARL (1841-1917). [BARING.]

Cromwell, BRIDGET (1624-81), was the eldest daughter of Oliver Cromwell. She is described as being "a gloomy enthusiast, and so bigoted a republican that she even grudged her father the title of Protector." She married Henry Ireton (q.v.), and subsequently Charles Fleetwood (q.v.).

Cromwell, ELIZABETH (1629-58), was the second and favourite daughter of the Protector. She is said to have been firmly attached to the royal cause, and it is certain that she frequently interceded on behalf of Royalist prisoners.

Cromwell, FRANCES, LADY RUSSELL (1638-1721), the youngest child of Oliver Cromwell. According to Burnet, Charles II thought of asking for her hand to secure his own restoration, but this is scarcely probable. In 1657 she became the wife of Robert Rich, grandson of Lord Warwick, who, however, died in three months. She subsequently married Sir John Russell, by whom she had a large family.

Cromwell, HENRY (1628-74), was the youngest son of Oliver Cromwell. He entered the Parliamentary army in 1642, and before he was twenty obtained a troop in Fairfax's life-guards. In 1650 he attained the rank of a colonel, and accompanied his father to Ireland. He was a member of the "Barebones" Parliament of 1653, and in 1655, after being sent over to Ireland to observe the condition of affairs in that country, was made lord deputy. His government of Ireland was exceedingly popular, and the moderation and justice of his measures pleased all except the extremists of either side. On the triumph of the parliamentary party over the Protector he was superseded, and retired into private life.

Cromwell, OLIVER (b. April 25, 1599, d. September 3, 1658), was a native of Huntingdon, the son of Robert Cromwell and Elizabeth Steward, and connected by blood with the family of Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex. He was educated at Huntingdon School, and at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, where he entered as a fellow-commoner on April 23, 1616. On his father's death in the following year he returned home, married Elizabeth Bourchier (August 1620), and settled down to farm his own lands. He was elected member for Huntingdon in 1628, and complained against the Bishop of Winchester for silencing controversial preaching. In the Short Parliament and the Long Parliament he represented Cambridge, and soon attained considerable influence. It has been ascertained that within the first ten months of the Long Parliament Cromwell was specially appointed to eighteen committees, exclusive of various positions which he shared with the knights and burgesses generally of the eastern counties. He moved the second reading of the Annual Parliament Bill (December 30, 1640), and was one of those who drew up the Root and Branch Bill (q.v.). On religious questions he was specially active, and he had decided to emigrate if the Grand Remonstrance had not passed. He was also one of the foremost in laying hands on the executive power, and moved (November 6, 1641) to entrust the Earl of Essex with power over the trained bands till parliament should take further order. In the summer of 1642 he began arming and drilling the Cambridge Trained Bands, and seized the plate of that university to prevent it from being carried to the king. He served at Edgehill at the head of the troop of horse which he had raised, and is mentioned by Fiennes as doing good service. In January 1643 he secured the town of Cambridge, and arrested the Royalist sheriff of Hertfordshire. In March he suppressed a rising at Lowestoft; in April he raised the siege of Crowland; on May 13 defeated the Royalists of Newark at Grantham; in July he retook Stamford, captured Burghley House, and relieved Gainsborough. His services were recognized by his appointment as governor of the Isle of Ely, and second in command of the army of the Eastern Association, which his activity had made it possible to form (August 1643). Next month he joined the cavalry of Sir Thomas Fairfax, in Lincolnshire, and helped to gain the victory of Winceby, where he commanded the van (October 11, 1643). In the following year he led the left wing at Marston Moor, which, after driving Prince Rupert's division from the field, fell on Newcastle's foot in the centre and decided the victory. He was also present at the second battle of Newbury (October 27, 1644), and a month later charged his commander, the Earl of Manchester, with slackness in making use of the advantages then gained. Lest the war should be protracted by the self-interest or incapacity of members of parliament, he supported the Self-denying Ordinance (q.v.), and the formation of a regular army officered by professional soldiers. In spite of that law, his services were too valuable to be dispensed with. In February 1645 he was sent on an expedition into the west under Waller. When he returned to resign his command he was ordered into Oxfordshire to intercept a convoy going to Oxford, which he performed at Islip (April 24). On May 10 he was continued in his command for forty days longer, and Fairfax was authorized to appoint him to command the horse, and this appointment was confirmed and extended from time to time. At Naseby (July 14, 1645) he commanded the right wing, totally routed the forces opposed to him, and, keeping his troopers well in hand, led them against the king's centre with equal success. With Fairfax he then went into the west, was present at the storming of Bristol, and at the battle of Langport. Winchester, Basing House, and other fortresses were taken by him, and he took part in the siege of Oxford. During these three years Cromwell had also become the head of a political party. From the moment he took up arms he had sought to enlist men with a religious spirit in them, thinking them the only men able to oppose gentlemen of honour and courage. What their particular form of creed was he cared little. "The state," he declared, "in choosing men to serve it, takes no notice of their opinions; if they be willing to serve it faithfully, that suffices." His enemies termed him "the great Independent," and saw in him the champion of the opposition to the imposition of Presbyterian orthodoxy on England. This question of toleration, with two other questions then at issue between the army and the parliament—the right of the soldiers to be fairly paid for their services, and their claim to have a voice in making a safe and proper settlement with the king—brought him into opposition with the parliament. Matters came to a crisis when, in the spring of 1647, parliament voted the disbanding of the army. Cromwell did his best to prevent a rupture, attempted to mediate and reconcile, and when these attempts failed and he found himself in danger of arrest, cast in his lot with Fairfax and the army (June 3, 1647). After the exclusion of the eleven members he took an active part in the debates of the Commons and the negotiations with the king. There he endeavoured to fix a limit to the establishment of Presbyterianism (October 13), and supported the continuance of the negotiations with the king in spite of his rejection of the nineteen propositions. He hoped to come to an agreement with Charles on the basis of the new propositions, which were a compromise between the demands of the army and the parliament. Even after the king's flight (November 3) he still continued this policy, until the rejection of the four bills (December 28, 1647), and the outbreak of the second Civil War, May 1648, taught him the impossibility of trusting Charles. Probably in March or April 1648, at a prayer meeting of the officers at Windsor, where Cromwell was present, it was decided to call the king to account as soon as peace was restored. Then he marched against the Welsh insurgents (May), took Pembroke (July), hurried north to meet the Scots, and totally defeated them at Preston and Warrington (August 17-19, 1648). He was still in the north when the army again seized the king, and put an end to the Newport Treaty; nor had he any part in Pride's Purge (q.v.), though he approved of both these acts. He was present every day during the king's trial, and his name stands third amongst the fifty-nine attached to the warrant for his execution. Naturally he was nominated one of the council of state, but as he was appointed commander of the army destined for Ireland (March 15), he could not long take part in their sittings. He landed at Dublin August 15, 1649. The storming of Drogheda (September 10) was followed by the massacre of the garrison, which Cromwell justified, first, as a righteous judgment of God, and secondly, as tending to prevent the effusion of blood for the future. Trim, Dundalk, and other towns were at once abandoned; Arklow and Enniscorthy terrified into surrender; Wexford held out, and shared the fate of Drogheda; and the campaign closed with the unsuccessful siege of Waterford. In seven months Leinster had been regained. In the following spring, Kilkenny (March 27, 1650) and Clonmel (May 18) were taken. At the end of May Cromwell returned to England, to command—as Fairfax refused to do so—the army ordered to invade Scotland. For about a month the forces of Cromwell and Leslie manœuvred round Edinburgh, the Scots refusing to give battle, the English declining to attack positions too strong for them. At the end of August Cromwell was forced to retreat to Dunbar, where Leslie attacked him, and was routed with the loss of 3,000 men killed, and 10,000 prisoners (September 3, 1650). Edinburgh and Leith fell into Cromwell's hands; the west of Scotland followed, and before Christmas all the country south of the Forth was in his possession. From February to June 1651 he was ill, and his army inactive. On June 25 he marched against Leslie, who was posted at Stirling, and failing to dislodge him, crossed into Fife, subsequently capturing Perth (August 2). The king's army marched straight into England, and established itself at Worcester, where Cromwell attacked and destroyed it (September 3, 1652). The great influence these services gave him, Cromwell used to secure as speedily as possible the settlement of the country so much needed. In less than a fortnight after his victory he raised the question of a new parliament (September 16), and succeeded in inducing the House to fix a limit for its own power. He became an active member of the commission for law reform, a very zealous supporter of the "Bill for General Pardon and Oblivion," and the champion of freedom of conscience in the committee for the propagation of the gospel. His great object was to use his influence and his position to secure the speedy meeting of the new reformed parliament, which, according to the decision of the Rump, was not to meet till November 1654. The impatience of the army urged him on, and a petition from the council of officers (August 12, 1652) demanded more alacrity in the necessary reforms. The bill which was to settle the constitution of the new assembly seemed to Cromwell and the officers to be meant rather to perpetuate and recruit the Rump than to secure these reforms. He therefore endeavoured to stop this bill by agreement, or to persuade the parliament to delegate their powers; and when he found them still hurrying through the objectionable bill, he put an end to their sitting (April 20, 1653). The result of this action was the separation of the civil and military elements of the republican party, and the continued refusal of the former (with some considerable exceptions) to recognize the authority of the other as legitimate. Cromwell and the council of officers began by appointing a council of state of thirteen persons (April 29—July 4, 1653). Then a representative assembly of Puritan notables was summoned by the council of officers, to effect the necessary reforms. But its reforming zeal seemed to threaten the foundations of law and religion, so the more conservative members resigned their authority into the hands which had entrusted it to them (July 4—December 12, 1653). The council of officers renewed their deliberations under Oliver Cromwell's presidency, and decided to make a single person head of the government. Cromwell was accordingly installed Lord Protector (December 16, 1653), to govern with the aid of a permanent council and a parliament, to be summoned every three years. [INSTRUMENT OF GOVERNMENT.] For nine months protector and council governed, raised money, and legislated without a parliament. His first parliament met on September 3, 1654, and immediately called in question the "Instrument" of government, and claimed to revise the constitution and limit the protector's powers. In spite of the exclusion of a hundred members, it persisted in this claim, and Cromwell dissolved it (January 22, 1655). He had to struggle not only against discontented republicans, but against fresh outbreaks of the Royalists. He replied by a further development of military rule, and by partially abandoning his policy of toleration. England was divided (August 1655) into twelve military districts, governed by major-generals, the expenses of whose administration were supplied by an income tax on Royalists, and the public services of the Church of England were suppressed (November 1655). Abroad, however, the prospect was more favourable. Cromwell had signalized the first months of his rule by the conclusion of advantageous treaties with Holland (April 5, 1654), Sweden (April 28), Portugal (March 10); and Denmark. Spain and France contended for his alliance. His influence forced Savoy to restore the privileges of the Vaudois (August 18, 1655); the conquest of Jamaica announced his rupture with Spain, and a treaty of commerce sealed his friendship with France (October 24, 1655). These successes, and the desire to obtain some constitutional sanction for his government, led Cromwell to call a second parliament (September 17, 1656). The preliminary exclusion of about a hundred refractory members secured a more docile assembly, in deference to whose vote Cromwell gave up his institution of the major-generals. They went on to revise the constitution, to establish a new House of Lords, and to offer Cromwell the title of king. His refusal of the title, mainly dictated by the opposition of the army, did not prevent him from accepting their constitutional amendments, and he was again, with legally defined powers, installed as protector (June 26, 1657). [HUMBLE PETITION AND ADVICE.] But the House of Commons, whose composition was materially altered by the admission of the excluded members and the absence of the new lords, rejected the authority of the other House, and Cromwell indignantly dissolved it (February 4, 1658). This confusion at home was perhaps compensated by brighter prospects abroad. If his plan for the union of the Protestant powers failed, the alliance with France ripened into an offensive and defensive league against Spain, and the battle of Dunkirk (June 4, 1658) made his arms renowned through Europe. Cromwell's vigour was now beginning to decay, and being attacked by a fever, he died September 3, 1658. Cromwell's person and character are thus described by a gentleman of his household:—"His body was well compact and strong; his stature under six foot (I believe about two inches); his head so shaped as you might see it a storehouse and shop both of a vast treasury of natural parts. His temper exceeding fiery, as I have known, but the flame of it kept down for the most part, or soon allayed with those moral endowments he had. He was naturally compassionate towards objects in distress, even to an effeminate measure; though God had made him a heart wherein was left little room for any fear, but what was due to himself, of which there was a large proportion, yet did he exceed in tenderness towards sufferers. A larger soul, I think, hath seldom dwelt in a house of clay than his was." "He was a strong man," adds another observer; "in the dark perils of war, in the high places of the field, hope shone in him like a pillar of fire when it had gone out in all the others." [COMMONWEALTH.]

Cromwell, RALPH, LORD (d. 1455), was one of the council of regency during Henry VI's minority. He sided with Beaufort against Gloucester; in the year 1443 he was appointed treasurer, and held this important office for ten years, during which time he showed considerable financial ability. In 1449 an attempt was made to assassinate him, which he attributed to Suffolk. He supported the Lancastrian party, but died shortly after the first battle of St. Albans.

Cromwell, RICHARD (1628-1712), third son of the protector, was educated at Felstead School, entered at Lincoln's Inn 1647, and married Dorothy Mayor 1649. During his father's life he lived as a private gentleman in the country. In July 1657 he was elected, after his father's resignation, chancellor of the University of Oxford, and about the same time he was admitted into the council of state. His father on his death-bed nominated him as his successor, and he was accepted as such in England and by the European powers. In his new position he is said to have carried himself discreetly, and better than was expected. A parliament was assembled in January 1659, which recognized him as protector, but the republican minority, headed by Vane and Haselrig, united with the officers of the army, headed by Lambert, Fleetwood, and Desborough, to force him to dissolve parliament (April 1659). His supporters urged him to meet force by force, but he replied, "I will not have a drop of blood spilt for the preservation of my greatness, which is a burden to me." He signed a formal abdication (May 1659), in return for which the restored Rump undertook the discharge of his debts. After the Restoration he fled to the continent, where he remained for twenty years, returning in 1680.

Cromwell, THOMAS, EARL OF ESSEX (d. 1540). The early life of Thomas Cromwell is obscure, and the various stories told concerning it are scarcely consistent. He is said to have been the son of a blacksmith at Putney. In early youth he served as a common soldier in the wars of Italy. He began a commercial career with a Venetian trader;

next he was a clerk at Antwerp, and then a wool merchant at Middelburg, in Zeeland. He returned to England, and did business as a scrivener, being half lawyer, half money-lender. He lent money to the poor nobles, who at the extravagant court of Henry VIII were often reduced to sore straits. While engaged in these pursuits he showed great aptitude for business, and became widely known. In 1524 he was employed by Cardinal Wolsey to manage the details of business connected with the suppression of the smaller monasteries and the foundation of Wolsey's colleges at Ipswich and Oxford. In this occupation Cromwell showed himself unscrupulous, and became very unpopular. On Wolsey's fall, in 1529, he showed his extreme cleverness by using his fidelity to a fallen master as a means of promoting his own interests. He advised Wolsey to buy off the malice of his enemies by judicious grants of pensions out of the revenues of his bishopric. In carrying out these arrangements he commended himself to many powerful friends, and prepared the way for passing over to the service of the king. He suggested to Henry VIII that he should settle the divorce question by declaring himself Supreme Head of the Church of England, and prosecuting the matter in his own ecclesiastical courts. The advice struck Henry. He made Cromwell a member of the privy council, and soon afterwards a secretary of state. Cromwell devoted his energies to raising the royal power above all other authority, and establishing by its means a new order of things. His political text-book, according to Cardinal Pole, was Machiavelli's "Principe." He looked to the strong hand of absolutism to work reforms. By his advice the royal supremacy was declared, appeals to Rome were forbidden, and the king's divorce was pronounced by the Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1534 the Act of Supremacy vested authority in matters ecclesiastical solely in the Crown, and in the next year Cromwell was appointed "vicar-general," or the king's vicegerent in matters ecclesiastical. He was already chancellor, so that he now held in his own hands the chief authority in things secular and spiritual. Cromwell set himself to reduce the Church into obedience to the Crown. He humbled the bishops by treating them as royal officials. He struck at the wealth of the Church by ordering a general visitation of the religious houses. In consequence of the report of the visitors, the lesser monasteries, to the number of 400, were suppressed, and their revenues granted to the Crown (1536). Cromwell's hand was felt everywhere. He directed the clergy what they were to preach about, and revoked the licences of those who would not obey. His spies filled the land, and words of discontent were wrested into proofs of conspiracy, and met with condign punishment. The execution of More and Fisher taught men that they were to expect no mercy unless they obeyed. The northern rebellion was crushed, and led to the suppression of the remaining monasteries (1539). But when Cromwell's success seemed certain, there came a reaction. The violence of the advanced Protestant party awakened general discontent. Henry VIII found that in following Cromwell he had become allied with doctrines which he was not prepared to accept. The Act of Six Articles (1539) marked a Catholic reaction, which seriously affected Cromwell's position. But it was the progress of foreign affairs which brought about his fall. The changes which had been made in England were viewed with anger by the Emperor Charles V, who was hindered from interfering in England only by his war with France. Henry VIII trusted to his French alliance; but as France also looked suspiciously on the new English policy, Cromwell sought a new alliance with the Lutheran princes of Germany. He hoped to make a strong coalition, by which France, England, and the German Lutherans should unite to crush the power of the house of Austria. As an earnest of this policy, he laboured for the marriage of Henry VIII with Anne, daughter of the Duke of Cleves, and niece of John Frederick, Elector of Saxony, who was the head of the Smalcaldic League. He carried his point, and received a new sign of the royal favour by being created Earl of Essex. But the marriage with Anne of Cleves was unsuccessful on both personal and political grounds. Henry VIII was disappointed in his new wife, and conceived an aversion for her. The political schemes of Cromwell did not prosper. France drew nearer to the emperor; the Lutheran princes still held by their principle of passive resistance, and showed no signs of taking active measures. Henry VIII was willing to allow his minister full power so long as he succeeded; at the first sign of failure, at the first appearance of difficulty to himself, he remorselessly sacrificed his favourite. Cromwell had few friends, and his disgrace was a sure means of bringing back the king's popularity. On June 10, 1540, Cromwell was arrested in the council chamber on the charge of high treason. A bill of attainder was rapidly passed through parliament. Cromwell was not allowed to speak in his own defence, and was executed on July 28, 1540. Cromwell lived simply, and devoted himself entirely to his political occupations. His influence over the king was supreme while he was in power, and the separation of the English Church from the papacy was due entirely to his skilfully devised measures. He was resolute and unscrupulous, with a clearly-defined policy. But he advanced too fast, till he stood absolutely alone, and when he lost the royal favour he had nothing on which to fall back. He risked everything on the marriage of Henry VIII with Anne of Cleves. Had Anne been personally attractive to the king, Cromwell's policy might have developed results of more permanent influence.

Cropley Bridge, THE BATTLE OF (June 29, 1644), was fought near Banbury, between the Royalists, led by Charles I in person, and a part of the Parliamentary forces, commanded by Sir William Waller, whose attempt to cross the Cherwell and attack the king's troops in the rear proved unsuccessful.

Crotoye, THE BATTLE OF (1347), between the English and French fleets, was occasioned by the attempt of the latter to relieve Calais during the siege of the town by Edward III. The French fleet was entirely defeated, all attempts to relieve Calais by sea were abandoned, and English supremacy in the Channel was established.

Crowland, or CROYLAND, a town of Lincolnshire, about eight miles north-east of Peterborough, is the site of a great abbey, the origin and foundation of which are obscure. It is said to have been founded in 714 by Ethelbald of Mercia; to have been burnt by the Danes in 870, and restored under Edred in the middle of the tenth century. The buildings were again destroyed by fire in 1091. Under Abbot Geoffrey, who was appointed in 1110, the church was again restored on a scale of considerable splendour. The abbot sat in the parliaments of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, but the town was never a parliamentary borough. After the dissolution of the abbey in 1539, the prosperity of Crowland rapidly diminished.

Crown, THE. In England monarchy is generally held to have been a direct product of the Anglo-Saxon conquest in the fifth and sixth centuries. The commonly accepted view is that in their German home the Saxons were ruled by elected magistrates (ealdormen) in time of peace, and led to battle by elected generals (heretoga), whose authority expired with the war. Unlike their old tribal forays, the expedition to Britain entailed a chronic struggle between natives and invaders, which lasted several generations; and as the duration of the heretoga's exceptional powers were defined by the duration of the war, the mere force of circumstances now rendered those powers permanent. This change, amounting to the creation of a new office, was recognized, and sanctioned by the adoption of a title already in use amongst other Teutonic tribes, the title King, or Cyn-ing (head of the kin). Actually, however, recent investigations have proved the fallacy of the theory that kingship was unknown among the Anglo-Saxon peoples before the conquest. There is direct evidence of the existence of monarchical institutions prior to the fifth century, although kingship may not have been universal. The primitive king was ealdorman and heretoga in one; he was elected, but the danger of interregnum in the presence of an endless war leading to the practice of electing his successor in his lifetime, the influence of the victorious general was usually sufficient to secure his son's nomination. The prescription thus established gradually confined the national choice to descendants of the first king, and myth soon explained and hallowed the preference by investing them with the halo of a divine pedigree. Christianity swept away the claim to descent from Woden, but more than compensated by the introduction of Old Testament ideas and the example of the Empire. The king, who had hitherto differed from his subjects only in degree, began to assume the style and arrogate the pretensions of the Byzantine court. The oath of homage taken by his thegns was assimilated to the sacramentum (or Roman oath of military obedience, originally taken by the army alone, but extended later to the holders of civil office, and finally to all subjects), and by the time of the reign of Edmund had become the oath of allegiance exacted from every freeman of full age. The king was now lord of the race (cyn-hlaford); plots against his life were punishable, like treason against any hlaford (lord), with death and forfeiture; and finally, the Statute of Treasons, 25 Ed. III, left the king on a constitutional pinnacle, no longer the first among equals.

It is from this fusion of Imperial and Teutonic ideas that the theory prevalent in most European systems of law has sprung. The lawyers distinguish carefully between two kings—the ideal and the real. The former is the state: the fountain of legislation, of justice, of honour; i.e., the despot of Imperial law. This ideal person resides from time to time in the real king, who is subject to all the imperfections of human nature, and represents the Teutonic head of the kin, limited by the caprice and free instincts of his subjects. The relation of these two persons forms the main subject of constitutional history, their identification leading to despotism, their separation to limited monarchy. In England that separation is enshrined in the famous resolution of 1642, in which the Lords and Commons declare themselves a "council . . . to provide for the necessities . . . of the kingdom, and to declare the king's pleasure in those things that are requisite thereunto, and that what they do therein hath the stamp of royal authority, although his Majesty, seduced by evil counsel, do in his own person oppose or interrupt." This victory was mainly the result of financial struggles.

THE REVENUES OF THE CROWN were of two main kinds, ordinary and extraordinary: i.e., those which belonged to the Crown in its own right, and those which came as a theoretically free gift from its subjects; and their history is the history of the absorption of the ordinary by the extraordinary. The former included (1) the profits of the Crown lands; (2) purveyance (the right exercised on royal progresses of buying at the lowest prices, and using forced labour); (3) feudal incidents (the three regular aids, escheat, forfeiture, relief, marriage, wardship); (4) customs duties (the price paid by merchants for the protection of the royal peace). The latter consisted primarily of the aids (q.v.) granted from time to time by the free tenants and clergy, in accordance with the recognized feudal principle that it was the duty of the tenant to come to his lord's assistance at times of financial crisis. The crusade of Richard I, the wickedness of John, and the weakness of Henry III impaired the ordinary revenue at a time when difficulties with France were yearly augmenting the expenditure. Edward I met the deficiency of the one by an expansion of the other. To this end he remodelled parliament, introducing representatives of the tax-paying classes, the country gentry, and the city merchants; and so rapidly did the power of the new assembly grow, that in 1275 it confirmed to the king the old customs on wool and leather, known thenceforth as magna et antiqua custodia: a grant which in effect transferred customs from the hereditary to the parliamentary revenue. In 1660 the abolition of feudal tenures and of purveyance narrowed the former down to the proceeds of the Crown estates; and these have in their turn been resigned in consideration of a fixed pension. At first the powers of parliament were limited to the making of the grant, the expending of which lay wholly with the Crown; but in 1378, during Richard II's minority, that principle of appropriation was introduced (by the provision that the tax granted for the French war should be paid over to two parliamentary treasurers, Philpot and Walworth) which, after a temporary collapse in the period of Tudor and Yorkist despotism, revived under James I, was confirmed by the Commonwealth, adopted as a momentary expedient by the Royalist parliament (1665), and finally, by the insertion of Lord Somers's Clause (March 1690), acquired a permanent position as an essential element of the original grant.

THE CROWN WAS THE FOUNT OF LAW. "Lex fit consensus populi, constitutione regis," the maxim of the Teutonic empire, was also the theory of the English constitution, and endured in its original freshness till in Henry VI's reign the Commons adopted the form of bill instead of the older petition. Yet though this change practically reversed the legislative position of king and Commons, the old maxim still represents the legal theory. The Crown was also the Fount of Justice. This principle is of somewhat later origin, the shire and hundred courts in their earliest form deriving authority, not from the king, but from the nation. Even so late as the reign of Henry III, the king might be sued in his own courts by a writ of the form Præcipe Henrico Regi Angliæ; nor was it till the last century that the abolition of private appeals in criminal cases left the Crown sole prosecutor, and removed the last limitation on the royal right of pardon. The process by which the national courts became the king's courts, and the national peace the king's peace, was the work of Norman centralization operating through the Curia Regis (q.v.). To strengthen the local courts against feudal encroachment, Henry I occasionally sent justices of the Curia Regis to preside in them. This practice, brought to a system by Henry II, superinduced, to the mutual satisfaction of king and people, the royal upon the national peace, till in the end the second was entirely overgrown and choked by the first. The Crown was further the Fount of Honour. In the days of chivalry any knight could confer the honour of knighthood. But with the decay of feudal service the political nobility of the peerage threw the social nobility of the knights completely into the shade. The class which owed title and privilege to the special writ of the Crown became far the most prominent in the state; the legal mind soon concluded that the monopoly enjoyed by the Crown of conferring the highest dignity must extend à fortiori to all inferior titles of honour.

CROWN SUPREME LANDOWNER. Although the feudalization of society was proceeding rapidly before 1066, it was not until the Norman Conquest that the mediæval doctrine of the king as supreme landowner secured recognition. As a result of William's confiscation and regrant of the lands of the English, every landholder in the kingdom was converted into a tenant, mediate or immediate, of the Crown. Thus the change which had been proceeding sporadically before the accession was systematically completed, and the king became the one lord who was not also a tenant. The subsequent growth of the constitutional system and the abolition of feudal tenures (1660) have, however, degraded this once all-important maxim into a legal pleasantry.

SUCCESSION TO THE CROWN. The king, it has been shown, was in early times elected; elected, that is to say, by the witan and accepted by the people, their choice being limited by unwritten custom to the members of a particular family. Primogeniture, the offspring of feudal tenure, did not affect the succession till the king of the people had become also the feudal lord of the soil. Yet so late as 1199, Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury, could assert without contradiction, in his opening speech at the coronation of John, that the English king rules not by hereditary right, but in virtue of his election, and that the national voice which gave could also take back the crown. The old form was observed even at the coronation of Charles I (1625) of presenting the new king to the crowd at the four corners of a raised platform, and demanding their assent to his nomination. The ground won by the solemn deposition of two kings, Edward II and Richard II, seemed lost in the Yorkist reaction, but the accession of Henry VII brought in a fresh parliamentary dynasty, and though the Stuarts for a time forced on the nation the absolutist maxims of the Scottish court, the triumph of the popular party was in the end complete, and the Revolution (1688) established for ever the constitutional principle that the King of England is an official and not a proprietary ruler. The legal maxim that "the king never dies" has developed simultaneously with the rule of succession. It was unknown in the earlier periods of our history. On the death of the Norman and early Angevin kings there always seems to have been a period, anterior to the coronation of the new sovereign, in which the lawless baron, or man of lower degree, felt himself free to commit whatever outrages he would, on the plea that there was as yet no higher potentate to whom he was responsible. From William I to Henry III inclusive, the reign of each king was considered only to commence at his coronation. From Edward II to Henry VIII, the accession is ascribed to the day following the death or deposition of the preceding king; but from Edward VI to the present day, the above-cited maxim has prevailed. [KING.]

Crown, THE WEARING OF THE. As part of the regalia, the crown seems to have been at first nothing more than a fillet of linen or cloth, intended to represent the halo symbolical of deity. Like most of the other regal ornaments, and the general apparatus of court ceremonial, the gold crown was borrowed from the emperors of the East, who, on the establishment of Christianity as the state religion, claimed for themselves the theocratic position of the ancient Jewish kings. The crown has been worn by the English monarchs—

(1) At their Coronation. After the administration of the coronation oath by the Archbishop of Canterbury, a special service is celebrated in Westminster Abbey, in the course of which the Dean of Westminster solemnly anoints the new king with holy oil, the great dignitaries invest him with the regalia, the imposition of the crown, performed by the archbishop himself, constituting the essential act of investiture. At that moment "the trumpets sound, the drums beat, and the people with loud and repeated shouts cry 'God save the king!'" A signal is also given from the battlements of the church, at which the twenty-one great guns in St. James's Park are fired, and also the ordnance of the Tower."

(2) In the Norman and Angevin periods at the Courts or Councils held on the three great Church festivals of the year, Christmas, Easter, and Michaelmas. Edward I first omitted the custom, "saying merrily," that "crowns do rather onerate than honour princes."

The regalia used for the coronation were, till the Reformation, kept in the custody of the dean and chapter of Westminster, both for security and as an assertion of the national character of investiture. On the dissolution of the monasteries, they were transferred from the national to the royal keeping in the Tower. The Long Parliament destroyed them, as a protest against monarchical government. On the Restoration a new set was made, which exists at the present day. [H. R. R.]

Crown Lands were in pre-Norman times originally of wide extent, but the development of the practice of "booking" land, particularly to churches, had in the later Anglo-Saxon period a deleterious effect upon the royal resources. The Norman Conquest and the resulting confiscations converted the king for the first time into the theoretical owner of all the land of England—the one lord who was not also a tenant. The regnants, however, to the king's followers and friends soon radically reduced the amount of land actually held by the Crown, and under Henry III it was necessary to pass an act of resumption, while in the reign of Edward II an act was for some time in force forbidding the alienation of Crown lands. The royal demesnes were largely increased by forfeitures in the Wars of the Roses, by the acquisitiveness of Henry VII, and by the ecclesiastical confiscations of Henry VIII; but the necessities of James I and Charles I, and the action of the Long Parliament, disposed of all the royal estates, which were only recovered in part by the Parliamentary sales being declared void at the Restoration. The wholesale granting away of the Crown lands has a distinct constitutional importance, as having compelled the king to apply to parliament and the nation for his income, which was often granted only on condition of good government. The lavishness of William III necessitated an act in the reign of Anne, by which the alienation of Crown lands was greatly checked; though, in 1800, this act was declared not to apply to the private property of the sovereign, acquired by purchase or inheritance from anyone not being a sovereign of England. Since George III the sovereign on his accession has always surrendered the Crown lands to be disposed of by parliament, like other revenues of the state, for the public service; their superintendence lies with the commissioners of woods, forests, and land revenues.

Crusades, THE. In the usual acceptance of the term, the name "Crusades" connotes the struggle for possession of the Holy Land undertaken by the Christian peoples of Western Europe during the two centuries 1095–1291. The term, however, has a wider connotation. It stands for the whole of the great conflict waged by the soldiers of the Cross to recover lands, once Christian, that had passed into the possession of the infidel. In this larger sense the Crusades may be said to have begun with the Syrian conquests of the Byzantine emperor, Nicephorus Phocas, in 970, and to have been continued when the Pisaniards occupied Sardinia in 1016, when the Spaniards commenced to drive back the Moors in 1031, and when the Normans conquered Sicily during the years 1060–90.

This article, however, must restrict itself to the Crusades in the narrower meaning of the term. The immediate cause of the Crusades to the Holy Land was the Ottoman invasion of Syria and Asia Minor in 1071. On the one hand, the Byzantine emperor was defeated and his Asiatic territories overrun; on the other hand, the city of Jerusalem passed into Ottoman possession. The Byzantine emperor appealed to the Christian West for aid towards the recovery of Asia Minor; pilgrims returning from Palestine cried aloud for the deliverance of the Holy Sepulchre from Turkish desecration. The Christian West responded with embarrassing unanimity. Religious zeal, political ambition, commercial enterprise, and social unrest all combined to send out to Palestine an immense multitude of pilgrims and adventurers. Pope Urban II took the lead in the advocacy of the Crusade (1095), and in 1096 the movement was launched.

It is usual to distinguish eight great crusades as follows:—

1ST CRUSADE, 1096–1100, under the leadership of Godfrey of Bouillon, Raymond of Toulouse, and Bohemund of Otranto. The crusaders assembled at Constantinople; crossed to Asia Minor and recovered a large part of it for the Byzantine emperor, Alexius I; captured Antioch after an eight months' siege (1098), and occupied Jerusalem itself after a sanguinary fight (July 15, 1099). In 1100 the kingdom of Jerusalem was established with Baldwin of Flanders as its first king.

2ND CRUSADE, 1147–9. A serious Mohammedan menace to the kingdom caused the second crusade, preached by St. Bernard, and led by Louis VII of France and Conrad of Germany. Dissensions and treachery ruined the expedition. French and Germans went separately, and the armies of both of them perished in Asia Minor. Few reached Palestine at all, and such as did reach it could effect nothing.

3RD CRUSADE, 1189–92. The third crusade was caused by the news that in 1187 the Holy City had been recaptured by the infidels under their great leader Saladin. The Emperor Frederick I, Philip II of France, and Richard I of England all set forth to retrieve this great disaster. Once more misfortune and disharmony deprived the expedition of result. Frederick I lost his life in Asia Minor; Philip II abandoned the enterprise; Richard I, left to his own resources, made a three years' truce with Saladin and returned to Europe.

4TH CRUSADE, 1202–4, intended originally to attack the heart of the Mohammedan power in Egypt, was diverted by the Hohenstaufen and the Venetians to Constantinople, which was captured in 1204. A Latin Empire was established on the Bosphorus which lasted till 1261.

5TH CRUSADE, 1218-21, led by John of Brienne, titular King of Jerusalem, and by Andrew of Hungary, made an attack on Egypt which was ignominiously repulsed.

6TH CRUSADE, 1228-9, led by the Emperor Frederick II, was remarkable from the complete absence of fighting. Frederick entered into negotiation with the caliph Malik-al-Kamil, and by treaty secured possession of Jerusalem, which continued in Christian hands till 1244.

7TH CRUSADE, 1248-54, and 8TH CRUSADE, 1270-2, were both led by Saint Louis, King of France. The first came to a disastrous end in Egypt, the second in Tunis. The failure of these expeditions sealed the doom of the Christian dominion in the Levant.

Tripoli and Acre, the last important relics of the kingdom of Jerusalem, fell in 1289 and 1291 respectively.

During the ensuing two centuries many efforts were made by the popes and others to revive the crusading spirit; but the efforts were vain. A secular Europe was bent on other pursuits.

See Ernest Barker, "The Crusades," where an admirably full account of both original and secondary sources is given.

Culdees. THE. There has been great controversy both as to the origin and application of the name Culdee. The derivation is probably the Celtic Ceile De, worshipper or companion of God (not Caelicola, Caeleb, or Columba, as some have tried to prove). The Culdees appear to have established themselves in the first instance in Ireland, and to have spread thence to Scotland, where we first find them mentioned at the beginning of the eighth century. They are in no way to be identified with the Columban monks. They were in origin anchorites rather than cenobites; and although they gradually came together in community under the rule of abbots, they never constituted in any strict sense an order. The chief Culdee monasteries in Scotland were at Lochleven, St. Andrews, Abernethy, Dunkeld, Brechin, and Dunblane. In the course of time they lost any distinctiveness they may originally have had, and were brought, like the secular clergy, under canonical rule; so that by the twelfth century the name Culdee was virtually synonymous with that of "secular canon." The looseness of their organization resulted in a rapid deterioration in their mode of life; worldly interests became predominant and even the rule of celibacy was relaxed. This decline, together with the fact that the Culdee communities were strongholds of Celtic custom and tradition, inspired a much-needed reform which, inaugurated by St. Margaret, was carried through by her sons Alexander I and David I. The Culdee monasteries were in many cases incorporated in communities of regular canons or as cathedral chapters. At St. Andrews they remained as a dwindling body until the early fourteenth century, when they disappeared from history. In Ireland the chief centre of the Culdees was at Armagh. Here they persisted as a community of secular priests until the dissolution of 1541, and even experienced a fleeting revival at the beginning of the seventeenth century.

Cullen, CARDINAL PAUL (1803-78), was Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, primate of Ireland, and apostolic delegate. Descended from an ancient Celtic family, he entered the priesthood and became head of the Irish College in Rome, and, for a short time, of the Propaganda. The government owed much to him in the Fenian rising, against which he spoke with great vigour. He also did much to encourage the temperance cause.

Culloden, or DRUMMOSSIE MOOR, THE BATTLE OF (April 16, 1746), was the closing effort on the part of the Stuarts to regain the British crown. The Pretender, Charles Edward, commanded an army of Highlanders, which was utterly defeated by the royal troops under the Duke of Cumberland (q.v.). [STUART, CHARLES EDWARD; JACOBITES.]

For authorities see under JACOBITES.

Culpepper, SIR THOMAS (d. 1541), was a cousin of Catherine Howard, and one of those executed on a confession of having committed adultery with her. Sir Thomas Culpepper, it appears, had not only carried on a criminal correspondence with the queen before her marriage, but had had the hardihood, when the court was staying at Lincoln in 1541, to get introduced, by the agency of Lady Rochford, into the queen's bed-chamber. Culpepper and Lady Rochford were both executed for high treason.
